take so great paines as to measure the whole world, and to compasse on euery side all the elementarie region, to know the things that are contained in them, and their nature, and yet in the meane time hee can not measure or know himselfe being but a little handfull of earth? For although the knowledge of the rest of the creatures that are in this great visible world, will greatly helpe to leade him to the knowledge of God the Creatour, neuertheless he shall neuer be able to know him well: if withall he know not himselfe well. Yea these two knowledges are so ioyned together, that it is a very hard matter to seuer them. For as a man cannot know himselfe if he know not God, so he cannot know God well, if in like sort he know not himselfe. So that I take this for most certaine, that neither Astronomy, Geomotry, Geography, or Cosmographie, nor any other Mathematicall science is so necessary for man, as that wherby he may learne to know himselfe wel, & to measure himselfe wel by the measure of his owne nature; that he may thereby know how to containe himselfe within the limits thereof. As for Mathematicians, naturall Philosophers and Phisitions, who bestow their trauaile in the knowledge of nature and naturall things, & in the meane time forget God and themselves, whereas they ought to learne both the one and the other, by that knowledge that God hath giuen them of his workes, I say they are not worthy to be taken for naturall Philosophers, Phisitions or Mathematicians, but rather for blockheaded beasts. In my opinion they behaue themselves, as if a man should bee alwaies occupied in looking vpon his house, and handling of his moueables and houshold stufte, and in the meane time did not put them to those principall and special vses, for which they ought to serue, but were altogether forgetfull of himselfe, of his wife, and of his children. Moreouer concerning Phisitions, if their care to know their owne soule, with the nature and parts thereof, be not more to minister that food and phisicke which is necessary for it to liue well and happily, and that for euer, then to know the nature of mens bodies that they may cure others, it may worthily be said vnto them Phisition beale thy selfe. For if he bee worthily derided that taketh in hand the cure of other men & cannot heale himselfe, or at least hath no care to doe it, surely that man is well worthy to be had in greater derision that is more carefull not onely of his owne, but also of other mens bodies, then hee is of his owne soule, whereby hee differeth from brute beasts, and is made partaker of an immortall nature. Wherefore it is very requisite, that all students in natural philosophy should profit so wel in the study thereof, as to be able to turne it into true naturall diuinity, whereby they may learne to know God their creator, in that nature which he hath created to this end to make himselfe seene & known therein to all men.

We haue therefore good cause (my companions) to bestow all possible paines and trauaile, that we may proceede on in so necessary and profitable a knowledge. Wherefore we must lay before our eyes two bookes which God hath giue vnto vs to instruct vs by, & to lead vs to the knowledge of himselfe, namely the booke of nature, and the booke of his word, which wee must ioine both together, as also that doctrine, which is set forth vnto vs in them concerning the knowledge of our selues, especially of the soule, which is the true man. For the first booke would stand vs in small stead without the second, as we see it daily by experience, yea euery one of vs hath triall thereof in himselfe. Therefore God of his great mercy hath added the second booke vnto the first, to supply the want that is in our nature through sin. For if mā had not sinned, this booke of nature would haue sufficed to haue kept him alwayes in the knowledge, contemplation, and obedience of God his creator. For then he should himselfe haue carried the booke whole & perfect imprinted in his heart & minde: neither should his soule haue needed any teacher to know it selfe, but in it selfe it should haue cleerely behelde and contemplated it selfe, so long as she preserved her first light and aboad in that harmony wherein God had created her. But now that she is in the body, as it were some excellēt picture of Apelles fallen into a sinke of mire, couered & compassed about with thick mists, & obscure darkenes, it is very needefull that wee should haue another new light, brought vnto vs from heaven, which is not naturall as the first but supernaturall. For this cause God hath farther giuen vs this second booke, of which I spake euen now, by meanes wherof and by the vertue of his holy spirit, he communicateth vnto vs as much celestial and heavenly light as is needfull for the knowledge of our selues and of his Maiestie. Being therefore guided by the spirit of God, whereby our spirit doth see and contemplate, let vs read in these two bookes, & diligently note in them the parts, and powers, force and vertue as well of the body as of the soule of man, especially the immortality thereof: wherby we shall make the way easy, for vs to walke & sport our minds hereafter in the large and goodly fields of the whole world, by discoursing of all natures contained therein, if it shall please God to giue vs grace, as he hath giue vs wills to performe it. True it is, that we haue now taken in hand a very long piece of worke, and not greatly necessary in respect of the principall cause of our meeting together, if wee meant here to make an entire and perfect Anatomy of mans body. This dutie belongeth to Physitions, which we will not take vpon vs: but it shall suffice vs to open a gap to the consideration, first of the matter whereof the body is made, and of the diuersity thereof: then of the forme which God hath given vnto it: and lastly of the profite and vse of them both. For through a little vnderstanding and knowledge, which we may haue of these things, if we consider them as we ought, we shall haue great occasion to maruaile at the worke of God in the frame of the body: yea we shall see therein store of testimonies of his almighty power, knowledge, wisdom, goodnesse and prouidence. But as for the soule, we will labour to make her to behold herselfe in the glasse of her wonderfull actions, so farre forth as she is able to contemplate herselfe, and to measure her greatnesse by her owne compasse. Wherefore wee will heere make as it were an Anatomy of the soule, and of all her partes powers, vertues, and faculties, instructing our selues at large in the consideration of her nature, creation and immortallitie: and eschewing in all our discourses as much as we may, obscure words and phrases, subtil, curious and vnprofitable disputations, which the ancient Philosophers haue vsed in the searching out of such matters, wee will apply our selues to the greatest number of such as haue not haunted the schooles of Philosophie, that we may profit many, and instruct our selues in the truth by familiar speeches, so farre forth as our weake iudgement is able to comprehend, being directed by the gift and grace of God, and made conformable to his word, which is the true touchstone whereby all doctrine is to be examined. Moreover we will observe in our discourses the same order which we kept in our Academicall treatises: but onely that I thinke it meetest for our present purpose, that every one of vs after he hath discoursed of some point, should offer matter subiect to his companion to prosecute and speake of, as if hee gaue him instructions concerning that thing which he propoundeth vnto him. And we will deale all foure of vs, every one in his course, making one discourse round in the morning, and another in the afternoone: continuing vntill wee haue finished as it were a naturall historie of man, and of his parts, the bodie and soule. First therefore thou shalt instruct vs A S E R, in the creation of the first man, and in the matter whereof mans body is made.

CHAP. I.

SER. God onely hath his beeing of himselfe, therefore hee is eternall, without beginning and without end. But because he would not bee alone, he created the creatures, and by their creation gaue beeing to that which was nothing before. Therefore all natures tooke their beeing and essence, and doe hold it of that first euerlasting essence. Thus also he answered to Moses, who asked of him what his name was: I will be that I will be: or, I am that I am. Moreouer he said, Thus shalt thou say to the children of Israel: I am hath sent mee vnto you. We see here what name hee giueth himselfe, whereby hee sheweth that hee onely is, and hath an immutable essence and existence, which onely, to speake properly, a man may call a Beeing. Wherefore seeing God is the first essence, and that onely that hath beeing of it selfe, and from which all others proceede, as riuers from their spring and fountaine, wee shall easily come vnto the Eternitie of God, if wee know how to ascend thither by the degrees of the essences of all those creatures, which descended from his eternall and vnchangeable essence, by reason whereof hee is called Iehonab by the Hebrewes.

The name

Exod. 3. 14.

If then wee consider our selues, euery one of vs shall know that hee had a beginning, that hee made not himselfe, neither came hee into the world but by the helpe of another. This consideration will leade euery one to his father and mother that begat him: and being come so farre, hee will passe on and ascend step by step to his ancestors, making the like iudgement of all his predecessors as of himselfe. For he will by and by thinke, that they came into the world after the same manner that hee did, and not otherwise, and that they were not the first men. Thus if a man ascend vp still from father to father, he must needs in the end come to some one father, that was the first father of all, of whom all others tooke their beginning, as hee that was the stocke of all mankind. This first father must either haue his being of one, or be eternall, or come of some eternall matter like to God, or be God himselfe. Which because hee could not be, he must needs haue some beginning, and bee borne after another fashion then they were that descended of him. Now what father can we say he had but the Creator of the whole world? Being come to his first beginning we can mount no higher, but must stay there, and conclude, that this first builder of nature was without beginning, that he is infinite and eternall, otherwise we shall neuer find place to stay at. Thus we see how the creature leadeth vs from essence to essence, proceeding from one to another, vntill it come to the first essence which is infinite and eternall, the spring and fountaine of all others, which we call God. But let vs speake of this creation of the first man.

and enriched the whole with celestiaall lights, herbes, planets, earthly, ayery, and watery liuing creatures, Let vs (saide he) make man in our owne image according to our likenes, and let them rule ouer the fish of the sea, and ouer the foule of the beauen, and ouer the beasts, and ouer all the earth, and ouer enery thing that creepeth, and moueth on the earth. Now we will note here in the 1. place three things wel worthy of consideration. First, that God did not barely command that man should be made and created, as he commanded for the other creatures, but he that speaketh as though some great king or prince should deliberate with his Counsell about the making of some great worke, declaring afterward himselfe why hee tooke this way in the creation of man onely, and not in the creation of the other creatures, likewise, when he saith, According to our owne image and likenesse, which is the second thing we haue to note. For by these wordes he plainly declareth, that he mindeth to make a worke, the like whereof was not before, & to draw out an image more agreeable to his nature and more worthy his maiesty, then hee had done before amongst all the workes of his hands. For although he had already adorned and replenished the whole beaueus with goodly lights, yea all the elements and residue of the world with all sorts of creatures, yet there was not one creature vnder heauen which hee had made capable of vnderstanding and reason, to know and glorifie God the creatour of the whole world. And albeit the Angels being heauenly spirits had this vnderstanding and knowledge, yet he would haue man besides vpon earth, for whose sake chiefly he had created the world, to the end he might know and glorifie him together with his Angels. Therefore Moses addeth the third thing which wee haue to consider in this deliberation of mans creation, therby the better to let vs know the excellency of this creature aboue the rest, whe he declareth, that God would create him, that he might rule ouer the rest of the liuing creatures, and ouer the whole earth, as if men should be his Lieutenant, and as it were a little terrene god, vnder the great and soueraigne God that created him. But some man may aske with whom God maketh this deliberation? For he speaketh, as though he would haue some helpers and companions in the making of this so excellent a work. The prophet Isaiah an-swereth to this saying, Who was his counsellor? or hath giuen to him first, and he shall be recompensed?
For he had no other counsaile or help but of himselfe, & of his heauenly & eternall wisdom, as it is testified by Salomon. Therefore we must not thinke that he had the Angels for counsellors & helpers, either in the creation of man, or of any other creature whatsoever, as some haue presumed to imagine and to affirme. For that were to derogate too much from the nature & maiesty of God, and to take from him the title of Almighty, which agreeth to him onely. For the creature cannot be a creator. And as there is but one only God, so there is but one creator of all things. For the worke of the creation can agree to none but to God onely.
But Moses by this manner of speaking in the plurall number, meant to giue out some obscure knowledge of the trinitie of persons that is in the vnitie of God, and that vnion which they haue together in the work of the creation, which is common to the Father, with the Son and the holy Ghost, as are all the other workes of God. For although there be distinction of persons in one and the same diuine essence, yet there is no diuision betweene them nor separation. And as they are vnited together in one and the same essence, so likewise they are in all their workes. For the Father doth nothing but by the Sonne, and that in the vertue of the holy spirit. Therefore the prophet addeth immediatly, God created the man in his image: in the image of God created he him: he created them male and female. Wee see here that Moses doth not pro-pound vnto vs three Gods or three creators, but one onely. And in that he doth twice repeat this, that God created man in his image, it is to let vs vnderstand, that this point ought wel to be well considered of, and weighed, as that wherein consisteth all the excellency of man, and the true difference that is betweene him, and the other liuing creatures, which are but brute beasts. We shal now where we ought to seeke this image of God in man, after wee haue heard the rest of the historie of his creation. For after Moses bath briefly and summarily spoken as we haue saide: he taketh the same matter againe into his hand, and intreateth thereof more specially. He saith then, That the Lord made man of the dust of the ground, & breathed in his face breath of life, & that the man was a liuing soule, Wherby he sheweth euidently, that God did not creat the body and soule of man both at one time, as he had created the beasts, but the body first & then the soule, which he ioyned therewith, not only to giue life vnto it, as it is giuen to brute beasts by the soule which they haue, but also to make it capable of vnderstanding as we shal vnderstand more at large hereafter. For we speak not now by what means or at what time the soule is ioined with the body in the comon & ordinary generatiō of men, but only of the mean & order which god obserued in the creatiō of the 1. mā, according to the rehearſal

Moses maketh. Now touching the matter whereof he made him, because the chiefest & most apparant was taken from the earth, it is saide expressely, that he was made thereof, and that he should returne thither, as we see it true, in the death of every one. But this is most certain & graunted of all the great philosophers, yea euident to be seen, that mans body is compounded of the 4. elements, & of al their qualities, as also all the other bodies of creatures vnder heauen. And because the greatest part which remaineth of that which we see of man, is of the earth, therefore it is saide, that he returneth to earth, although whatsoeuer is taken of the other elements in the composition of his body, doth likewise turn again into them. For the flesh of man agreeth aptly with the earth, his vital spirits with the aire & the fire, his humors with the water. The sence of seeing agreeth with the fire: that of hearing with the aire: that of tasting with the element of water, the sence of touching with the earth, & that of smelling with the aire & fire, as we shal vnderstand more at large hereafter when we handle them. Yea there is no peece so small in the whole frame of man, wherein every one of the elements doth not intermeddle his power and qualities, although one of them doth alwaies commaund aboue the rest. This is to bee seene in the blood, which is the first & chiefest of those 4 humors in the body, and is properly of the nature of the aire. For the muddy dregs, which commonly thicken and settle in the bottom of it, are of the nature of the earth, & are called Melancholy, the pure blood that swimmeth in the midst doth represent vnto vs the aire: that humor that swimmeth in a round circle is watry steame, and the skum that appeareth aboue, is the choler, which is of the nature of the fire. If we consider the ordinary generation of men, the matter is humor: naturall heat is as it were the master builder, drynesse hardneth the body: and cold refreshings doe not only moderate the heat that the moyst matter should bee consumed, but haue also their proper action to congeale and gather it together.

Gen. 3. 19.
Mans body compounded of the foure elements.
Of what element every sence holdeth
most.

Now we must vnderstand that of this first matter which contained all the elements, and which God made the mother of al things, and capable of al formes, every body is compounded, and every one returneth to the same againe, and of that taketh a new forme, so that the true matter of corporall things doth not turne into nothing, neither increaseth or decreaseth in any sort. So that euer since the eternal that can do al things made this whole great frame of nothing, no one thing is made of nothing, neither doth any thing vanish into nothing, but the change of every thing that is bred or that dieth, is only in form. Now by this knowledge of the matter of the first mans body, we may easily vnderstand of what matter al mens bodies are made. For certaine it is, that of one only man al others haue had their beginning, being al his seed and offspring and multiplying daily according to his first vertue. The reason hereof is this, because this power is naturally ingrafted in every thing to bring forth his like, and to continue it self in the same kind, being inabled therunto through a quickning vertue infused into it by that diuine reason, which is the efficient and preserving cause of al creatures. Now I doubt not but that Epicures and Atheists, and such like deriders of God and his word, with whom this age is pestred more then any age past, will account all this to be a very fable, that hath bin hitherto spoken of the creation of the first man. For they give no more credit to the writings of Moses, and of all the Prophets and Apostles, then to an old wiestale, or to the fables of doting dreamers. Neither wil they beleue any more of God, of his providence and of his workes, then they are able to vnderstand, know, and comprehend by their naturall reason. They will say then, that they haue not seene the like workes in nature, (which they put in stead of God:) and by the same reason they will account for lies whatsoeuer the word of God teacheth vs concerning the creation of this great visible world, and of all things contained therein, as also that which we shal heare anon touching the creation of woman. And thus because they saw not when God created the world, and because he did set another order in nature after the creation thereof, then there was before he had created nature, therefore according to their goodly philosophie, there shall be neither God nor creator, nor difference betwixt the workes of the creation, in which nature it selfe was created, and those that followed after God had disposed the order of nature created by him. What then shall wee say of man, & of al the world. Shall he be without a creator, and eternal, or made of some matter that was eternal with God, or shal he be God himselfe? For either hee was created, or hee was not created. If he were not created, then is he eternal, as euen Aristotle faith, following the discourse of human reason, which notwithstanding blinded him in this matter of creation, wherein he is not only contrary to the word, but also to his master Plato & to the best and most excellent amongst the Philosophers. But if the world was created, it must needs be that it had some beginning, and that the first man (as likewise every other creature) was begotten after another manner then the vse is at this present. But what would these sharpe wits, or rather dull beasts say, if they had not seene by experience the worke of God (which they call the worke of nature onely) in the generation of men? For of what are they daily begotten and conceiued of a superfluitie, and as it were of an excrement of mans body, as hereafter wee shall vnderstand more at large? Is this farre more easie to digest in humane reason then the first creation of man? If these skorners had neuer seen such a thing and if they were not conuicted hereof by daily experience, they would giue as little credit to those that should tell the of it, as they do to the spirit of God speaking of his works by the mouth of his prophets. As for those that set nature in the place of God, what greater brutishnes can proceede from them? For doth not the very name of nature declare sufficiently, that nature is a thing made and created, and so consequently, hath her creation & her birth of God, as al other creatures haue? But God punisheth these poore ignorant fellowes with the like iudgement that hee doth many other skilfull and great Philosophers, whom he oftentimes giueth over into a reprobate sence, because through their pride and ingratitude they abuse the knowledge of naturall things which God giueth them: & so that science which should lead them to a greater knowledge of God, maketh them more beastlike then any other, through their owne fault. For it cannot be otherwise but that euery one, considering the nature & composition euen of one onely member of mans body, must of necessity acknowledge and confesse, that some Woorke master made it, and that this Woorke master is of no bodily or humane nature, but of a spirituall and diuine being, that he hath not onely vnderstanding and knowledge of all things, but also that he is vnderstanding it selfe: that he knoweth, loueth, and is the author of all order, and that his wisdom and vertue is so infinite, that it surmounteth all mens vnderstandings. Hereupon it followeth, that he is worthy to be esteemed for God, and to bee worshipped of all men. There are others that aske, why man was not created an infinite space of time before he beganne to bee by the testimony of the holy Scripture, which teacheth vs, that it is not yet fully 6000. yeares since his creation, as though hee had beene created very late. But if the shortnesse of time offendeth them, because they thinke that there are so fewe yeares, since wee reade in holy Scripture, that man was created, let them consider that nothing lasteth long if it haue any ende, and that the whole space of ages past, if it bee compared with eternitie that is endlesse, is not onely to bee thought little, but none at all. Therefore that question which now they aske after 5000. yeares they might with the same curiositie demaund after sixe hundred thousand yeres, if the world had endured so long. They also that were before vs when man was but newly created, might haue mooued this question: yea the first man might haue enquired also as soone as hee was made, why hee was not made before. And so this controuersie about the beginning of mans being, had neuer at any time heretofore any other reasons then it hath now, neither shall haue hereafter. Let vs know then that God being eternall and without beginning began time, and in time made man whom he had neuer made before, being ledde thereunto not by any newe and sodaine motion, but by an immutable and eternall counsaile. For no newe thing can befall him, neither is there any thing in him that is mutable: but according to the height and depth of his riches he hath multiplied the children of men. And let them thinke, imagine and dispute what they list, yet all thinges haue had their beginning according to the good providence of God, which no man in the worlde can sufficiently comprehend. O great mystery, that God hath alwayes beene, and that it pleased him sometime past to make man first, who was neuer made before, and yet not to change his purpose and will. Thus you see howe wee must steppe by steppe ascende by the workes of God vnto himselfe, as wee haue already touched in the beginning of our speech, and as wee can doe it well ynough in mens works. For when I beholde a worke, it by and by putteth me in mind of the instruments wherewith it was made, and the instruments, of him that made them, and of him that set them a worke. Then the Woorke master putteth mee in minde of him that made him such a one, namely, both of his master that taught him, and also of his parents that begat him. Thus climingg vp still from one to one, and from degree to degree, I must needs in the end conclude, that there is one chiefe Work master, of whom al others are descended by their order & degree. And there I must stay: as in like manner proceeding from one essence to another, I may come to the contemplation of that infinit & eternal essence, which is the spring & first cause of euery nature, namely, vnto God, who hath giuen to that matter wherof he made al things a forme meet & conuenient for that worke which hee would make of it. This is that which I think we ought to conceiue touching the creatio of the matter of mans body. Now before we consider the disposition thereof I thinke we ought to intreat of the creation of woman, who is one selfe same flesh, differing onely in sexe, and appointed of God to bee a necessary helpe for the originall and preservation of mankind: which I desire to heare you discourse of, A M A N A.

Of the creation of Woman. Chap. 2.

A M A N A. No marueile, if the eye of mans soule be often dimmed, yea loofeth al light in the diligent consideration of the wonder full works of Gods providence. For as the eye of the body although cleare of it selfe, cannot behold colours, figures, and other visible things, except it be illuminated with light from heauen, or from some other light some body: so albeit our vnderstanding of it owne nature be very cleare sighted, as beeing a beame of the diuine brightnes, yet by reason of the bond that conioyneth it to the body, wherein it is overwhelmed with the darknes of the matter, it can in no wise attain to the glittering conceptions of eternall wisdom, vnles it alwaies haue God that great and euerslasing Sun, and his heauenly light to illuminate it, & to guid it to the faithfull contemplation of the workes of his almighty hand. This hath bin the cause why so many great wittes discoursing philosophically of the originall and beginning of things, and looking on euery side, yea doubting and fearing many things, which they found contrary to humane reason, haue bin caried hither & thither with diuers opinions, like to a vessel tossed in a deep sea, but could neuer come neere to the knowledge of the truth. But if we follow the bright star of truth fixed in the heauenly book of life, as we haue learned therein the creation of man, so we may as easily bee instructed in the creation of the woman, to the confusion of the wisemen of the world, and of al Epicures and Atheists. The holy Scriptures teach as that after God hath created man & placed him in the garden of Eden, to dresse it, and keep it, and had forbidden him to eate of the tree of the knowledge of good and euill, which was a signe and token of the homage, obedience, and subiection he didow to God his creator & Lord, and of that blessed life appointed for him as a recompence and crowne of this obedience. It is not good (then said he) that man should be himself alone, I will make him an help meet for him. And to shew the better how this helpe was, not only meete, but also necessary for man, Moses saith, that God hath already brought all the beasts before Adam, that he might name them according to their natures and kindes, which he performed. Whereby we may iudge what great knowledge of naturall things was in Adam before hee sinned. For otherwise hee could not haue giuen to all liuing creatures names agreeable to their nature, and if he had uot named them as hee should, hee had brought in great confusion in nature. Afterward Moses addeth that among st all those liuing creatures he found no helpe meete for Adam, yea the Lord hath spoken of him before, as if hee had beene alone in the world. For although all the beasts, and all the residue of the creatures were giuen to man to assit him, so that beeing in the estate of innocency wherein hee was then, hee might receiue all seruice and ready obedience from all the creatures, neuerthelesse hee had not as yet any helpe of his kinde. For hee could not haue that familiaritie and conuersation with the beasts, nor receiue such helpe from them, as he could from creatures of his owne kinde. Therefore when the Lord saide, that it was not good for man to bee alone, hee declared plainly, that hee did not create him to liue alone and solitary in the world, but with company, and that his will was, that there should be men vpon earth, who should liue in society & fellowship together. Now seeing that man was created for this end he could not liue in company with others of his kinde without generation and multiplication thereof, which could not be except he were ioyned to a wife, seeing it pleased GOD to appoint it so. Wherefore as hee created the other liuing and sensible creatures of two sexes in one kinde, namely, some males and others females, that they might increafe and multiply by generation, so likewise dealt he with mankind. But as hee tooke an other course in the creation of man, then he did in that of beasts, so also dealt hee in the creation of the woman, whom he purposed to giue vnto man for a companion. For hee created not man and woman borh together, but man first, and then woman afterward, as we wil declare by and by. Now, because there is no coniuction or communion in any humane society, wherein that holy bond, which ought to knit all men together, and ioyn them one to another is better declared, then in that wherby man and wife are ioyned and vnited as it were in one selfe same body, and in one soule, therefore it pleased God not without cause to begin this holy society by that coniunction, which is the bond and foundation of all the rest, and as it were the spring-head and fountaine of all mankind. Therefore it is written, that God minding to create woman and to give her to man for an helper, caused an heauie sleepe to fall vpon Adam, (which name is as much to say as, Of earth) and when he slept hee tooke one of his ribbes, and closed vp the flesh in stead thereof. And the Lord God made a woman of the ribbe, which he had taken from man: then the man said, This now is bone of my bones, and flesh of my flesh, shee shall be called Mans, or Mannish, because shee was taken out of man. First wee see in this history, that God would not that the male and female should haue two beginnings, but onely one, and that they should bee as it were one stocke of mankind, to the end that the coniunction thereof should be more straight, firme and inuolable. For if it had beene otherwise, the diuersity of beginnings might haue giuen occasion either of contemning one another, or of enuie, dissention, and brawlings. Therefore God created in the person of Adam the fountaine of mankind, and after framed Euah, (which is as much to say, as alieue, or liuing) to the end we might know, that the Woman was not created as a new creature of another race or kinde, but was onely a portion and part of the nature of man. By this meanes Adam had in the woman as it were a glasse to behold and contemplate himselfe, as Euah also had the like in him, and as yet to this day every husband hath the like in his wife, and every wife in her husband. For the Woman was flesh of the flesh of man, blood of his blood, and bone of his bones, euen as it were his owne body, and a second-selfe. How then can the husband despise and hate his wife, and not hate himselfe? Foras Saint Paul witnesseth, No man euer yet hated his owne flesh. And what cause hath a Woman to bee loath to bee obedient to her husband, if shee consider that shee is taken out of him, and that in setting her selfe against him, shee strueth against her selfe, and doth her selfe great wrong and iniurie? Therefore as the Lord hath declared what place he would haue the husband and wife to keepe, every one in their degree, by that order which he hath obserued in creating the man first, and then the woman: so he hath done the like in that he created the woman neither of the mans head nor of his feete, but of his rib. Whereby as on the one side, he admonisheth the wife not to lift vp her selfe aboue her husband by taking authority ouer him, & so making her selfe his head: so on the other side he admonisheth the husband not to abuse his authority, by putting his wife vnder his feete, as if shee were a slave, but to account of her as of his sister and companion. We are therefore to consider the great wisdom and providence of God in this creation of the Woman. But Atheists, and other contemners of the word of God, besides that goodly ground and foundation of their impiety, whereof we heard before, take farther occasion to deride this historie of the creation of woman, because it is said, that shee was builded of a ribbe which God tooke from Adam. Truly the workes of God in the creation of things are not vsuall, because they are the first: but they which will not beleue them, may as well giue no credit neither to the miracles that haue beene in times past, nor to those that are daily seene. For they were not to bee called by this name of miracles, if they were wrought by an ordinarie course of nature. They conclude then out of Moses speech, either that Adam had then one rib more then he should haue had, or else that he had one lesse then he should after the womans creation: so that what side soeuer you take they will finde a great absurdity. They that seeke for occasions in this sort to scoffe at the workes of God, that study and take delight to cauill at them, will alwaies finde absurdities enough in them according to their corrupt will & iudgement. For they will daily coine as many as they list to hinder themselves from the knowledge of God and of his workes, least they should bee constrained by them to glorifie him. But indeede what can they doe else but barke against God and his providence, and laugh at all that is taught vs by the holy spirit concerning the creation of all things contained in the world, seeing they are not capable of the knowledge and vnderstanding of heavenly mysteries? But I demand of them, what strange matter they finde in this, if it were so that Adam was created with one rib more then men commonly haue, which God prepared in his creation for the womans creation: or otherwise, if he had one lesse after her creation, which is more likely? For it is said expressely, that God filled vp with flesh that place out of which he tooke the ribbe whereof hee framed Euah. So that Adam lost nothing, neither was he lesse perfect in respect of that. For God did very well recompence it two waies. First, because that which he put in steade thereof, did serue Adams turne as well if his ribbe had remained still. Secondly, it turned to his great good, in that he had a whole woman for one of his ribs, yea such an helpe was giuen vnto him, that shee was as it were another halfe of his body to make him a perfect man. Besides al this, we haue further to note the significations of those

those things which God meant to represent vnto vs, and to teach vs by that manner of proceeding, which hee obserued in creating the woman, of which I haue already spoken. But we haue also to marke herein a notable prophecy of Iesus Christ, and of his Church, and a lively image of her vnion, coniunction, and communication with him being her husband. For as the rib was taken from the mans side whilest he was a sleepe, that the woman might be made: so in the death of Iesus Christ, signified by this sleepe, and whilest hee hung vpon the crosse, his side was pierced, out of which issued blood and water which relemble the Sacraments that tend to the edification of the Church. And as Eua was taken from Adam according to the flesh, who was the first stocke of mankinde, and then ioyned vnto him in marriage, that of twaine they might be one in one flesh: so the Church was taken from Iesus Christ according to the spirit, who is the true stock of mankind regenerated and reformed after the image of God, that she might be one mysticall body with Iesus Christ, who was giuen vnto her by God for her husband and head. For this cause we may say the same things of him & of his Church, which we spake before of the authority and soueraignty of the husband ouer his wife, and of the subiection of the wife towards her husband. For the Church was not first, but Iesus Christ who is eternal, very God and very man, neither was Iesus Christ taken from her, but she from him. Therefore that which Adam said of Eua, when God brought her vnto him, and when he had seene her after he awoke from sleepe, namely. This now is bone of my bones, and flesh of my flesh, Saint Paul applieth to Iesus Christ and to his Church, because shee is made bone of his bone, and flesh of his flesh, and partaker of the very nature of Iesus Christ by faith in him, and by that vnion, coniunction, and fellowship which shee hath with him, whereby she is conioyned vnto him as his spouse. Wherefore the faithfull haue good cause to reioyce, knowing that there is the like spirituall vnion, coniunction and communication betweene Iesus Christ and them, as there is betweene the husband & the wife according to the flesh.

Now as we haue answered to the friuolous speeches which Atheists commonly make about the Creation of the Woman, so we will not passe ouer with silence the opinion of naturall Philosophers, who say, that the male is as it were a perfect man in comparison of the woman, and that shee is an imperfect man. For they doe teach, that nature tendeth alwaies to the greatest perfection that shee can attaine vnto: and because the male is more perfect than the female, therefore that shee alwayes endeauoureth to bring forth males. But when she wanteth power and strength to doe that shee would, shee ingendreth females in steade of males. Whereupon it should follow, that the generation of the woman, as also that of the other females of all liuing creatures, is an infirmity, a defect, and an imperfection of nature. But I would gladly demaund of them, whether G O D made an imperfect worke or no, when hee created the first woman: and whether he did not create her as perfect in her kinde, & in that degree for which hee created her, as he did the man in his. Moreover, seeing God is the creator of nature, it is certaine that he created it perfect in all things belonging vnto it, and that he hath made it subiect to certaine Lawes, vnder which it is alwaies guided by his prouidence as well in the generation of females as of males, of the woman as of the man. And if some creatures excell others, yet that hindereth not why euery one should not be perfect in his order and nature, hauing regard to their Creator, and to the end for the which he created them. We must not therefore alleadge any imperfection in the creation of the woman, more then in that of the man: seeing that if shee had bene created otherwise then she was, she should not haue bene so perfect in her nature, as she is, because she would not so fitly serue that turne for the which she was created, namely to helpe man, both in the generation & continuance of his kind, and also in beeing a succor vnto him in such things as belong to his nourishment and in the guiding and government of them.

Besides, is it not faide as well of the woman as of the man, that shee was created in the image of G O D, as we haue already heard? For Moses, after hee had saide that God created man in his image, addeth immediatly, In the image (I say) of God created he him, he created them male and female. And, as man is the image and glorie of God, so the woman is the glory of the man: neither can the one be without the other. For as the woman is of the man, so the man is by the woman, but all things are of God. Therefore the word of Building, which the Prophet vseth in setting downe the creation of the woman, is duly to be considered in this matter. For when he saith that God built the woman of Adams rib, this word importeth more then if hee had simply sayde, that he made and formed the woman. For thereby he would haue vs know the perfection of man, and of mankinde in the creation of the woman, because without her his building

So that man as it were the first foundation, vpon whom the woman was builded, as likewise by generation of children proceeding from them both, this building is not onely preserved and continued still, but also furthered and augmented. Vpon the like reason the word that signifieth a childe in the Hebrew tongue, is taken from a word that signifieth to build in the same language: as indeed childre also are the true building of a house. But before we enter into any larger discourse of this matter to know the generation and multiplication of mankind, I am of opinion that we shal doe wel to intreate first of the disposition of that matter, whereof we heard before his body was made, as also of the parts thereof. For generation respecteth chiefly the third kind of the naturall powers and faculties of man: whose vertue and properties we are not to consider of, before we have bene instructed in all things that concerne the particular composition of mans body and of every part thereof: to this ende, that wee might haue the true knowledge of that lodging which God hath giuen to man to dwell in vpon earth, and that step by step we might come to consider of the hoast or tenant of this tabernacle, namely, of the spirit and soule, which is truly man. Let vs then begin to take a view of the diuision of the chiefe parts of the body, and so handle first the simple or similiary parts, of which al the rest are compounded. This matter subiect I offer to thee A. R. A. M. for thy discourse.

Of the simple or similiary parts of the body, namely the bones, ligaments, gristles, sinewes, pannicles, cordes or filaments, veines, arteries, and flesh. Chap. 3.

A. R. A. M. If we take pleasure in beholding materiall frames builded with mens hands, especially if they be made by rare workemen, and such as excell in their Arte, and in viewing attentiuely the goodly works that are in them, we ought to bee a great deale more delighted without al comparifon, in looking vpon the stately edifices builded with the very hand of God, and vpon the exquisite and wonderful works wherewith he hath adorned & set them forth. Curiosity causeth many men to wander al their life time in landes and seas vnknowne, to feed their mindes with a vaine knowledge of the manners and customes of strangers: but very few will be found who haue a care to know themselves. In somuch that being able to discourse of the situation of diuers regions, and of the beauty of those places & fortresses that are therein, yet they know not their owne house wherein they alwaies dwell, and much lesse themselves, namely their soules, which are the inhabitants. But if wee thinke it a shame for a man to be ignorant of those things that belong, or bring commoditie or pleasure to the life of man, the ignorance of our selues, which hurteth this life and the other wee looke for, is a great deale more shamefull and dishonest. Now a man may easily perceiue how commendable, excellent and profitable the knowledge of the nature of our bodies, and of every part therof was iudged to be by men in ancient time, in that they had publike schools amongst the, in which every one might daily behold Anatomies: yea Anatomies were shewed to every one that would see them in the priuate houses of Philosophers and Philitions. And for this cause Galen saith, that the Auncients would not write of this science. But after when this diligence of the first louers thereof began to be despised and reiected of the most part of men, it was necessary that some should write thereof for their good, as also for the benefit of posteritie. Otherwise they would haue fallen within short space into a dangerous ignorance of their nature, and of the causes and remedies of such diseases as daily trouble them. But we must referre that knowledge, which in our discourses we seeke for out of this science, to another end. Neither do we vndertake to speake of that Art and Science that belongeth to Philitions, as though we made profession thereof, but onely to shew the true vse of it, and how it may be referred to the honour of God, and to the knowledge of his wisdom and providence, as also to the end, that in beholding the wonderfull composition and disposition of the members of our body, we should remeber the creator therof, who seeth whatsoever lyeth most secret & hidden therein, & who is able to make as it pleaseth him an Anatomy both of body & soule, and to send them both to euerlasting hell fire, when they will not acknowledge him to be the efficient and finall causes of their beeing. Having regard therefore to this end, we wil consider of the parts of mans body according to the subiect propounded vnto vs.

The

The true
end and vse of knowing
this booke.

The parts then of the body are diuided into two sorts or kinds: the first is, the simple or similary parts, the other the compound parts. The simple parts are of that nature, that euery portion of them, how great or little soeuer it be, retaineth alwaies the name that is giuen to the whole, whereof it is a part: and of these simple parts the other kinde is named, whereof we will intreat hereafter, because they are compounded parts, and obtaine the place of members, whose parts are not called by the name of the whole member, but euery part hath his speciall name. For all the parts of the head are not called by the name of the head, and so it is in the other members of the body. But if a bone be broken into many peeces, euery peece is still called a bone: and the like may bee said of the other simple parts, which are nine in number, namely, the bone, the ligament, the gristle, the sinew, the pannicle, the cord or filament, the veine, the artery and the flesh. Our speech therefore must be of these. No man is ignorant, that the foundation of euery building is as much a part thereof or rather more (although it appeare not) then any other part how sumptuous soeuer it be. For the rest are laid and planted vpon the foundation, neither can they long continue in their beauty, vnlesse that bee good and firme. Wee may say the like of the bones of a mans body: (which are made of the seede in generation, when the thickest part of it is hardened by heate, as stones are baked in the earth by great heate.) For they are not onely like to foundations and pillars, which sustaine the bodie and all the members thereof, but they are as it were pales and fences vnto it to containe all things that are within the building of the bodie, and to inuiron all the parts of it, as it were with walles and rampires. For this cause they are more earthly, drier, and colder then any other part of the body. And therefore the prouidence of God appeareth most wonderfull in this composition of the bones, seeing that of one selfe same peece of earth or clay hee maketh the bones so strong and hard in comparison of the ligaments, gristles, and other simple parts: so that in respect of these the other are for strength and hardnesse like to stones and mettals in comparison of the other part of the earth. Neither is the wisdom of God worthy of great admiration in this respect onely, but also because hee made not the bones all of one peece, nor yet of one fashion and forme. For minding to giue motion, not onely to man but also to all other liuing and sensible creatures, the bones were to bee diuided and distinguished into diuers peeces, to the end they should not hinder this motion, which is so necessarie for those creatures: the manner whereof wee may see in men armed at all points. For the harness must be made of diuers pieces, according to the ioynts of the members, that their moouing may haue no impediment. But because the bones being diuided and separated one from another, cannot be so coniointed or vnited together, that euery one should sustaine that charge which it hath to beare, therefore that they might serue more firly for motion to the creatures, God hath framed them in such wise, that they haue their ioynts in so good proportion and so aptly interserted one within another, as that the whole combination and vnitng of them altogether is maruailous exquisite and goodly to behold like to a worke made of many pieces, which all meete together in one body. For some of them are hollow like to a round box, that they may be coniointed with the other that are round in the ends, to the end they might be knit together more conueniently. To be short, they haue all their fashions proportionable one with another according to that manner of vnitng, which is most meete and conuenient for them. Now because this coniunction of ioynts cannot keepe it selfe at that stay if it haue no other band, therefore hath God placed their certaine ligaments, or strings of the bones which are white parts, without blood, void of sence, not hollow, proceeding from the bones, and differing from them in nature, although not so much as the gristles do. For the gristles (which serue also for a stay that is softer then the bones, to the end they should not rubbe together ouer hardly one within another) are more earthly, drier, and harder then the ligaments, and yet not so much as the bones: so that they are as it were of a middle substance and nature betweene the bones and the ligaments, which are also very earthly, drie, and hard, but lesse then the gristles and the bones, and more then the sinewes, which also in some sort draw neare to the nature of the ligaments. But they differ both in that they haue diuers originals, as also because the ligaments are altogether insensible, as the bones and gristles are, neither can they giue any motion or sence as the sinewes can, but serue onely for bands to tie the bones one to another, and to knit the other members vnto them. But the sinewes, which proceede either from the braine, or from the marrow of the backe bone whose originall is from the braine, are of a tender, soft, and white substance, and of that nature that they haue all sence, which they impare to all the sinewy parts of the body. And of them also some giue both sence and motion together. Therefore their substance is not so dry, nor so hard as that of the ligaments: neither yet is it so soft and tender as is the substance of the flesh, or of the kernels, or of the *skinner*s, and of such other like parts, whereof we will speake hereafter. As for the pannicles, and cords or filaments, which are little long threeds, slender and white, solid and stronge, we may comprehend them vnder the name of sinewes and ligaments, because they take part of both natures. For some of them haue sence with the sinewes, others haue none with the ligaments. The office of the pannicles (which are little skins made of sinewes and ligaments) is to defend and to knit together the members, and to impart to many of them sence, as to the liuer, the heart, the lungs, the spleene, and the kidneis. And as for the filaments, they serue the body, some to draw nourishment, others to retaine and keepe that which is meete to nourish the body, and some to driue forward and to cast forth those excrements and superfluities, which helpe not to nourish it, but are only a burthen and grieue vnto it. The veines are thinne and slender pipes carying the thicker blood wherewith the body is nourished, and they haue their beginning from the liuer. For in that the hollow veine is greater and larger then the rest, and out of that all the other veines extend themselues into all the bodie, as it were branches proceeding from the body of a tree. Herein (as we will do in all our discourses) we follow the common opinion approved of the late learned Philosophers, Physitions and Antomists. For Aristotle wrote that the heart was the original of the veines. But Hippocrates taught otherwise, whom Galen followed confuting Aristotles opinion. As for the Arteries or pulsties they are pipes that proceede from the heart. For in that is the great artery planted, which is the stocke of all the rest, which serue to carry the vitall spirits throughout the body: they are covered with little skins, that are strong and thicke to keepe the spirits from breathing out, and for the same cause they haue their passages more streight. So that they haue two skinner or coverings, whereof that which is vnderneath is sometimes thicker then the skin of a veine. To conclude, the Arteries and veines are ioyned together, to the end that the vital spirits might draw and receiue from the veines conuenient matter for their nourishment, as also that by their heat they might warme the blood that is within them. For there are certaine monthes in them both for this mutual communication, both that the spirit might draw his nourishment from the veines, as flame fetcheth the preservation of his light from the lampe, and also that the veines might receiue spirit and heat from the Arteries. As for the flesh it is a substance of blood, which is then made when the thickest part of it is as it were congeled: and with that all the members of the body are clothed outwardly. We must speake more largely of the vses and properties of all these simple parts, which wee haue heere laide open in few words. In the meane time in this little that hath bin discoursed, we see a maruailous prouidence of God, who hath disposed and tempered the matter of the body in such wise, that hee made it so apt to effect that worke which he purposed, and that by proportions and mixtures so well contrined from one degree to another, as hee hath done in the elements, to the end that all the parts of the body might the better be preserved one by another. And although mens bodies are compounded of earth and of the other elements, as we haue already touched, yet God sheweth himselfe very wonderfull in this whole worke and matter of man. For as he turneth the earth into diuers natures, so that of one peece hee maketh gold, of another siluer, of this bras, iron, and other mettalles, of that mineralles, of another pretious stones of sundry sorts which are as it were the bones of the earth, besides a great many other things of diuers kinds which were infinite to rehearse: so of one selfe same matter appointed for the composition of the body, he maketh variety of workes that it may be framed & furnished in all respects. For we see what difference there is betweene the bones, which parts are most earthy, & so consequently driest, hardest and coldest, because of al other parts they draw neere to the nature of earth.

Of the flesh.

The bones

parts.

Then the gristles obtaine the second degree next after the bones for agreement of nature, as that which is in the middest betweene the bones & the ligaments, as the ligaments are of a middle nature betweene the gristles and the filaments, and the filaments betweene the ligaments and the sinewes, and so of the rest. Therefore as God the great workemaster of nature hath framed all the parts of mans body of matter taken from all the elements, so also he hath tempered his matter according to the worke he meant to make, & to that office, which it pleased him to appoint vnto euery part and member of the body. So that matter of some parts holdeth more of the earth, of other partes it hath more water, aire, or fire, or else is more or lesse mingled of all together. Whereby it appeareth how aptly this worke master can apply himselfe vnto this worke. Wee haue also another notable testimony of his prouidence in that he hath made the ligaments so stronge and firme according to the necessity of their office, office, having ordained them to knit the bones in their ioynts, and to bee as it were bands and cords to tie and conioyne them together, euen as the thongs of harnesse keepe the parts thereof bound and tied one to another. We may say as much of the filaments, but chiefly of the sinewes, which in their places serue for bands to the body. And heere wee haue also to note, that because God hath created them to giue both motion and sence to the body, therefore hee hath planted thier roote partly in the braine, partly in the marrow of the backe-bone, which is also deriued from the braine: as the originall of the ligaments is either in the bones, or in the gristles, or in the skinne, and the beginning of the filaments both in the ligaments and in the sinewes, according to that vse for which they were made. And that the motion of liuing creatures might not bee hindred, hee hath not made the ligaments, nor the filaments nor the sinewes of any such boistrous or stiffe matter, but that the creatures may easily bend euery way whether soeuer they list to mooue and turne their members. Neither hath he made them of so tender and soft matter, but that they are strong and powerful enough to holde fast all the members within their ioynts, to the end they might not easily become bare and thrust out of their places, as also to furnish the creatures with strength and power, which consisteth principally in the force and might of these parts. It is requisite also that they should be such, because they are as it were in continuall labour, and sustaine great streesses. Wherefore they must needes bee of such matter as will not easily yeelde or weare away, or breake in pieces. And because all the members and all the ioynts are not to sustaine labours and brunts alike, therefore the Lord hath very well provided for that, as hee hath done the like also in the composition and distribution of the bones. For those members that must sustaine the heauiest burthens and greatest brunts, that are to dispatch most labour-some businesse, and therefore require the greater strength, haue biggest, strongest, and mightiest bones, ligaments, and sinewes, so that their bulke, bignesse, breadth, and thickenesse are answerable to their necessary vses. The lesser members and such as are to vndergoe lesse paine, which are ordained to effect more fine and witty workes wherein arte is more required then force, haue also their bones, ligaments and sinewes lesser and smaller, so that in certaine places there are some bones passing small, and sinewes, which are onely as it were little thredes. Thus much I thought meete for vs to vnderstand concerning the simple parts of the body, now we must consider the compound parts: and first intreate of the outermost partes, and so followe that which wee speake of the foundation of mans building, to the ende that by little and little we may set him vp right, and consider him thoroughly in all his partes. Therefore thy speech ACHITO B. shall be of the feete and legges, and of the armes and hands.

Of the compound partes of the body, and first of the feete and legges and of the armes and hands. Chap. 4.

ACHITO B. Among the manifolde and great commodities, which we may reape by the diligent consideration of the Anatomy of the body, there are two of greatest weight. The first is, to put vs in minde of our mortalitie in regarde of our bodies, to the ende that we should not please our selues too much in the beautie of them, and so waxe proude and abuse our selues, as also that we should remember all those testimonies, which we haue in the holy Scriptures of the frailtie of man, and of his whole nature. For when we see that those parts of the body that are hardest, strongest, most firme, and such as after the death of a man continue longest before they returne into powder, and into that first matter out of which they were taken, as namely those parts that were propounded vnto vs in the former discourse, especially the bones: I say, when wee see that these notwithstanding their hardnesse, must in the end returne to dust as well as the rest, what shall wee thinke of the other parts that are softer and more tender, and lesse able to resist corruption? Therefore the spirit of God doth so often by his worde call and send vs backe to that iustification, which hee giueth vs by the matter whereof hee made and framed our bodies, and by the consideration of our owne originall and birth: to the ende wee shoulde learne to containe our selues euermore within the compasse of all humilitie and modestie, as well towards him, as one towards another. Hereof it was that Isaiah had commaundement given him from the Lord to crie, that all flesh is grasse, and all the grace thereof as the flower of the field. Man that is borne of a woman (saith Iob) is of short continuance, and full of trouble. He shooteth forth as a flower, and is cut downe downe: hee vanissheth also as a shadow, and continueth not. Againe for the second point, wee are taught to consider and to know by that providence of God, which sheweth it selfe in the composition of the vilest and most earthly parts, and in that frame which hee maketh for the building of the whole body, how great and wonderfull it ought to be in the residue, namely in the noblest parts thereof, especially in the soule, if we could see it with our eyes, as we behold the body. Wherefore, that we may the better know the excellent worke of God in this building, we must raise it vp right before our eyes, to the end wee may behold it on the out-side (as it were a frame ready made) from the foote to the top, and from the foundation to the covering and highest part thereof.

Three parts of the legge

Of the armes and hands.

The whole body of man is commonly divided into foure principall outward parts, which are called compound, in respect of the simple parts spoken of before, which serue for matter to make them of: whereupon afterward they take the name of member, according to that forme that is giuen to each of them. These foure principall parts are, the head, the breast, the belly, the outward parts, namely, the armes, and hands, the legges, and feete. The head endeth where the necke beginneth. The brest comprehendeth that part which wee commonly call the breast, also the backe, the ribs, and whatsoeuer else is contained in them from the necke vnto the midriffe, which is a skinne that separateth the heart and the lungs on the one side, and the inferiour intrails on the other. The belly reacheth from thence where the breast endeth vnto the bone about the priuy members and neare to the groine. The extreame or outward parts are already named by vs; and of them our present discourse shall be, beginning, as it were at the foundation, vpon which all the body is laid. First therefore we see how God hath so aptly fashioned the feete, that they doe not onely beare vp all the rest of the body, but also carry and recarry it wheresoeuer a man will. Next, the legges are set vpon them as it were the pillars of this whole building, being closed in such sort vnto them as neede requireth, to helpe the feete to sustaine and beare vp all the rest of the frame laid vpon them. For this cause Salomon calleth them the strong men that stoop in old age, when their vertue and strength faileth them. For they bow through weaknesse, and tremble as the hands doe, which the same Prophet calleth the keepers of the house. Now because the chiefe strength of the body lieth in the bones, when the scriptures meane to set forth any violent grieve, as when a man is extremely pressed, and as it were altogether oppressed, they say that his bones are vexed, or broken, or out of ioynt, that is to say, all his strength and power, so that hee is as a body whose bones are wholly broken and shivered. And when the Scripture would signifie the contrary, it saith that, their bones runne full of marrow, and that they flourish like an earbe. Now if we take the whole legge, namely from the huckle bone vnto the endes of the toes, it hath three great parts answerable to the three parts of the whole arme, which part of the body reacheth from the shoulders vnto the endes of the fingers. In the first place is the foote, which is the nethermost part of the whole leg, and it consisteth of three parts which also are answerable to the three parts of the hand. The 1. is the heele, which by a ioynt and conuenient knitting together, vniteth the foote to that part of the leg which reacheth from thence vp to the knee or gartering place. The 2. is the sole, & as it were the backe of the foote, being long, large and hollow in the midst, to the end it might be more fit to stand fast & to walke vpon. The toes are the 3. part of the foote, being set and placed in such wise as is most conuenient for that duty of the foot. For they differ much from the fingers, not onely in length, but also in situation, because the office of the hand and the foote is not all one. Therefore as the fingers are longer than the toes, so the thumbs are otherwise placed then the great toes. For if the great toe were placed as the thumb is, it would hinder the foote in steade of helping it: and the like may be said of the other toes. The two other parts of the legges are, first, that which is from the knee to the foote, which is commonly called the legge for want of an other proper name in our tongue, next the thigh, which is from the huckle bone vnto the knee. And as this hath his ioynt and band to fasten him to the knee, so the other by the like meanes is ioynted to the foote. Therefore both the foote and the whole legge haue their necessary motions through the helpe of the Sinewes and Muscles, as well to stretch it selfe out, as to bowe and bend forward and backward, vponward and downeward, as also to turne it selfe on the right hand and on the left, and round about: both to set forward and to retire, to ascend and to descend, and for all the motions that are meete and conuenient both for this member and for all the parts of it. Thus much for the lowest foundation of the frame of mans body, and for the pillars that hold it vp. Now we must consider of the other outward parts, the armes and the hands. As God hath giuen to man two legges and two feete to hold him vp, and to carry him whithersoeuer whithersoever he would go, so he hath given him two armes and two hands, to dispatch all businesse which he thinketh good. Therefore the hand is rightly called by Aristotle, the instrument of instruments. For there is no member in all the body nor instrument whatsoever, that maketh more or more sundry workes. This instrument maketh all other instruments, and setteth them a worke, as we see by experience. And because man onely of all other living creatures is capable of Artes, and knoweth how to use them, therefore hath God given to him onely this instrument to exercise them. We see also that there is no worke which hee cannot do with his hands. And what worke of God is there which he doth not counterfeit, as if he were some little god upon earth, that had undertaken to make an other visible world within this world created by God? For if we consider the Sciences and Artes of men, & those excellent workes which they make by the meanes of their hands, who will not bee ravished with admiration? That sentence of Anaxagoras may well be approoved wherein he saith, that the hand is the cause of knowledge and wisdom: (although Plutarch doth learnedly understand experience, by the hand.) For if it did not frame letters and figures, nor made instruments requisite and necessary for all Sciences and Artes, they could not in any wise be either taught or learned. Therefore considering well that which we say, man may be called a second Creator, who taking patterne by the worke of God in the creation of the world hath endeavored to make workes answerable vnto those which God hath given him in the world for a patterne to imitate. But there is great difference betwixt the workes of man and the workes of God, especially in three points: namely, in the matter, in the forme, and in the life of them, together with all those things which it bringeth with it. For first man can not worke without matter, which he cannot finde in himselfe, as God who made all things of nothing, and made that to be which was not. But man dealeth contrarily. For he can make nothing of nothing, but must of necessity have matter meete for the worke he taketh in hand, vnto which he is able to adde the forme onely. And yet hee cannot giue it any fashion except he first had the patterne thereof in the workes of God. For although he can make very strange figures, and such as the very like hath not bene seene in all nature, nor amongst all the creatures, yet he cannot pourtraite any so new, or so strange, whereof hee had not before some resemblance in the workes of God in sundrie creatures. For hee taketh diuers pieces of many sundrie figures, with which afterward heaped together, hee counterfeiteth one altogether new and strange. As for example: neuer man sawe a mountaine all of gold, yet a man may imagine one in his minde, and frame an image thereof in his imagination. For albeit hee neuer saw such a mountaine, yet because hee hath seene both mountaines and also golde, by ioyning these two together which hee knoweth, hee can frame the image of such a mountaine in his minde, and then hauing in this sort formed and conceived it, hee can counterfeit it with his hand. But as God taketh not the matter of his workes without himselfe, and without the treasures of his infinite power, so hee needeth not to seeke else where for formes and patternes then in the treasures of his eternall wisdom and infinite knowledge. Againe, there is this besides, which is chiefest of all, that hee is able to giue, not onely being, but also life, sence, and motion to his workes, yea such nature and properties as pleaseth him: which man can not doe. For hee can not change the nature of that matter vpon which hee worketh, but it must still not continue the same in nature and disposition. And although hee can draw sundry effects from those matters about which he is occupied according as he may mingle and compound them together, neuertheless hee altereth not their nature, but they retaine it still according to their portion, every one in his place. Neither can hee giue to the best of his workes so much life as is in a reddish, or in any other lesser hearbe or plant: nor so much motion, sence, and industry as a Flie or an Ant hath, or the least worme in the earth. Now to proceede in beholding the use of the hand, wee must understand that God gaue vnto men armes and hands chiefly to helpe one another, more then with any other member of their body, in so much that they ought to referre all their workes, artes and exercises to common benefits and profite. But it is otherwise. For there is no member whatsoever with which they hurt one another more: so that their hands are more dangerous without all comparison, then the pawes of all sauage beasts. For those beasts that are most cruell spare the blood of their kinde, but men delight to imbrow their hands in mans blood, yea in the blood of their nearest kindred. There are some also who shamefully abuse their handes in causing them to serue for diuinations: from whence the Arte of Palmestrie proceeded, which is full of superstition, and of fooleries well worthy to be laughed at: and such are all the other kinds of diuinations inuented by the vanity of mans braine. They that would seeme to alleadge some shewe and likelihoode of foundation for it, say, that nature hath imprinted in the lines of the hands wonderful significations of the temperature & disposition of the whole body.

Therefore they call the long line in the midst of the hand, the line of life, and saie, that they who haue it whole throughout, are long liued. But suppose this were so, yet what probability is there for any to seeke in the lines of the hande for the knowledge and signification of all thinges that shall befall men, and to foretell them, as they say, their good and ill Fortune? For although it were so that by looking vpon the handes, a man might in some sort, iudge of the temperature and disposition of the body, yet what reason is there to extende this consideration to the foretelling of all thinges. as if God or nature, as they speake, had set markes in the handes, so that a man might knowe I say not by the Science, but by the vanitie of Chiromancy, whatsoeuer good or euill shall come vnto men? For they that deale with this kinde of diuination doe not onely foretell whereto the body may bee disposed according to the temperature thereof, as a Physitian may iudge of the sickenesse or soundnesse of the body by those tokens which hee seeth therein following his Arte, but they goe a great deale further. For they take vpon them to foretell all good and ill aduentures, namely, whether a man shall bee rich or poore, married or no, and whether he shall haue many wiues, and what they will bee, whether maydens or widowes, whether rich or poore, with such other toys and oldewiues tales, whereof their Bookes of Palmistry are full. They therefore are very fooles that giue credite to such predictions. But Christians haue a true and sure kinde of Chiromancy which they may vse. For if men consider onely their handes, with what workemanshippe they are made, for how many vses they may serue, and how profitable and necessarie they are for them, they shall finde in them an infinite number of markes to make them good diuiners, yea it wil teach them to diuine that of necessitie there was a God and Creatour, who was the workemaster that made that worke and so excellent instruments, whose vse and commoditie can not sufficiently bee conceiued. For although wee had neuer hearde of God or of his providence, this onely consideration ought to bee sufficient to teach vs to seeke him, and to holde vppeto wardes him those handes which hee hath giuen vs. If therefore by the contemplation of our handes, and by those markes of the power, wisdom, goodnesse and providence of God, which are imprinted in them, wee can learne such a Science and Arte and Diuination, as will the better induce vs to glorifie God in the Workemanshippe of our bodies, then doe wee profite greatly therein. And this wee ought to doe, not onely by the contemplation of our handes, but also of all the residue of the members and partes of our body euen vnto our very haire and nailes. For wee haue not so many Preachers onely of his glory and magnificence in our bodies, as wee haue members, but also as there are haire in the heade. For there is nothing, no not so much as a little haire (as wee shall see hereafter) whereby God doeth not testifie his diuine providence. VVherefore if we should by peece-meale lay open onely those principall things which are to bee considered in all the partes of the arme and hande, and those testimonies of the great providence of God that may bee found and noted in them, a whole day would not suffice: although we did onely behold the great workemanshippe that is, I say not in the whole hand, but in one finger thereof. For it is an instrument which God hath giuen onely to man, to touch and to take with, to gripe and to vse in his owne behalfe in steade of all kinde of defensiu weapons. In this respect he made it of such a fashion that he can lay holde of, and apprehende all things either greate or small, of what forme or figure soeuer they bee, whether round, square, or otherwise. And therefore it was requisite that the fingers of the hand should be vnequall, that they should be placed, and disposed as they are, thereby the better to gripe and to lay holde of all things. For albeit some of them belonger then others, yet when wee close our hand, and gripe any thing, they are all equall. And as God hath giuen to man a mind capable of vnderstanding & knowledge, so also hee hath adorned him with this excellent instrument, which is so necessary for al Arts, that without this, those other would remaine idle. In a word it is an instrument, which man could not wāt neither in peace nor war. Neither is there any thing to be found therein, which doth not serue very fitly for al duties of the hand, as also nothing is wanting that is necessary. The very nayles haue two excellent properties, the one is, that they serue for a couering and an ornament to the end of the fingers, the other, that they helpe to take hold of & to gather litle & hard things. For this cause also they are so coueniēt both for matter & form, & so fitly fastned & set in their places, as better could not be deuised. But let vs consider of the whole arme or hand, to see the composition and diuision thereof. As we said before of the legges, so there is in the whole arme three great and principall parts, taking all that member which is from the shoulders vnto the endes of the fingers. The first is the hand, which likewise hath three chiefe parts, namely, that which is ioyned with the lower part of the arme from the elbow vnto it selfe, and it is called the Wrist: the second is the hollow palme which is apt to gripe with, together with the backe of it on the other side: then the fingers make the third part, being so made and placed as they are fittest to take easily; to gripe, to close, and to crush. In somuch that whatsoever hath bene spoken by me worthy consideration in the legges and feete touching their office, and all those motions that are apt, and necessary for them, the same also may bee plainly seene in the whole hand and arme. The second principall part of the whole arme is that which is taken from the elbow vnto the hand: the third is from the shoulder vnto the elbow, and both the one and the other are so coupled together with their ioynts and bands, as is most requisite for all their motions. Thus ye see what in my opinion ought chiefly to be knowne in this our present matter. Now seeing wee haue begun to take a view of the foundation of the frame of man by the consideration of the fourth compounded part of the bodie, I thinke that before wee handle the other three, we shall doe well to behold the wonderfull composition of many bones, which serue also to sustaine the whole stocke of the body, and vpon which the backbone is chiefly grounded. Therefore thou A S E R intreating thereof, and of the ribbes and other bones of mans body shalt prepare the way for vs to proceede in the description of our building, euen vnto the top and highest place of the whole frame.

Of the Backbone and of the marrow thereof: of the ribbes and of other bones of mans body. Chap. 5.

A S E R. Those Philosophers that were indued with greatest knowledge of those excellent things that are hid in mans nature, stood much vpon the contemplation of this, that his face was lift vp towards heauen: whereupon they concluded, that hee ought to abandon all carking care of base & earthly things to contemplate those things that are aboue and heavenly, and in the knowledge of them to satisfie the desires of his soule. And truly this is worthy to be considered, that amongst terrestriall creatures which walke vpon the earth, God hath created none with two legges onely, or that is made straight and bolt vpright, but man. Therefore hee onely and no other hath the ridgebone made according to the straightnesse of the legges: which is neither in foure-footed beastes, nor in birds, albeit they goe vpon two feete, and haue their head lifted vpward. For as well their legges, as those of foure-footed beastes are so placed in regard of the backbone when they walke, as mens legges are when they sit downe, namely cornerwise, not downeright. But when men goe, their legs are stretched straight with the backbone, (which is like the keele of a shippe) vnto which all the bones belonging to the stocke of the body are conioyned, euery one being answerable each to other according to their proportion: as the other peeces of wood whereof a ship is made, are ioyned with the keele by that knitting together which they haue therewith. For this cause the whole bodie of man is straight, and can stand vpright, and sit downe. But no beast can doe either of them, because there is no such vprightnesse voide of corners betweene their backbone and their legges, as there is in man. Therefore they can neither holde nor doe any thing either standing or sitting. For although they can stay themselves vpon their haunches, yet they cannot sit altogether like to man. And contrariwise, man can do nothing well lying along or with his belly downward as beastes vse: but standing or sitting he can do all his affaires very easily. To this end hath GOD given him legges and feete, armes and hands, of which we spake before. Now as hitherto wee haue seene the lowest foundation of mans building, namely his feete and legges, so heere we must know that there is yet another wonderful frame of bones, as it were a new foundation for the whole stocke of the bodie, and residue thereof. Amongst others some are very strong, being placed crosswise to vphold the rest: they serue also for the defence of many inward parts that are against them. Vpon this second foundation the backbone is laid, which reaches vp to the head, & is very artificially made. For first, because a man cannot alwaies stand vpright, but must sometime bend himselfe, or lye downe, or turne from one side to another, it is not made all one bone, but it consisteth of many bones, namely of foure and twenty, which are called the knuckles or turning ioynts of the backebone. For this cause Salomon very fitly calleth it the filuer chaine or coarde, which lengtheneth, or shrinketh being consumed with extreame olde age. For it is framed after the fashion of a chaine, and holdeth the lower parts of the bodie, as it were tyed and chayned vnto the highest part, which is the head. Againe it is not without good cause called a chaine of filuer. For it is a very precious part of the body, and ought to be greatly accounted of, both because the body standeth in neede of it, and also for many great benefits which it receiveth ther by. True it is that some vnderstand by this chaine of filuer, the vnitng and agreement of matters whereof the bodie of man is made, being taken from all the Elements, and ioyned together by a goodly harmonie and proportion. But the former exposition seemeth to mee most fit, because of that similitude which the backebone and ioyntes of it with their vse, haue with a chaine and the vse thereof. For if the chaine-bone were all of one peece, a man should bee alwayes stiffelike to a pale, or like to a logge or bodie of a tree: and so the stocke of the bodie coulde not enioy these motions that are necessarie for it, as we see al the members haue agreeable to their nature. For they are not planted into the stocke of the body, as boughes and branches are into the stock of a tree, which are without motion aswell as their stocke. Likewise man (whome the Philosophers called a Tree turned vpwrd, because hee hath his rootes in his heade) is a farre other kinde of plant then those are, which being in the earth, stirre not out of one place. For it is a tree to bee carried about, whose branches haue their naturall motion. And as touching those bones whereof the chine-bone is made, they are so ordered, that the first which sullayned all the rest, as the principall foundation (being called Os sacrum, that is, The holie bone) is the largest, biggest, and strongest: and being ioyned to the hippe is verie artificially framed of three bones, and sometimes of fve or sixe. Wherefore some thinke that it is so called by reason of the artificiall composition thereof: others, because of the greatnesse: and some, because it helpeth women in their trauaile, as that whose knitting together openeth with the hippe bones in them that bring forth children. Others say, that there is no opening, but only that it stretcheth forth & enlargeth it selfe. There are some also that thinke it is so called, because it is so necessary vnto life, that after it is once hurt, death followeth. After this bone, the rest that follow are lesse & lesse vntill you come to the highest: in so much that the lowest are biggest, and the highest least, to the end that as they are the foundation one of another, so they might bee able to beare that charge which they are to sustaine, and be the lesse burdened. And as for the coniunction and vnitng of them together it is so well contriued, that it hath so much strength as is necessary for it, and is neither too soft, nor too hard, too drie nor too wet and slippery, but that which is meete for their motions.

This order of bones and turning ioynts thus raunged, is properly called the Backbone or Chine, and in Latine Spina dorsi, because of the sharp ends or points which each of them hath on every side for his defence, as it were thornes. This whole chine hath a marrow proceeding from the hinder part of the braine, and reaching downe to the nether ende of the backbone: which being round in shape, is as a riuer whose springe is in the braine, from whence it proceedeth as the great Artery doth out of the hearte, and the hollow veine out of the liuer, as we haue already declared, and many intreate thereof more at large in speaking of the inner parts of the body. Therefore as the great arterie is as it were the stocke of all the rest, being planted in the heart from whence it springeth, and the hollow veine whose fountaine is in the liuer, is as it were the stocke of the other veines: so the marrow of the chine is as it were the stocke and spring from whence all the sinewes issue, which afterward like to little riuers impart their fence and motion. And because the fountaine of this riuer is in the braine, therefore also the originall of sinewes is attributed thereunto; notwithstanding that all those sinewes which giue motion and fence to the parts that are vnder the heade except it be to the entrals and guttes proceede from the marrow of the chine. Hereby we may note once againe, that that place alleadged by mee out of Salomon where he calleth the back bone a filuer chaine, agreeth also very fitly with that which is here spoken. For seeing the sinewes distribute fence and motion to all the members of the body, as it hath beene already told vs, and haue their beginning from the braine and marrow of the chine, we may well say, that it is a chaine and coard of a great length, which extendeth it selfe very farre by reason of other chaines and strings proceeding from it. For as the backebone may be resembled to a chaine, so the marrow within it is like to a coard, wherof all the sinewes, which are as it were the

the little strings of al the members of the body, haue their beginning and increase. And therefore some in steade of a siluer chaine translate a coard or threede of siluer, as wee reade in the common Latine translation: but the sence is all one. And that which Salomon addeth after of the golden ewer which is broken in olde-age, with the exposition of the best learned giuen thereof, agreeth also very well to this effect. For by this golden Ewer they vnderstand the skinne that couereth the braine, which is of a yellowish colour, resembling the colour of golde it is very fitly called an Ewer, because it is a vessel containing the matter & nourishment of the sinewes, and as it were the fountaine of all the motions and sences of the body: it is as it were the lodging of all the animal parts, & the originall of all the sences both in ternall and externall. Wherefore the matter of the braine contained within it is of a more celestial nature then any other part of the body, and cometh nearest to the spiritual & diuine nature. So that this vessel is not without good & iust cause called by Salomō the Ewer of gold. For there is in it a fountaine out of which man receiueth great treasures. Now because the sinewes, arteries and veynes were to haue their passage and issue from their fountaine without let or hinderance, it was requisite that the backebone should haue such holes as it hath, & that the bonethereof should be of that fashion as they are, to the end that neyther themselves, nor the marrow within might be easily broken, & that the next parts & members might not be hurt. For it is very dangerous to haue any rupture or hurt in the chine aswell by reason of the marrow as of the sinewes. And because it pleased God to lodge therethose internal members of the body, that are most necessary for life & for the preseruacion thereof, hee fastened the ribbes to both sides of the backe bone, namely twelue on euery side: and haue left a sufficient space betwixt them, that the place might be able to receiue those members, for whose cause they were so built and disposed. So that there are before & behinde, especially about the noblest members, very long and large bones, to defend them on al sides (as it were good harnesses and strong bulwarkes) but chiefly behinde, because the armes and handes, cannot so well defend them, as they may the other before. Therefore God hath better armed them with bones, making those of the shoulders so large behinde as they are, and knitting them also vnto the backe bone by their bande, but yet so that they touch it not. Likewise they are fastened to the highest bone in the brest which reacheth vp to the throate, above the first ribbe, by two little bones which passe ouer the ribbes that are betwixt them. For this cause these bones are called the keyes of the throat. For they close and shutte vp these partes as it were keyes, so that without them the shoulder blades would fall backward, being no more able to keepe close together, then the poldron of an harness not being fastened to the gorget. The armes likewise are fastened to the sholders, as also the thighes & legges to the hippes then the hands are ioyned to the armes with their ioyntes and bands, as hath beene touched before. Now wee are to note further, according to that I spake euen now, that the backebone is in a mans bodie, as the keele in a shippe: so that as the rest of the matter and forme of the shippe must bee well proportioned and framed according to the keele, so is it in the composition of mans body, and in that correspondency, which all the members ought to haue with the ridgebone of which they all depende, otherwise there would bee no good agreement but great deformitie. And as for the ribbes and brest bones, they haue such workmanship as is requisite for the members contained within the ribbes. For seeing the members of mans breathing are clothed within, needfull it is that they should not onely bee defended and armed with bones for their garde & preseruacion, but also that these bones should be so placed, that they might inlarge and restrain themselves, open and close againe, in such wise that the breathing and members thereof be not hindred in the motions. Therefore they are all by nature lesse hard then the other: besides they are many, to the end there might be spaces betwixt them, not onely for the inlarging and restraining of the brest, but also that the Muscles might bee placed betweene the ribbes. And this is one cause, why it was needefull that the backebone should bee framed as it is, namely that it might bee more commodious for respiration. And because the stomacke also standeth in neede of inlargement and restraint according to the quantitie of the meate which it receiueth, and according, as it is lift vp and pressed downe thereby, therefore it was requisite that it should haue the like helpe. But forasmuch as it might soone bee hurt by reason of the hardnesse of the ribbes, if they were driuen and forced against it, God hath so disposed those ribbes wherewith he hath defended the stomacke, that they are neither so long nor so hard as the rest. For they are of a softer kind of bone, drawing neerer to the nature of gristles then the other, & the more they descend downward, the shorter they are. Therefore the lower part of the ribs are commonly called the false ribbes, or bastard ribbes, which on each side are five in number: the other seven ending at the breastbone, to the end they may defend and guard the heart and lungs, which are vitall parts. Hereupon when any hath beene wounded to death, it is often said in the holy scripture, that he was stricken vnder the fift ribbe, because no blow pierceth those parts, but it hurteth some one of the vital members which cannot be wounded, but that death followeth thereupon. Wee see then how the providence of God did well foresee whatsoever was requisite in this worke of mans body, and hath provided thereafter as need required: as wee may easily iudge by that which we haue heard of the bones only, which parts are most earthy and massy, and are void of all sence. Wherefore we may well conceiue how excellently this wisdom hath wrought in the other parts and members that are more noble. But wee may iudge a great deale better of all this, if we consider that our treatise of the bones onely, is but very little in comparison of that which might be spoken, if a man would vtter it as Philosophitions doe, and distinguish properly of all the kindes of bones, and of their vses. Now to end the outward composition of the body touching the bones, wee must consider of the share bone, and of the bones of the head, and of the marrow that is within the bones, and of the vse of the necke. Last of all, we will cloathe with flesh this dry Anatomy, that afterward wee may come to those parts of our building that are most noble and excellent. Therefore it belongeth to thee A M A N A to intreat of this subiect.

Of the share bone and marrow of the bones in the head, and of the flesh: of the musculus and of their office. Cap. 6.

Psal. 139. 14.

A M A N A. Nothing maketh the worke of God in the composition of mans bodie more wonderfull, then the beautie of his shape, and the exquisite art vsed in the worke wherein a man cannot change so much as a naile or an eyelide, which is but haire, but that some imperfection must beacknowledged therein, and some discommoditie following therevpon will cause it to be perceived. For this cause the kingly Prophet considering his creation speaketh as one rauished with admiration. I will (saith hee) prayse thee, for I am fearfully and wonderfully made: marueilous are thy workes, and my soule knoweth it well. Hee could not in all that Psalme maruaile sufficiently at so excellent a worke of God. Therefore he vseth a word which signifieth as much in the Hebrew tongue, as if in stead of our speech thou hast framed or fashioned mee, he should haue saide, I haue beene woven or wrought in tisse and interlaced and fashioned artificially as it were in broadery worke. And truly no image or picture, how well soeuer it be painted & purtrayed, is to be compared with the forme and figure of mans body: neyther is there any worke of tapistrie, so wel wrought and imbrodered, or that hath such varietie of exquisite arte, and such diuersitie of figures, as that hath. And from what paterns doe Painters and Ingrauers take the fashion and forme of these Images and pictures which they would draw forth, but from this? What is a peice of tapistrie or imbrodered worke in comparison of mans body, which is as it were an image of the whole world, and wherein a man may finde almost the variety and draughts of all things contained in the whole frame of the world? This will euidently appeare vnto vs in the sequele of our speeches, touching the compounded parts of the body.

Why the belly is not enuironed
with bones.

Of the Share
bone, or taile

Of the buttocke

Of the marrow.
Iob. 21. 24.

Therefore to finish the externall composition of this humane building concerning the bones, wee will first note, that God in creating the bellie hath not compassed it about with bones, as he hath done the other parts of the body, and that chiefly for two causes. First, it is most meete it should be so, by reason of the meat it receiueth. Secondly, for the benefit of women that beare children. But to the end it might be vpholden together with that burthen it beareth, God hath giuen vnto it the share bone for a foundation, which also standeth in stead of a bulwarke for the bowels. And because a man cannot alwayes stand vpright, but must oftentimes sitte downe, not onely to rest himselfe, but also to dispatch many workes which he hath to doe, therefore he hath the buttocke bones and the flesh wherewith they are covered, which are vnto him in stead of a stoole & a cushion to sit at his ease. And forasmuch as the bones are to bee nourished, they haue for their familiar foode, the marrow, which by nature is moist, soft, fatte and sweet. Therefore it hath neither sinew nor sence, but is within the bones, as the sap of trees is in the midst of their stockes & branches. For this cause Iob speaking of the prosperity of the wicked, saith, His breasts are full of milke, and his bones runne full of marrow. But this is strange, that seeing it is made of the thickest of the blood, as it were a superfluity superfluitie of the meate, how it can bee ingendred within the bones, and drawe nourishment from the veines, as other parts of the bodie doe. But God knewe well how to provide for that, and to make way for nourishment through the hardnesse of the bones, which are not all alike full of marrow. For as some of them are more drie or moyster, more hard or softer then others, so they haue more or lesse marrow: and some haue none at al, because they neede it not. Now this marrow whereof wee speake now, differeth from that in the chine bone, which the Arabians call Nucha, and is of the nature of the substance of the braine, from whence it proceedeth as a riuer from his fountaine, for the generation of sinewes, to which ende the other marrow is not appointed of God, but onely for the nourishment and preservation of the bones. Seeing then wee are come to the braine, wee must consider with what bones God hath inclosed it on euery side for the defence thereof how many in al there are in the head both before and behind, on the right side and on the left, aboue and beneath: of what forme, breadth, lengeh, and hardnesse, and how they are ioyned one with another by seames and bandes, and that not without great reason and consideration of the Worke master, which made such an excellent peece of worke. For first there are commonly sixe bones, which compasse the braine on each side, besides that which is called the Wedge like bone, which is vnder the pallat of the mouth, and vnto which all the rest are fastened. And because there are many vesselles and members in the braine and head, God hath made the head of a round figure, reaching somewhat in length, & bulking out somewhat more both before and behinde. Now forasmuch as vapours, fumes, and smokie excrements mount vpward, therefore hee hath created the heade, and those bones of the heade that are highest not so solide and thicke as the rest, to the ende the vapours and fumes should not continue inclosed within the braine, but might evaporate, and so disburthen the braine, otherwise it would bee very ill at ease, and subiect to many diseases. Therefore all of them together are so made one bone, that yet they are not al of one & the same peece, but ioyned together, not by ligaments, as many sundry and seuerall bones are, but by such a proper and apt coniunction, that there appeareth betweene them as it it were a seame made after the manner of a Sawe or Combe, as if they were very finely sewed together. And because the bones behinde could not haue that helpe of the handes, for their defence which the bones before may haue, God hath created them more hard and stronger. Besides, they all are to the braine and to euery part thereof, in steade of an helmet and murion to defende it on euery side. Thus you see the composition of the head touching the bones thereof, which is so ioyned to the body by the bockaone, that nothing but the neck, which is the vpper end of the chine, is between them. For it was necessarily to haue motion both aboue and beneath, before and behind, and on both sides: which could not haue beene if it had beene fastened to the shoulders without any space betweene, which is necessary also both for breathing for voice, and for many other purposes that may bee noted hereafter. And albeit the necke serued for nothing els but for voice, yet it is so necessary, that without it a man could haue no voyce, nor any other creature to which it is giuen, as appeareth in those that haue no necke. For all beastes that want the necke, want also the voyce, as wee may see both in fishes, and in those beasts which the Latins call Insecta animalia: the reason is because they haue no necke whereby to ioyne their head with the rest of their body, but onely as it were a little threede, which holdeth both the one and the other close together. Nowe that wee are to come to the toppe of the building of mans body, and haue set him vp right, as it were a dried Anatomie, wee must come next to the couering of the bones, sinewes and other parts mentioned by vs, to the end that after wee haue finished the description of the outwarde partes, wee may speake also of those that are within. The flesh then is the first garment wherewith the bones are couered: and it is properly called by that name which is giuen to that part whereof the Muscles are compounded. For some vnder the name of Flesh comprehend the Kernelles and the fatte because of the agreement which these partes haue one with another, and by reason of their vse. For as for the flesh, it hath this in common with the Kernelles and fatte, that it is soft and tender: but heerein it differeth from that matter whereof Kernelles are made, in that the matter of Kernelles is more Sponge like. Wee learned before that Flesh is a substance of blood, and howe it is made thereof. Concerning the Muscles, wee vse to call by that name the proper instrument that mooueth voluntarily all the members of the body. Therefore it is compounded and made of threedes proceeding from the Sinewes, and of Ligaments, compassed about with a great deale of flesh, insomuch that when the Muscles are taken away from the bodie, there remaineth almost nothing but bare bones.

proper place is in all places of the bodie where there are ioynts and where motion is required.

What voluntary motion is,

A comparison betwixt the body and a chariot.

The differences of flesh.

Diuerser uses of the flesh.

For without them the body cannot haue that voluntary motion whereof I spake euen now, and which is so called, because thereby a man may mooue and remooue his members from one place to another as he thinketh good, and as he shall iudge it needfull for himselfe. Wherfore we must know that the brayn which is the seat of the animal parts, & the original of all the sinews, and of all motions and sences giuen to the body by them, is in respect of the whole body like to a Waggoner that guideth his Waggon, and the Muscles are like to the bittes and bridles of horses, to cause them to retyre or let forward as the Waggoner pleaseth either to draw them backward, or to driue them forward, to pulin or to let loose the bridle. The sinewes are as it were the reynes and leathers fastened to the bridles, to holde them in, or to let them loose, and to turne them both on the right hand and on the left, then those members of the body which mooue it from one place to another, are as it were the horses that are ledde and guided by this meanes, and the rest of the body is like to the Charet and the burden which it caryeth. And for this cause the Muscles are compounded of ligaments, Sinewes and flesh. For as the Ligaments serue to knit them together, and the sinewes minister sence and motion, so the flesh serueth to the benefit of those little strings that proceede from the Ligaments and Sinewes: first to nourish them, then to hold them vp softly, as if they leaned vpon little cushions and pillowes, and lastly, to keepe them aswell against the vehemency of internall heat as against the heat, cold, and hardnes that comes from without. Likewise the flesh performeth all these things vnto the rest of the threedes that are through out the whole body, both in the heart and in the stomacke, and in other parts that haue flesh. But wee haue further to note the great differences of flesh that are in all the parts of the body, that we may still increase in the knowledge of the marvellous works of GOD, and of his diuine providence. For there is great difference between that flesh wherewith the bones ligaments and sinewes are couered and clothed, and that of the internall parts of the bodie which also differeth in qualitie, albeit all is compounded of one and the same matter. For what difference is there betwixt that flesh which is betweene the skinne and the bones, and that of the braine: as also that of the lungs, heart, liuer, spleene and kidneys? Not one of all these members hath his flesh like to any of the rest, but they all differ very much according to the nature and office of the compounded members. For the flesh of the braine is by nature apt for the generation of the animal spirits, as that of the heart for the vitall spirits, and that of the lungs for ayre and breathing, that of the liuer to turne the matter which it receiue from the stomacke into blood and into nourishment for all the members: that of the spleene to drawe the grosse blood which is as it were the Lees of the blood, and to nourish it selfe thereby: that of the kidneys also to draw so much blood as is requisite for their nourishment, and likewise to draw the vrine, which after they send into the bladder. Thus you see how euery of these internall parts of the body is compounded of flesh meete for his nature and office. Wherby we see many and sundry shops within mans body, wherof euery one hath his proper worke about which it is busied, and such a nature as is agreeable to that work which GOD hath assigned vnto it, who is the Creator and the workmaster, and effecteth all these works by his heauenly providence.

Moreouer, we haue to note that the flesh generally serueth the whole bodie for matter of filling, to keepe close all the members thereof, and namely all the bowels, and to fill all the spaces betweene them, as also to strengthen all those parts that are inuironed therewith, to the end they might not easily be shaken in pieces. It defendeth also all the members both against heate and cold. Likewise if any man fall, or lie downe, it serueth him for a boulder or soft pillow, and for a shelter against bruses, and a defence against wounds, for a shadow against heate, and a gowne against colde. And thus much I thinke sufficient to bee knowne concerning this present subiect. Now before we take any other matter in hand, wee are to consider of the Kernels that are in the body, because of their excellent vse and propertie, especially we are to consider of the Dugges, wherein appeareth a singular worke of God, namely, in Women, as we may presentlie heare of ARAM.

Of the kernels in the bodie, and of their sundrie vses especially of the breasts of women, of their beautie and profit in nourishing of children, and of the generation of milke. Chap. 7.

ARAM. Hee that should onely stay in considering the lumpe and confused matter whereof man is daily made, hee should see therein but a little slime, yea such vile corruption and rottenesse, that a man would be even ashamed to name it. But as a painter with his colours and draughts of his pensil, giueth a forme to that matter whereof hee maketh his peece of worke, and painteth limme after limme, and peece after peece: so the Lord giueth by little and little and by peece-meale to that confused masse and lumpe, such forme and fashion as it pleaseth him to bestow vpon it in that time which he hath appointed for that purpose: and, as he vseth to doe, beginning alwaies at the least and weakest part, and at that which is as it were nothing, hee still continueth and encreaseh his worke vntill it be perfect and absolute.

Likewise after we haue considered of the least and most earthy partes that are in the corruptible matter of the body, we will looke into them that are more excellent, and then come to the contemplation of that immortall essence, which dwelleth in him. Therefore I will now goe one with our matter Subiect.

Those parts of the body that are called Kernels (by reason of the similitude they haue with nuttes) are of two sorts, and haue their vse and commodity very great, especially in two respects. For some are by nature more thick and drie, and serue to fasten the vpper partition of the members and vessels of the body, to the end they should neither breake or cleaue. Therefore we haue such Kernels in the necke, in the arme pits, in the groynes, and in those parts where the elbow and the hamme bende, and in certaine other parts. There are others not so thick by nature, and more spongie and moist, and full either of milke, or of seede, or else of a flagmatike and gluish humor. Now albeit all kinds of Kernels are giuen to the bodie to drinke vp the humors, and to moisten the other parts, neuertheless those that are of this latter kinde, serue chiefly for the first vse. Wee haue such also to moisten all the parts of the mouth, and of the throate by the meanes of spittle, that so they may be kept from drought, and that thirst may bee repelled and moderated. Likewise they are very seruiceable to the life of man, in that they soake and drinke vp, as it were sponges, the fleame that descendeth from the braine, that it should not fall vpon the lungs, or into the stomacke, or vpon other parts of the bodie, to the great damage and danger therof, as it happeneth to such as are short breathed and in consumptions, and to them that are troubled with rhumes. And as these serue in the mouth and throate for spittle, so there are many, and those very great ones in womens pappes, especially when they haue milke to the making whereof they serue; as also those that are in more secret parts which serue for seedes, namely to keepe it, to dresse it, and to prepare it for generation. Therefore it is that those kernels which are in the breasts of men and of yong maidens are lesse and harder. We ought not heere to passe ouer without great admiration, the good temperature and disposition, which GOD hath made of the whole matter and forme, and of all the parts and members of mans bodie, insomuch that there is nothing how little or vile soeuer, which is superfluous, which is not very commodious and profitable, and which is not wonderfully well applyed and appropriated to such places as are most fit for it, and to those vses whereunto it ought to serue. For who would haue thought that these kernels thus dispersed throughout the body, were so many waies seruiceable vnto it as we see they are? Yea we might here rehearse many moe vses if wee would speake more particularly of this matter, whereof we meane to speake but generally, as also of all the rest that concerne the anatomic of the body, according to that end which we propounded to our selues in the entrie of our speeches, namely, to open a gappe onely to the consideration, first of the matter whereof mans body is compounded, and of the diuersitie thereof: then of that forme which God hath giuen vnto it: and lastly of the profit and vse of both: to the end we might daily learne the better to know the great power, skill, wisdom, goodness and providence of him that hath created and disposed all things in so good order. But as touching that which we spake of the pappes, and of their substance, we haue yet to consider of two points well worthy the noting, concerning the place where God hath seated them

ration, & ve-

them. First, they are there placed where they serue to shroude and to defend the noblest and most necessarie parts for life that are in the breast, namely the heart and the lungs. For they are set before them to countergard and keepe them, both from ouer great heate, and from excessive colde, and from many other inconueniences. And as they serue for heate of the heart, so their owne heate is increased by reason they are so neere the heart, whereby the milke that is ingendred in them is the better baked. So that wee see, that although GOD hath not giuen men pappes for the generation of milke and nourishing of children, as women haue, neuertheless they are not without profit, and vse of them, as we haue hearde. Whereunto also wee may adde the beautifying of that part of the bodie where they are placed, especially in women Againe, could they possibly bee set in any place, that were more fitte and more easie, both for Mothers and Nurces, and for the children to whome they giue sucke and nourishment? For if the mother be disposed to giue her childe sucke, she hath this commoditie to sitte downe if shee will, to holde it in her bosome, and vpon her knees, and likewise to imbrace it in her armes, whether she sitte, lye downe, or stande: also she may carrie it vp and downe whether shee please, euen whilest shee giueth it sucke, and feedeth it. This commoditie is not graunted to the females of beastes when they giue sucke and nourish their little ones with their teates. Wherein wee haue to marke one notable difference which GOD hath put betweene men and beastes. For beastes haue no other care of their yong ones, but onely to nourish their bodies with foode vntill they be able to feede and gouerne themselves: afterward, both syre and damme and little ones forget one another, taking no more knowledge each of other, nor louing one another more then other beastes of their kinde. But amongst men, both the father and the mother are carried with an affection towards their little children, which is the cause why they forget them not as beastes doe. And as they loue their children, so are they loued of them, insomuch that there is a mutuall loue proceeding from that naturall affection which they beare one towards another. On the other side, this loue causeth parents to let their children haue instruction, that they may bee wise and vertuous. And therefore it is not without good cause that womens pappes are placed in the breast, namely, to to the end they should be vnto them as signes and testimonies of the affection of the heart, and of that loue which they ought to beare towards their children, whereof they ought to make them partakers as well as of the milke of their breasts, and as if they gaue vnto them their heart, as they gaue them their blood turned into milke. Likewise, children are by the selfe-same meanes to be admonished of that mutuall affection and loue, which they ought to carrie towards their mothers, as if they had sucked it out of their breasts, and from their heart together with their milke, that they may returne the like vnto them againe. Wherefore, mothers and children haue a wise mistres in nature, and in the providence of God that appeareth therein, if they knew how to follow it well. Againe, for this cause mothers ought to take greater delight in nourishing their owne children, then in committing them into the hands of strangers and hired Nurces. For out of doubt, the mutuall affection and loue of each to other would greatly increase thereby. Now having spoken of the place which God hath assigned to the pappes, let vs consider his providence in their forme, which is such, that fayrer and more fitte for that office of theirs could not bee deuised. For wee see how they hang there in the breast of the mother and Nurse, as it were two bottles, hauing nipples and holes made fit for the infants mouth, that he might take holde of them, and draw and sucke the milke that is within the dugges, which are filled presently after the childe is borne, so that hee is no sooner come into the worlde, but hee hath such foode and nourishment readie drest as is meete for him.

Of the forme
of the pappes

For albeit the infant bringeth his teeth with him from his mothers wombe, yet because they are hidde within the gummes, and are not yet come forth, hee must haue such meate as needeth no chewing, but may be sucked, which GOD hath provided for him. Wherein we haue a wonderfull testimony of the care hee hath ouer vs, and what kinde of Father and cherisher he is. For this cause David had good reason to say, Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings hast thou ordained strength, because of thine enemies. For if one consider the providence of Psalme. 8. 2.

GOD, which daily sheweth it selfe ouer children onely, there is no Atheist, Epicure, or other enemy of GOD so great, which shall not be confounded, conuincd, and constrained, will be nill hee, to giue glory to God. For before children can speake, euen from their mothers breasts, they shew forth and preach the providence of GOD in providing milke for them. But wee shall finde it a matter of greater admiration, if wee consider not onely what manner they are nourished in their mothers wombe. For there they are not

Sustained by the mouth, not with milke, as they are after byrth, but with their mothers own blood received by the Nauill, which is in the middest of the body. But G O D hath made such an agreement betwene the wombe in which the little Childe is nourished in his mothers belly, & betwixt her breastes, that that blood wherewith the Infant was fedde before it was borne, presently after the birth ascendeth into her pappes, in which, by reason of the aboade it maketh there, it becommeth white, and is so well heated and prepared that it hath as conuenient and pleasant a tast, as can bee put into the infants mouth. And as for the substance of the milke, there cannot bee any that is more fit to nourish it or more naturall, seeing it is the accustomed and vsuall sustenance: neither is there any difference, but onely in that it is otherwise coloured, being somewhat changed in taste and saour, as also in this, that the infant receiueth it by another passage then it did before. Wherefore it is needefull that it should haue a conuenient and pleasant tast for the mouth that receiueth it: as also it is very requisite that it should be of that colour which it receiueth in the pappes. For it would be strange to see the infant draw blood from his mothers breast, to haue his throate ful of it, and his mouth bloody. All these things shew well that the Prophets had good cause to saye, that the mothers of little infants preach the prayes of Gods prouidence, and confound his enemies. For when that foode which God giueth to nourish them in their mothers wombe can feede them no more there, it hath pipes whereby to retire to that place in which it may performe the same duty, and that so fitly, that if that blood which is turned into milke did descend, as it ascendeth by veines which passe from the wombe to the breastes, the prouidence of G O D would not so manifestly appeare as it doth.

And therefore we see by experience, that so long as the childe is nourished in his mothers wombe, there is no milke in the breastes, but after it is borne, the blood that ranne euen vnto the wombe, ascendeth vpward by the veynes, making a good long iourney before it come to the breastes. For these veynes reach vp hard to the throat on euery side, in so much that the blood which they carry to the paps ascendeth aboue the breastes, and then descendeth into them: to this end, that through the length of time wherein it abideth in the veynes, it might haue more leasure to be the better wrought, and to be turned into milke, & into that white colour which it receiueth. And the milke is to be made the whiter, not onely through the aboade which it maketh in the breastes, but also by the meanes of that kernelly flesh whereof they are compounded. For it is of a whitish colour, that it might giue the same colour to the milke, whereof the pappes are the vessels. So that here wee may the better know (as wee touched before) why G O D by his prouidence made the breastes of that matter and colour whereof they consist. Nowe wee haue further to note another point wherein God hath very well provided for the comfort of women, as it were a recompence for the paines and trauaile which they haue both in the bearing and bringing vp of their children, namely, that whilest a woman is with childe, and giueth sucke to her infant, shee hath not her monethly and vsuall purgations, because her superfluous blood, and that which at other times is an excrement and must be voyded, is not then any longer a superfluous excrement, (if she be not otherwise euill affected in body by sicknesse) but is turned into the foode of the childe, whether shee beareth it in her belly, or giueth it sucke with her breastes. Wherin we see a maruillous worke of God. For it is all one as if he turned poyson or venim into good meate and nourishment yea into most dainty foode, for the vse of such a delicate mouth and tender nature as an infant hath that is newly borne. Further also wee will note heare, that so long as the infant is in his mothers belly, it is nourished more like to a plant, then to those liuing creatures which receiue their foode by their throate. And yet after he is borne, hee knoweth well wherefore his mouth serueth before euer he vsed it, without any other Master or Mistresse to teach him this skill then the prouidence of God, which sheweth it selfe also in other creatures in the like case, but not in such euident and excellent manner. We may say the like of the breath which the infant receiueth not in his mothers wombe by his mouth, no more then the meate wherewith he is fedde, nor yet by the nosethriles, which are more specially giuen to the body for that purpose, but by the nauill which is appointed to be the pipe to conuey both vnto him before he be borne. But the discourse of this matter wil fall out more fitly heerafter to be handled at large, when wee shall speake of the naturall and internall powers of the soule. Wherefore it is time to finish the couering of our building & so make an end of the speeches of this dayes worke. Therefore it belongeth to thee A C I T O B, to couer it with skinne and haire, vlesse you thinke good first to tell vs something of the fatte that is founde within the skinne.

Of the fatte and skinner of mans body and of their vse, of the haire thereof. Chap. 8.

A CITO B. Hitherto our intent hath beene, after speech had of mans creation, first to erect vp his tabernacle, as it were a drie Anatomy, which is a body consisting onely of bones. After we cloathed it with sinewes, muscles, ligaments flesh, & kernelles, which

For in this deifice of mans body, the bones occupy the place of stone, which must afterward be committed to the Mason to cause them to keepe close together, every one in his place. But yet we haue to white it ouer, which is the last couering, to make it fairer, better polished, and more perfect. For if we consider it onely as hitherto it hath bin set out vnto vs, we shall see it but as it were a frame not polished, nor made perfect without: or as it were a body without a skinne, which is not very pleasant to sight. Therefore we will now put on the last garment, which couereth all the rest, namely the skinne: but first a word of the fat which being within, is of great force to preserue and keepe it.

I will not stay heere to declare how and by what meanes the fatte, as also the kernels and paps are made of the blood, because our principall scope is to shew the providence of God in the vse of all the parts of the body, leauing to the Philitions that which appertaineth to their office, touching the intire and perfect knowledge of the Anatomy of the body. Seeing then we are to speake of the fatte that is found in the body, it serueth for the defence and preseruatiō of those parts that are couered therewith, not onely against heate & colde, and other things that come from without, which might indammage those parts, but also to keepe in naturall heate the longer, by whose vertue concoction of meate (commonly called digestion) is made in the body. Likewise it is very profitable for those parts that are in greatest and most vsuall motion, to supple and annoint them, as well to make them more nimble and readie to mooue, as to preserue them from drying, and so consequentlie from bruizing and wasting. There is also in many places a certaine humour which serueth to annoint the ioynts and their ligaments, and the smal ends of the gristles. For moisure helpeth motion very much, and preserueth those parts that are mooued, as we see by experience in chariot wheels. For when the axaltrees are greazed, about which they moue, they do not only turne about more easily, but also last and continue longer: whereas although they were all of yron, yet they would weare away and be set on fire of themselves, if they were not annointed and moistened with some humour. Now let vs come to consider of the couering of mans body. As therefore a man vseth not one onely garment, but diuers, so is it with the body. For first hee is cloathed with three skinner, that are great, long and large, with which hee is covered cleane ouer from the sole of the foote to the toppe of the head. The first is a little skinne very thinne, which of it selfe hath no feeling, beeing made of the second skinne which it couereth: and this second skinne is made of sinewes, flesh and little veines, and in some places of little arteries, being as it were of a middle nature betweene the sinewes and the flesh. Therefore this skin hath feeling throughout, and is not without blood as the first is. There is also a third skinne vnder the second, which is more fleshy, and therefore it is thicker and more strong, vnto which the Muscles cleaue, and through which very thinne arteries and productions of sinewes passe, which tie it with the otherskinne. The fat of the body is betweene these two skinner, which serueth the whole body not onely for a couering, but also for an ornament, especially those that are most without, which in mens bodies stand in stead of that skinne wherewith the bodies of beastes are covered. Besides these three skinner that couer all the body, there are within, many other particular skins of diuers sorts, to cover the members that are there, which the Philitions call Membranes and Tunicles, with such other names agreeable to their Arte, to distinguish them one from another according to each of their offices. For there are many in the head to cover, fold vp, and to containe the inward parts thereof and of the braine: as also in the breast, and consequently in other parts & members within. Among the rest some are like to nettes and coiffes, others resemble little sackes or bands, according as those members are which they are to cover, seruing also for the defence vnto them, and to distinguish and separate the parts one from another. We will leaue to the Philition to number and to distinguish them, and to name euery one by their proper name: and nowe come to consider the last couering which is vpon the body in certaine places, places, especially vpon the head, and that is the haire, which principally aboundeth in the head both in men and women, because it proceedeth out of a moyst and soft place. And to the ende it might take the better roote there, the skinne that is vnderneath it, is very thicke and fleshy. The profite of the haire is great, and serueth for many thinges. First, it is the ornament and beauty of the heade. For as the face would bee euill fauoured and vnfighly, if it were hairy, so contrariwise, the heade would bee very deformed if it were skinnelasse, where it is couered with haire, as we may iudge by them that haue bald heades. Therefore because it is the toppe of the building of mans body, God would haue it adorned with such a covering: which also standeth him in some steade to defende his braine, and to consume the grossest and most fummy excrements, of which the haire of the heade are ingendred, so that they are a kinde of purgation for it. Besides, it serueth for a covering to the head, which it may vse at pleasure, as neede requireth, against both heate and colde. For it doth not alwaies neede to be alike couered at one time and in one age, as at another. Therefore a man may let them growe, or cutte them, or shaueth them cleane off, as is most commodious to every one. And when they waxe gray and white through age, they put men in mind of two things. First, that they drawe towards the graue and death, to the end they might in good time frame themselves thitherward, and if they haue gone astray in youth and forgotten God, that then at length they should bethinke themselves, and consider that they are no more yoong, and that they must shortly dye: for although it bee late, yet better late then neuer. But it is best to follow Salomons counsell, who admonisheth young men to remember God before the Almond tree flourish, comparing an olde man that is gray and white with age, to a blossomed tree, by reason of the whitenesse of the flowers. For when a man flourisheth in this sort, his floures put him in minde that the tree of the body drieth vp, and that it looseth his naturall strength: whereas the floures of trees are testimonies of the vigor that is yet in them to beare fruite. Therefore wee are very miserable, if wee doe not glorifie God in our youth, neither thinke vpon any other life then this. For wee come farre short of the life of trees, and are not of so long continuance, neither are we yeerely reuened as they are, which see ming to be dead in winter flourish and waxe greene in spring time, as if they became young againe. Which thing we are not to looke for in this world, wherein we flourish contrary to trees, namely in winter, which is our old age. Secondly, gray and white haire warneth men to haue such manners as becommeth that age and colour, that they may make olde age reuerent, according to that saying of the wise man. The glory of the aged is the gray head. For such are these ancient men, whom God in his law commandeth to be honoured, when hee saith, Thou shalt rise up before the hothead, and honour the person of the olde man, and dread thy God. I am the Lord. The same consideration also ought to be in the beard, which is a great ornament to the face, and serueth to distinguish the sexes, & otherwise the ages of men vnto vs vnto whom they bring authority and maiesty. For this cause the auncients did shaueth or powle their beards and haire in the time of mourning and affliction: so that when the Prophets denounced some great aduersitie and desolation, they foretolde that euery head should bee bald and cut and shauen, and the beards in like manner as it appeareth in the Prophecie of Esay against Moab and such like, we reade also that Hannan king of the Ammonites shaued off the halfe of the beards of Dauids messengers to bring them in derision, whereupon they would not shew themselves openly to the people vntil their beards were growen. Concerning womens haire, Saint Paul testifieth expressly, that God hath giuen it vnto them to admonish them of the subiection they owe to their husbands, and of that power which they haue ouer the, in token whereof they ought to haue the head couered, especially in the assemblies of the Church. Therefore he saith, Euery woman that praieth or prophecieth bare headed, dishonoureth her head: for it is euen on euery thing, as though she were shauen. Therefore if the woman be not couered, let her also bee shorne: and if it bee shame for a woman to bee powled or shauen, let her bee couered. And a little after: Iudge in your selues, is it comely that a woman pray vnto God vncovered? doth not nature it selfe teach you, that if a man haue long haire, it is a shame vnto him? But if a woman haue long haire, it is a praise vnto her: for her haire is giuen her for a couering. Wherein the Apostle laboureth chiefly to admonish women, that nature hath giuen to them longer haire then to men, and that it becommeth them best to haue it so, to the end they should keep their heads couered with some vaile and honest couering, for the reasons declared by him, sending the to the schoole of nature to learne of her what modesty & honesty they ought to follow and to shewe in their haire. For indeede this schoole of nature is the schoole of God the creator of nature, in which he teacheth vs by our owne body, and by the nature thereof, what is conuenient conuenient and honest for vs. Therefore God hath not covered some parts of the body with haire for an ornament onely, as the beard in men, and haire of the head, both in men & women, and for other causes whereof I haue spoken, but also to admonish them to couer that, which they cannot discouer without shame and villany, whether it be by deed or word. Hereupon it is, that not onely those parts of the body that are more honorable and noble, as the head and face, are adorned with haire to giue them greater maiesty, but also places more secret are covered therewith, to teach vs, that the honor wee owe to them is to keepe them couered and hid, and that they dishonor them greatly, and themselves also, who discouer them not onely by vile and shamelesse handling, but also by infamous and dishonest words, as many doe, that alwaies haue filthy speeches of whoredome in their mouthes. For that which is dishonest to be seene and to be discouered to the eies, is also dishonest to be heard, and to be disclosed to the eares which we must keepe chaste, as likewise the eies, the tongue, the mouth, and the heart. Therefore they that behaue themselves otherwise, do as if they ment to despise God and nature, whom they wil not follow as Mistresse. Wherefore when Saint Paul sendeth women to the school of Nature to learne that lesson which is there taught them, he openeth vnto vs a great gappe, whereby we may know what Mistresse God hath giuen vs in nature, and what instructions we may receiue from her, if wee can vnderstand her, and haue the wit to know, and to comprehend all that she sheweth vs, even in our owne bodies and goe no further into her schoole, considering that there is not so little as one haire therein, fro which we cannot take instruction. How great then would the profit be, if we would consider as we ought, other things that are more excellent, and of greater importance? Now that wee haue raised vp the frame of mans body from the foundation vnto the very top, we must to morrow by the help of God, in continuing our speech of the compound parts of the body, enter into the consideration of those goodly outward members wherewith the head is adorned, and of the senses of the body, vnto which those serue as instruments. Therefore it belongeth to thee A S E R to begin the handling of such an excellent matter.

Of the bodily and externall senses, especially of touching, of their members, instruments and offices. Chap. 9.

Wherein true felicity consisteth.

A S E R. They that haue the greatest knowledge in humane Artes, although it bee in naturall Philosophy, are not therefore more happy then others, vnlesse they haue learned to ioyne therewith the knowledge of diuinitie. For albeit they haue greater vnderstanding of the nature of things created by God, then other men that haue not bin couersant in such studies, yet al their skil, being blind in respect of true & eternall wisdom, will profit them nothing, but only to make them more guilty before God & worthy of greater condemnation, then if he had giuen them no more vnderstanding then beasts haue. And who knoweth not that the felicity & soueraign Good of man, consisteth not in the knowledge of the creatures & of their nature, but in the knowledge of the Creator that made the? Therefore we should labor in vain to know our selues, if it did not lead vs to the knowledge of God: yea it would help vs nothing at al, but to manifest more evidently our ingratitude towards his Maiesty, & to aggravate, so much the more his iust & fearful iudgment vpon our heads. Likewise we should reape little benefit by our careful inquiry into the matter & form of the frame of man, wherof wee discoursed yesterday, if it serued not vnto vs for an entrance into a deeper contemplation of the goodly works that appeare outwardly therein, and of those corporal senses that haue their seats and instruments in them. And all this knowledge would doe vs little or no good at all, if wee were not ledde thereby to the vnderstanding of the internall senses of the soule, vnto which the former serue as messengers and ministers, as these latter doe vnto the mind and vnderstanding. Therefore in following this order let vs ascend step by step to those things that are

are most excellent: and although the eye of our minde should dafell when wee draw neere vnto them, yet we shall gaine greatly, because those things are very great which draw neere to perfection.

Having before compared the composition of mans body to a building, and having raised vp all the outward parts of it vnto the very top, it remaineth now that wee set on the gates and windowes. When a man would signifie that a house is very lightfome and hath ayre enough, wee commonly say that it is well boarded or pierced. Which may truly be spoken of mans bodie in respect of those outward members, which God hath fashioned in the head, especially in the face, which he hath appointed for seruants to the chiefe bodily senses, whose seruice also is afterward required for the spirituall and internall senses. It is in this part of our building and tabernacle, wherein God causeth the greatest beautie thereof to shine, I meane in the face, which as it were an Image of goodly, orient, and lively colours, enriched with many excellent works, not onely in regard of the skin and painting, but also of the forme, and of so many goodly and pleasant members as are ornaments vnto it: yea, which are so necessary, that without them all the rest as it were vnprofitable, neither could they preserve and keepe themselves.

I speake not yet of those parts that are hidden, and contained within the head, but onely of those members which appeare outwardly, which are in such wise disposed every one in his place, that albeit they be not farre distant one from another, yet the neere ioyning of them together doth not cause them one to hinder the office of another, notwithstanding their diuersitie, as wee see evidently, and shall know more at large by the sequel of our speeches. Hereby doth God admonish vs how wee ought to behaue our selues one toward another, and dwell every man within his bounds and limits, not setting one vpon another, and not incroching vpon any thing that is our neighbours. For as there is space and roome enough in the head for all the senses and members that are there, and the like in the rest of the body for all the members whereof it is compounded, by reason of the good order, concord and consent that is amongst them: so the earth and the world is bigge enough, and hath goods enough for all, if wee had skill and could beare one with another, and be content every one with his estate and office, and with those gifts which we haue receiued from God, as members of one and the same bodie. If this good accord and consent were amongst vs, a little place would please vs: but if we doe otherwise, all the world will not be great enough to suffice vs. No riuers, seas, or mountaines will be sufficient to keepe vs within our bounds and borders. Therefore let vs learne of the senses and members of our body, what rule wee ought to keepe one with another. The bodily senses, which God hath giuen to man to be ministers and messengers to the spirituall senses of the minde, are five in number: namely, the sight, hearing, smelling, taste, and touching. To all the members and instruments of these senses, which shall be hereafter declared vnto vs, the facultie of sense is generally giuen by the sinewes, which haue their originall from the braine, as we haue already touched. So that hereby we see what is the dignitie and excellencie of the head, seeing God hath placed therein the fountaine and spring not onely of all the senses, but also of all the motions of the body, which are wrought by meanes of the sinewes. For we must know, that foure things are required in the office and vse of the bodily senses. The first is the power and vertue of the soule, which giueth sense by the animal spirit guided by the sinewes. The second is the instrument being well applied and made fit for his vse and office, by which the soule effecteth her worke. The third is that thing that is to be perceived by sense, about which the soule exerciseth her office. The fourth is the meane or way, which receiveth the obiekt of the sensible qualitie, and carrieth it to the instrument. As for example: If the question were of sight, first there must be this power and vertue of seeing in the soule. Next, the eyes is necessarily required thereunto: for it is the proper instrument appointed to receiue light. Then there must be light, without which all things are couered with darknesse and made inuisible. For although the eyes by nature are partakers of light, yet that which they haue naturally, & which they carry within them selues, will affoorde them as small light as if they had none at all, except they receive a greater light that commeth from the heauens, or from some lightfome body, as from fire, or from a candle lighted, as we see by experience in the night time. Lastly, the meane or middle way is of necessitie required, by which the light is to be brought and communicated with the eye, and that is the aire, through which it passeth, as through a glasse or cristall or such like bodies, which are not so thicke that they keepe backe the light from piercing through them. For if there bee nothing betweene them, I meane betweene

the eye and the light, and those colours which it must behold, it can not apprehend and perceive them. The like is to be said of the senses of hearing, smelling, and tasting, as we shall understand better, when we speake of them hereafter particularly. But as for the sense of touching, it is most earthy of all the rest. Therefore it agreeth with the earth, and is common to all the parts & members of the body that haue sense, although it be more or lesse in some places then in others. This sense is giuen to the body to discern the first qualities by, namely, hotte, cold, moist, and drie, from others that accompany them, as heavy, and light, harde, and soft, sower, and sweete, thicke and thinne: which are compounded qualities, taken from the foure first, as also corporall things are made of the foure elements. Concerning greatnes, figures, members, motion, and rest, they are common to many of the senses. Thus much for the sense of touching, from which the rest doe differ, in that every one hath his proper sense, which is not communicated with any other. For onely the eyes see, the eares heare, the nose breatheth, the tongue and palate taste. And heere we haue to consider the great prouidence of God in many points. First, forasmuch as the body cannot liue without the sense of touching, which hath for the object the elementarie qualities, it is giuen to all liuing creatures in every part of the body, to the end, that thereby they might knowe according to the proportion of the qualities, what is profitable or hurtfull to their bodies in the participation of these qualities, and so eschew more easily that which might hurt them. But men haue this sense chiefly in the ends of their fingers, that touching slightly with them, they might make the first triall of all qualities. For if they feele that the thing which they touch is too hot, or cold, or that there is some other excelsse in the quality which might hurt them, they are admonished therby to the end that by a very little hurt, they might auoid a greater. For a man may better cheap feele a little grieve and that very lightly in the end of one finger, or of many, then in a whole member, or in all the rest of his body. Besides, God hath further provided for this sense, in that it is not so sharp to feele suddainely and to the quicke, as the sight or hearing, to the end the body should receiue lesse damage by that which it toucheth if it bee hurtfull for it. Now the eyes, because they doe not touch that which they see, nor the eares that which they heare, therefore they cannot be so damnified, as the residue of the members may, which feele not except they touch.

Moreover, wee haue yet to note the prouidence of God herein, that amongst the members giuen by him to the body, hee hath created some of that nature, that a man can in no wise liue without them: and others so, that albeit they bee not necessary for life, yet hee can not liue at his ease, and not receiue great worke if he want them. The members of the first sort are, the braine, the heart, the lungs, the liuer, the spleene, the stomacke, and such like, that are the seates of the animal, vital and naturall vertues, without which there could be no stay of life. For after these members are hurt or perished, farewell life. The other sort are the eies, the eares, the nose, the tongue, the feete, the hands and such like. For although a man loose some or many of these members, yet he doth not therefore loose his life, but hee shall surely feele the detriment, which such a losse bringeth vpon him. And as we commonly say, that the Oxe knoweth not the valew of his horne vntill hee haue lost it, so wee may with great reason say, that no man knoweth of what valewe the partes of his body are vntill hee want them, or vntill they bee so hindered that they cannot fulfill their office. Wherefore wee ought to pray to God to preferue them for vs whilst we haue them, and giue him thanks because he hath not created vs lame or maimed of any member. And when we see any that were borne without them, or that haue lost them since, wee ought to be so much the more stirred vp to glorifie him, acknowledging it to come from his grace in that hee hath dealt better with vs then with them, although we haue deserued no more then they. Now because we doe not so neither haue this consideration as we ought, to giue him thanks, and to vse them to his honour and glory, therefore he deprieth vs of them many times, to punish this ingratitude, and to cause vs to know better the valew of these gifts, after they are taken from vs, and that wee haue lost them, seeing we could not know it whilst we had them, nor yet him that gaue them vnto vs. And by the same meanes also he would admonish and put vs in minde of the damage, we receiue by the defects of our soule, by those which wee feele by experience in our bodies. Whereupon we haue an other goodly point of the prouidence of God to note, in that he hath giuen vs almost all double members, without which wee could not liue but with great pain & trouble: to the end that if we lost one we might yet vse the other, & in some sort supply the losse of that which is wating. For this cause he did not create only one eye, or one nofethril, one eare, one arme, one hand, one leg, or one foot, but twaine. This ought to bee well well considered, that wee might haue the better knowledge of the care that God hath ouer vs, seeing he hath so well provided for all things, that he will not onely haue vs to liue, but also furnish vs with all necessary things, whereby we might liue more commodiously, more easily, and with lesse paine and trouble. And when it falleth out, that some one of these members or both are wanting, God supplieth this defect by maruailous meanes. For sometimes we see that maymed folkes haue done many things with their feete, or with their neck and head, that others could hardly doe with their hands: at leastwise they haue done things without hands, that would seeme altogether incredible to such as haue not seene them. And many times we see dumbe men, whose hands stand them in stead both of tongue and eares. For by the signes and gestures of their hands they signifie their meaning to others, as if they themselves did speake: and vnderstand the minde of others that make the like signes. Yea, there are some that conceiue what others say vnto them, onely by seeing them open and mooue their lippes, so that we must needs acknowledge it as a miracle of God. Now hauing spoken generally of the senses of the body, and specially of touching, as also of their members and instruments, we must come to their particulars. Therefore AMANA, thou shalt discourse vnto vs first of the eyes, which are as it were the principall windowes of this building which we haue vnder taken to pourtraite and set forth.

AMANA. It hath alwaies bin the opinion of the Stoicks and Academicks, that the bodily senses did rather hinder then helpe to obtaine wisedome: that no man could know or vnderstand any thing: that the senses were feeble and slow: that sensible things were small, that they could not be perceived: or else so subiect to motion, that no certaintie could be found in them: that our life is short, and full of opinions and customes: that all was compassed about with darkenesse, and hid: and therefore that nothing could bee perceived or vnderstood, so that men were to professe that they would affirme or approoue, of nothing. Plato writeth in many places, that wee must beleue nothing but the vnderstanding, which beholdeth that that is simple and vniforme, and as it is indeede: and that there is no science, but only in those reasons & discourses, which the soule maketh when it is not troubled with bodily lets, as with sight, and hearing, or with grieve and pleasure. Eusebius disputing against this, sheweth that the senses helpe much towards the obtaining of wisedome: and that when they are rightly affected, and in their naturall habite, they neuer deceiue the minde that is attentue. But we shall know more at large what their profite is by continuing our discourses of the instruments of the senses.

Euang. c. 7.

Let vs know therefore, that the eyes were giuen of God to men to cause them to see, and to be as it were their watch-towers and sentinels, the guides and leaders of the whole body: as also they are as it were the chiefe windowes of the body, or rather of the soule, which is lodged within it. For it is a most excellent worke of God, whether we consider the matter whereof they are made, and how diuerse or agreeable it is to the office that is assigned them: or the beauty that is in their forme, and in the diuersity of their colours: or the commoditie and vse of their motions, and how they are set in their places, as it were goodly precious stones laid in some curious piece of worke: and how they are inuironed and armed both aboue and beneath, on the right hand and on the left, with the eye-lids, and the eye-browes, not onely for their protection and defence, but also to adorne, & to make them shew more beautifully. And surely it is not without cause that God hath put such great excellency in the, & hath created & framed them so artificially. For first, they are the chiefe members of all the bodily senses, whose nature approacheth neerer to the nature of the soule and spirit, then any other, by reason of the similitude and agreement that is betweene them. Therefore by good right they beare rule among all the senses, and all the other members of the body, as being their guides. For they are giuen to man chiefly to guide and leade him to the knowledge of God, by the contemplation of his goodly works, which appeare principally in the heavens and in all the order thereof, and whereof we can haue no true knowledge & instruction by any other sense but by the eyes. For without them who could euer haue noted the diuers course and motions of the celestiall bodies? yea we see by experience, that the Mathematicall sciences, among which Astronomie is one of the chiefe, cannot be well and rightly shewed and taught, as many others may, without the helpe of the eies: because a man must make their demonstrations by figures, which are their letters and images. I passe over many other Sciences, as that of the Anatomy of mans body and such like, which are very hard, yea impossible to be learned and knowne certainly vnlesse they may be seene with the eye. Wherefore seeing the bodily senses are the chiefest masters of man, in whose house the spirit and vnderstanding is lodged and inclosed, the greatest and first honour is by good right to be given to the eies and sight. Likewise it is the first Mistresse that prouoked men forward to the studie and fear-ching out of science and wisdom. For of sight is ingendred admiration and wondering at things that are seene: and this admiration causeth men afterward to consider more seriously of things, and to marke them better: and from thence it is that men fall to enquire of matters more carefully, and to sound them deeper. In the end they come to the studie of science and wisdom, which is the knowledge of supernaturall light, namely of the light of the minde, vnto which, science and doctrine is as light is to the eye, so that it contemplateth and museth by that, as the eye seeth by light. Therefore wee haue to note, that it hath pleased God the creator of all things to scatter his light throughout the whole world, and ouer all creatures as well spirituall and inuisible, as corporall and visible. His spirituall light he hath infused into spirituall creatures, and bodily light into bodily creatures, to the end that by this benefit the spirits might haue vnderstanding, and the eyes sight. So that Angels and the spirits of men, which are spirituall and inuisible creatures, are illuminated by the meanes of vnderstanding, with that spirituall and heavenly light whereof God hath made them parta-kers: as the bodies of liuing creatures, and chiefly of man are illuminated with the corporall light of the Sunne by meanes of the eyes. For as bodies haue their bodily eyes, so spirits haue their spirituall eyes. For that vnderstanding wherewith God hath indued them, is vnto them as the eyes are to the bodie. Wherefore by that they see God, who is their heavenly Sunne, and the fountaine of all diuine and spirituall light, as bodily eyes behold the materiall sunne, wherein as in a fountaine God hath placed corporall light, which hee would haue vs see and know by meanes of the eyes: which we ought to acknowledge as a great benefite. For the light is a worke of God worthy of great admiration, which discovereth and sheweth to vs a great part of nature, and is vnto vs in stead of an image of the best and most excellent natures, which without doubt are lights and shining natures. Neither could any man possibly expresse in words or teach in any sort what the light is which sheweth all other things, and what is the beauty and excellency thereof, vnlesse the eyes did behold & know it, and distinguish it from darknesse. For by meanes of the eyes wee may iudge what our life would bee, if it were buried in perpetuall darkenesse, or if man had no instrument to apprehend and to receiue the light when it shineth. Therefore as God hath created the light to discover and shew all things by it, so he hath giuen eyes to man, whereby he may apprehend and receiue it. To this end he hath made them of a matter that is partaker of light, & meete to receiue it, that by the agreement of nature that is betweene them & the light, they might enioy it, and by the selfe same meanes they might be messengers to the minde to induce and lead it to the consideration of the diuine light, whereof corporall light is a very small resemblance: and hereby also the minde might know that God, who dwelleth in a light that none can attaine vnto, is a maruailous light, as holy men know by experience when he sheweth himselfe vnto them. For as the eye is like to a glasse that receiue the Images of things offered vnto it, so God imprinteth Images of himselfe in our minde as in a glasse. Wherefore as a glasse cannot receiue any Image, but of such things as are set before it: so the image of God cannot shine nor be imprinted in the minde of man, vnlesse he alwaies set God before his eyes, that hee may receiue his Image. And as the eye is illuminated by the beames that proceede from the Sunne, so the minde is illuminated by the brightnesse of the diuine light, in which we consider the Father in the vnitie of the godhead, as the spring and fountaine of all light, and the Sonne, as the beames & brightnes ingendred thereof, and the holy Ghost, as a flame proceeding from it, which causeth the eye of the mind to receiue it, and to be made partaker therof. We see then how our eies together with the light admonish vs of great things, of most excellent works of God, and of great secrets of spirituall & heavenly things, whose images he hath imprinted in the light & in our eies, to the end, that by these corporall & visible images, wee may haue some knowledge of those things whereof they are images, which cannot bee seene & perceiued with corporall senses, but onely with the spiritual senses of the soule. Wherefore we ought greatly to praise God for his goodly gift, both of the light & of the eies, which cannot sufficiently be valewed. For although it did vs no more seruice then it doth to brute beasts,

beasts, namely to guide & leade vs in this corporall life, yet we ought seriously to acknowledge the excellencie of so great a gift of God, & how profitable & necessary it is for vs. But there is a great deale more in it, by reason of the minde and vnderstanding which God hath giuen to the spirit and soule of man, as it were spirituall eyes, to the end there might bee an agreement and proportion betweene them and the eyes of the bodie. For the eyes declare to the minde what they see, that it might take knowledge thereof: so when the minde hath seene with spirituall eyes those images that are offered vnto it by the bodily eyes, it causeth them to see a great deale more clearly, then the eyes of brute beasts doe. For because they want minds, and vnderstanding, their eie sight pierceth no further then vnto those corporall things which they behold. Wherefore when they see the light of the Sun, they onely prepare themselves to be guided by it, & neuer consider or looke any further. But man, if hee bee not altogether brutish as beasts are, stayeth not there, but passing further hee considereth the beauty of the sun, and those great benefits which it bringeth with it. And being ascended so hie by the meanes of corporall light, he ascendeth euen to the spirituall & diuine light, and to God, who is the eternall and infinite Sun. Man also hath so much the more knowledge of the nature of corporall light, and the effects therof, & hath also so much the more celestial & heauenly light whereof bodily light is an image, as his mind is illuminated by the word & spirit of God. For otherwise men see little clearer and not much farther by the light of the body, then brute beasts do. Moreouer we made mention in our former speech of 4. things requisite to see by: which also are to be vsed in the other senses I will onely adde a little of the fourth thing, which is of the meane that receiueth the object of the sensible quality, & beareth it to the instrument. If those bodies that are set before our eyes, are so thicke by nature that the light cannot pierce through them, then doth the light appeare vpon them, but not in so great measure, nor so cleare as in the aire & in other bodies, as in glasse, cristall or such like that are not so thicke, that they will hinder the light from piercing through them. This part of light that is vpon thicke bodies, is called colour, which is of diuers sorts, according to the mixture of light & darkenes that is in them. For first there are 2. kinds of simple colours, by mingling of which together al other colours are compounded. The one is white, which hath most light in it of al others, & therefore will take any other colour. Then there is black colour, which hath least light in it: and therefore, it will take no other colour. Now according as these 2. kinds of colours are mingled together, all other colours, being infinit in number, are compounded, taking their diuersity & difference, as they haue more white or black mingled in them. For this cause some are red, others yellow, these greene, those ski-colour, others gray, or blew, or tawny. In a word, it would be a difficult matter, yea impossible to rehearse al their differences & varieties. But God sheweth himselfe yet more wonderfull in the diuersity that is seen euen in one kind of color. For let vs consider in a meadow or garden all the herbs, trees, & plants that are there with leaues & flowers, & we shal see no green in any one of the, which differeth not in some thing from the green of another kind, although they be white, or black, or red, or yellow, or azure, or of any other colour, we shall not find one that differeth not in something from others of the same color, but of a diuers kind. So is it with diuers fethers and colors of birds, amongst which there are such sundry colors, that a man can not tel what certaine name to giue them: as for example, we see about the necke of a Ring-doue. And although Painters indeuour as much as lieth in them to counterfaite all these diuersities in their paintings mingled with many colours, and howsoeuer, as followers of nature, they come very neere her, yet they can neuer approach so neere as to bee able to represent any colour so liuely as shee brings it forth. Now if the eyes were not capable of light, they could not see any colour, nor discern one from another: and if they could not see colours, they should see nothing. For nothing can bee seene but by meanes of colours, no more then it may bee seene without light, of which those are made. And as the eyes can not well see if they haue not as much light as is needefull for them: so if they haue too much, and more then they want, they will see a great deale lesse: or if it bee very great, they will bee dazeled, and as it were blinde. Therefore it must bee dispensed vnto them by iust measure and proportion according to their capacite: and then through the reflection of those things which it discovereth vnto them, it imprinteth their images in them, as the image of a ring is imprinted in sealed waxe. Now hauing spoken of the principall vse of our eies, if I should enter into a more particular consideration of their nature, I know not almost at which ende to begin. For there is nothing in the matter, of which they are made, or in their forme, composition and vse, how small soeuer it bee which is not able to cast all men into great admiration. For first, if you aske after their matter, they are compounded of three sorts of humours, of which the one is like to water, the other to glasse molten, or to the white of an egge, and the third to ice or cristall: and therefore they take their names of those things which they resemble. Concerning the Christalline humor, it is not so thinne, but more firme then the other twaine, much like to waxe melted. Neuerthelesse it is a great deale more cleare and more glistering then both the other: so that there is the same difference betweene these three humours, and that which may be seene through them, which is betweene cristall glasse, and water, and that which a man may see through them. The Christalline humour is given to the eye to impart light vnto it, therefore it is in the eye, as it were a little round cristall glasse, very glistering. And although the other twaine are very bright, so that the light may passe through them, as it were through water and glasse yet they haue no light of themselues, as the cristalline humour hath, which could not receiue that light which it doth from without, if of it selfe it were not partaker of light, and if by that participation which it hath, there were not in it a naturall agreement with the other. The other twaine are ioyned vnto it not onely to nourish and moysten it, that it dry not to fast, but also to helpe to preserue it, and to moderate the vehemency both of those spirites and colours that might hurt it. Nowe because these humours are liquid and soft, they had neede of fitte vessels to keepe euery one in his place appoynted, for the executing of their office. The cristalline humour is in the midst of the other twaine, because it is the glasse of the eye, which receiue the light, and the images of those things that by the light are disclosed vnto it. Therefore it hath behinde it that which resembleth molten glasse, or the white of an egge, which is not altogether so soft and liquide, as the other before that resemble water. Thus hath God disposed them according to that natural conueniency which is betweene them, that they might be so knitte one to another, as is meetest both for them, and their vses. And being all ioyned together, they serue to fill vp that hollow place within which the eyes are inclosed, so also the other parts, and namely the fat, whereof they are well provided, serueth not only to fil vp void room, but also is appointed to this end, that the eyes might rest them more at ease, & be moistened the better. In all which things great wonders of Gods providence appeare most cleerly: namely, in this, that the humours are so distinguished, euery one keeping his place without mixture or confusio, as also in this that the cristalline humor, which is partaker of light & which ought to receiue it, is so wel copassed about & fortified on al sides. For this cause it is more firme then the other, that it might both keepe & distribute better the light which it receiue, & also preserue it self, & help the other humours that are ioyned vnto it, which being as it were Nurses vnto it, doe in like manner helpe it againe. Moreouer, we are greatly to maruaile at the providence of God, in considering the coats and skins of the eyes, their forme and motions, their diuers colours, and the sinewes whereby they receiue sight: the discourse of which matters, I lay vpon thee, ARAM.

Of the tunicles and skins of the eyes: of their forme and motions: of their sundry colours: of the sinewes whereby they receiue sight, and of other parts about the eyes. Chap. II.

ARAM. If we would stand to consider of all those things that are worthy of admiration, but in one eye onely, as well in respect of the matter, as of the forme, and meanes whereby they receiue the vertue of seeing, and performe their dutie, as the Philitions shewe these things in an Anatomy, a man might make a very great booke thereof, as likewise of all the other members. For there is no member so little, wherein there is not most exquisite art, and wherein a man may not see marueilous workes of Gods providence, so that I should bee wonderfully abashed to see any Philition prooue an Atheist, if he haue neuer so little knowledge of the nature of mans bodie, and of the composition and Anatomie of the parts of it, were it not that God punished them with the like iudgement that hee hath done other great Philosophers, whome he casteth into a reprobate sence, because through pride and ingratitude, they abuse that knowledge of naturall things, which he hath giuen them. Let vs learne therefore to know the Creator by the knowledge of the creatures, and let vs looke vpon the worke-master in the excellencie of his works. And now to this end, according to our intent, let vs with the eyes of the mind, behold the eyes of the body, seeing they looking vpon all things, yet cannot see themselues.

Now

Now as we haue perceiued, that God hath disposed the matter and humors of the eyes according to that office whereunto hee hath assigned them so hee hath appointed tunicles or coates which are little skins, in which they are contained as it were in their vessels, and compassed about with them as it were with little hands, to keepe them vnited and close together, and to preserve them, that they moue not forth, and runne out, and withall to be vnto them as a sure defence. These skinnies according to their offices and vses are disposed one after another, and interlaced betweene the humors of the eyes, according to that agreement of nature which they haue, both amongst themselves, as also with those humors which they serue & which in like sort serueth them, to the end that neyther the one nor the other shold easily receiue hurt. And among those five seuerall tunicles, which there are of them, according as the Phisitions and Anatomists distinguish them one is very slender, like to a small spiders web, or to a very little fine white skinne, that is betweene the parts of an onion. Then there is another that is like to a little threed: and the third resembleth in colour the stone of a redde grape, I meane the outward side of it. They are named by the Grecians and Latines according to the similitudes and likenesse of those things which they resemble. But the chiefest, strongest, and hardest of them is like to a slender and cleare horne, I meane that horne whereof Lanterns are made, but that it is not so hard and thicke by a great deale: and by reason of the similitude which it hath with horne, it is called by the same name. This hath God created in this sort, both that it might bee a stronger defence to all the humors of the eyes, and also that it might serue for the light which they are to receiue, through which it shineth, as the light that is in a Lanterne belids the horne of which it is made. There is yet another white skinne, which serue to keepe in the whole eye vnto the head, in the place assigned for it: and this is the first, as that like the spiders webbe is the last, and then the other are placed betweene these in the same order that I haue named. Heerein appeareth the worke of God, namely his providence is to be well marked in this, that he hath not placed the eyes so far out in the face and head, as he hath done the nose, eares, and lippes, but more inward as it were in holes and little dennes, by reason of the humors whereof they are compounded, to keepe them so much the more fast and close together, because they are liquide. Therefore they are shut vp in their holes, as the water of a Well is in that place where it is gathered together. For this cause the Hebrewes often vse the selfesame word to signifie both the eyes and fountaines. Next, God hath created them of a round forme, both because it is the fairest, most seemely and most perfect, as also because it is most moueable, and easiest to turne and returne on euery side, as the office of the eye requireth. For seeing they are given to man, and to all creatures for the direction of the whole bodie, and of all the members thereof, they ought not to be so fastned in the place where they are, that they can never looke but one way, nor stirre themselves on any side. Therefore God hath appointed to euery eye seven muscles, both to keepe them firme and steady, as also to cause them to remooue and turne vppward and downward, on the right hand and on the left, crossewise and round. And as the rounde forme is most perfect, so it is most fitte for the office of the eyes, to the end they may see all things better, and comprehend all sorts of shapes better then if they were flat, or hollow, or square, or of some other fashion besides round: as a man may iudge by the diuersitie of looking-glasses, and of their figures and makings, according to the variety of which, they represent diuersly those things whose images they receiue. Now because man, as also all other creatures goe forward, and not backward or sidewise, there God hath not placed the eyes either in the hinder part of the head, or on any side thereof, but before. And although the eyes bee moueable and made to turne on euery side, yet they neuer turne cleane backward, but onely sidewise, so farre as they can see and behold well. For they haue nothing to looke vpon within the head, but onely without. Therefore they haue this aduantage besides, that being set in that place which is assigned vnto them in the head, they may turne from one part to another, and see, not onely on the right hand and on the left, but also behinde, by that motion which the head hath from his sinewes by meanes of the necke: which motion the head should not haue, if it were seated vpon the shoulders without a necke: and this is another commodity of the necke, whereof we spake not before.

Now before we goe any further in the discourse of those parts that are about the eyes for their defence and preservation, it shall be good for vs to consider here of the goodly painting, and variety of colours that are in them. For first we haue a white colour, which couereth the greatest part of the eye: next that goodly small circle, which is round about the eye: then the aple of the eye, which the Hebrewes call the daughter of the eye, being in the midst of it, as it were a little glasse, wherein a man may alwayes see some image, as it were in a glasse when one looketh into it. This little circle is called by some a Crowne, and by others a Raine-bow, because of the diuersitie of colours that are seene in it: which are not all alike in all men. For some haue this circle more blacke, others more gray, others more yellow, or more redde. Moreover, besides the sinewes of those muscles that are giuen to the eyes to moue them euery way, each of them hath one proper vnto it selfe, whereby the life and vertue of seeing is communicated vnto it from the braine, by meanes of the soule that giueth life to all the body. Therefore these sinewes differ from all the rest, in that they are not solide, but hollow within, like to little water pipes, to carry vnto the eyes the spirits of sight, which are as it were a little flame of light, whereby they receiue from the braine, life and vertue of seeing.

Next we are to consider how God hath placed them neere the nose, to the end they may purge also by that on each side, as well as the other humours of the braine. Therefore there are kernels hard by them in the head, which serue both to moysten and to water them according as they haue neede, by reason of their burning nature and perpetuall motion, and also to retaine and soke in humors, least they should descend and fall downe vpon them too fast, and so hurt them. Besides this commoditie, the nose in his place is vnto both the eyes in steade of bulwarks, and so also are the bones which close them in on euery side, and bals of the cheekes, which are higher then the holes of the eyne, that they also might serue to defend them. Moreover, God hath further armed them with eye liddes, which serue them both for ornament, and are also in steade of gates vnto them, hauing muscles to open and to shut them, either wholly or in part as neede shall require, both for sight, for sleeping and waking, and for defence. And besides the eyebrows wherewith God hath covered them aboue the liddes, there are little haire growing at their brimmes, which God hath not giuen in vaine. For first, they serue to direct the beames of the sight, that they may see more directly: next they serue for defence against little flies, against dust, moates, and other small things that might enter in, and trouble them. Moreover, they serue for ornament, as it were some pretie border round about them. And because the haire of the eyeliddes haue another office then those of the eyebrows, therefore they are otherwise disposed: for they are not so thicke, nor mingled one within and aboue another, as the haire of the eyebrows are, but they are raunged and set all in ranke, even orderly one by another. And as for the eyebrows they doe not onely serue to set forth the eyes, that their beauty may the better appeare, but also to defend them against the raine, against the sweate of the head and forehead, and other things that might descend and fall vpon them if they had not this to stay them. And to this purpose we see the agreement which they haue with the nose on each side, and howe the prouidence of God hath made them like to a halfe a circle, or a halfe moone, or a little arch, or else after the fashion of a little penthouse, to the end that the sweate and raine might haue an easie course and descend on both sides, and not runne into the eyes. And because they should not hinder in steade of helping, God hath created them of that nature, that they grow not like the haire, beard, or nails, but continue alwaies at one stay. What then will those women say for themselves, who take so great paines in twitching and plucking off the haire of the eyebrows, to the end they should not be so thicke or great as nature hath made them. For they thinke it greater beauty when they are shorter and thinner. But in this, as in all their paintings and pranking they doe not onely lift vp themselves against nature, as though they would worke here a spite, but also behaue themselves as if of set purpose they meant to reproch God for creating them as hee did. Now in speaking of the eyes, let vs beware that we be not so blind, as that we cannot see that thing by them, which they teach vs, or take no heede of that which they shew vnto vs. For the consideration of one of them alone, or of one eyelid or browlidde only, ought to teach vs to open and to lift them on high that they may search out & contemplate him that created, the & hath giuen them vnto vs euen to him who saith, I that formed the eye, shall not I see? Therefore we ought to be afraid, least our eyes be giuen vnto vs as iudges, to conuince vs of our ingratitude towards God their and our Creator, and to condemne vs. For there are but too many miracles to be seene of his almighty power in their creation, and too many witnesses of his prouidence towards vs, to make vs more then ashamed and confounded. We haue yet another point to be noted touching their situation, which causeth a certaine proportion and agreement to be betweene the heauens and the head, and betweene the eyes of the great and little world, and those of the body and soule. For it is most certaine, that they could not be placed more conueniently, then in the highest part of all the bodie, as it were in the highest towre, seeing seeing they are to serue all the other members in place of Warders and Watchmen, and of guides and leaders. Therefore Salomon had reason to call them the Lookers out by the windows. For the holes of the head in which they are placed as it were Looking glasses, are their windows through which they see and behold. We may also say as much of the apple of the eye, which looketh within this little circle, as it were by a window. For this cause, as God hath placed the sunne, moone, and all the rest of the lights aboue in the heauens: so hee would that there should be some proportion betweene the heauens and the head of man, and betweene those goodly lights aboue named, and the eyes that are created to receiue light from them, and to be that in man who is the little world, which the sunne, moone, and other lights of heauen are in this great vniuersall world. Therefore for as much as the eyes are as it were the images of these goodly bodies and celestiall glasses, they occupie the highest place in this bodie of the little worlde, as the lights doe in the great body of the world, whereof they are as it were the eyes, to giue it light on euery side. For this cause also the eyes are more fierie, and haue more agreement with the nature of fire, then any other member that belongeth to the corporall senses. And as they are in a high place, so they are admonished thereby of the place vnto which they ought to looke, according to that which Dauid saith I lift mine eyes to thee that dwellest in the heauens. In all these things we see a goodly harmony and agreement betweene the great and the little world, the like whereof wee shall also finde betweene the worlde and the spirituall heauen, whose sunne and light is God, and betweene the eyes of the soule and of the minde. Therefore Iesus Christ said very well, The light of the body is the eye: if then thine eye be single, thy whole body shall be light: but if thine eye be wicked then all thy body shall be darke. Wherefore, if the light that is in thee be darkenesse, how great is that darkenesse. So that the eyes being as it were the lanterne, lampe and flame of the whole body, they could not haue a more apt place, or more conuenient for their nature, then that where God hath placed them. The like also may be said of the spirituall eyes of the soule and of the minde. For God hath lodged the vnderstanding & reason in the braine of man, as it were in a high towre, in which it ought to raigne as a Queene and Princeesse, and guide vnder her lawes all the affections & actions of men, as eyes guide all the members of the body. And when God, who is the Sun & light of the world, and of the spirituall heauen, reacheth out his beames to these eyes of the soule by his eternall Sonne and giueth them life, vigour and vertue by his spirit, then is the minde well lightned, and then doth she happily and to her proper end direct all the parts of the soule. Now for the conclusion of our speech, seeing wee haue spoken largely enough of the eyes of the body, and of their nature, beautie, and excellency, and what goodly images of the spirituall eyes they represent vnto vs, let vs yet a little better acknowledge the greatnes of their Workmaster, by considering apart the matter whereof they are made, I meane by it selfe and without the workmanship: as if we should now beholde their substance without that disposition and forme which he hath giuen them. What is an eye pluckt out of the head but a little clay and mire? as indeede it is the matter whereof it is made. Now what a wonderfull thing is it, that God hath so appropriated it, as to make such a goodly peece of worke thereof, and such a faire instrument for the seruice of men? And therefore our Sauiour Iesus Christ meant to represent this diuine worke, when hee made the blinde to see by putting clay vpon his eyes. Let vs therefore vse their sight, which is such an excellent gift of God, to behold his workes, and those goodly images of the diuine nature, which on euery side, and continually are before our eyes: and let vs beware that we feede them not with the sight of prophane and dishonest things, least they serue to poyson the minde and soule, whereas they ought to become messengers, to declare vnto it honest & healthful things. For he that doth otherwise is worthy to haue, not onely his bodily eyes put out, & pluckt out of his head but also the eyes his of his minde, that so he be may blinde both in body & soule, as it commonly falleth out to many. But let vs follow our matter propounded touching the senses, and their members: speake vnto vs ACHITO B, of the eares, and of their composition, offices, and vse.

offices, and uses. Chap. 5.*

ACHITO B. The wisdom of God is so great, and he provideth so well for all things by his providence: that he neuer doth any thing in vaine: in so much that there is nothing what-whatsoever in all nature, which hath not his proper vse, and which is not compounded of matter and forme agreeable thereto, for the instruction of men. But for asmuch as men are rude of vnderstanding, and by reason of their naturall corruption easily turned aside from the chiefe end of their being, namely the contemplation of celestiall and heavenly things, in place whereof they betake themselves to the care of those things that are earthly and corruptible it commeth to passe, that hauing eyes and eares, they neither see nor heare any spirituall thing, so that their very light is become darkenes. And then how great may wee thinke the darkenesse to be in those parts that ought be guided by them that are capable of light? Therefore as we haue learned, that the eyes are the first guides and houshold-masters that God hath giuen to every one, and the first authors and inventors almost of all artes, sciences and disciplines, because by their sight we know the light, colour, greatnesse, figure, number, situation, and motion of the bodily things, both neere and farre off: so now wee are to know, that the hearing and the eares are very conuenient for one man to communicate his knowledge with another, as if one should powre wine or water out of one vessell into another. But they are especially giuen by God to men, that they might serue to receiue the doctrine and instruction of wisedome, as we may perceiue if wee consider diligently their nature and vse.

The situation of the eares.

Of their making.

Of their forme.
The eares of men and apes only are with out mouing.
Of their vse.

The eares then, in mine opinion, are also as it were watchmen ouer the whole body as well as the eyes. For it is not onely required, that a watchman should see, but also that hee should both heare and speake. Therefore are the eares placed hard by the eyes on each side, as well for an ornament to the head, as for the commoditie and vse of the whole body. For that place is fit for them that they may so much the more conueniently receiue those sounds that come vnto them, and cause them to heare, euen as the eyes receive the light, which causeth them to see. Therefore as God hath disposed the matter whereof it pleased him to make the eyes, and hath giuen them such a forme as agreeth best to that office, which he would haue them performe, so hath he done in regard of the eares, as also of all the other members of the body. For this cause he hath made them of gristles, which are a great deale harder and more firme then either flesh, kernels, sinewes, or ligaments: but yet nothing so hard as the bones are, as we haue already learned by that which was spoken before. Besides, neere about the place where the eares are, he hath set the hardest and firmest bones that are about the head. Therefore they are called stony bones by reason of their hardnesse, and of their naturall agreement with stones: whereby the eares are strongly fortified, and that very agreeable to their nature and office. As for their forme, it is halfe round, and very well compassed. They are also doubled in about the ends, as if nature had wrought them about with little ledges turned in of the same matter, in most excellent and decent manner. And among all living creatures God hath giuen vnmooueable eares to none, but onely to man, and to an ape: for the rest can mooue them vp and downe. And as for this externall and eminent part of the eare that appeareth without, if it serued onely to beautifie the head, the vse of it were not to bee disposed. For it is eident by such as haue their eares cut off, how deformed and vnseemely the head would be to looke vpon, if it were not decked with that part of the eares planted there by God for their greater ornament, as it were two goodly bruches. Hereof it is, that those men haue this part cut off, who are to bee made deformed and infamous for some notorious offence. But besides the honour and ornament, which this part of the eares bringeth to the head, it serueth also to couer the braine which is next to the eares, least it should be hurt. And to the end that they might not be easily bruised, or broken, nor yet hang downeward, they are as I haue said, of a gristly substance, as are all those parts that are bare and appeare outward, and which are in danger to receiue iniuries and discommodities from without. Likewise this outward growing of the eares bringeth a double commodity with it to the rest of that member. The first is, that it keepeth backe the rayne and sweate of the head, and much filth that might enter into the eares, if those places were flat, and had nothing but the holes of the eares without these bulwarkes. Therefore their forme is made so, that they ascende and bend vpward without, but are hollow within. The other is, that it helpeth much for the better receiuing in of the soundes that are brought to the eares by the ayre, because thereby the soundes are better conueied vnto that place, which is properly appointed for the hearing. For this cause the eares are not pierced straight outright, but their holes are made windeing in, like the shell of a snayle, whose forme they represent, so that one cannot thrust straight-foorth so much as a little threede, or the bristle of a hogge. For if they were boared outright many inconueniences would befall them. The first is, that the sounds would not be conueied

ed in so well, as they are in places that bend and giue backward, where they haue rebound; which causeth them to stay and sound better. The second is, that the eares should receiue ouer great sounds and too thicke, and so being more confused, they could not be discerned and vnderstood so well. Againe, as too great light doth not onely dazell the eyes, but hurte them withall: so ouer great sounds would marre the instrument of hearing, if they were not distributed and compassed according to the capacity thereof: For there must alwaies be an answerable and apt proportion betweene the sense, the thing subiect to sense, and the meane by which the sense is made. Heereupon it falleth out often, that many become deafe by hearing ouer great sounds, wherof we haue experience in Smithes, amongst whom many are thicke of hearing, because their eares are continually dulled with the noise and sound of their hammers & anuiles. The like oftentimes happeneth to those that deale with artillery, by reason of the continuall vse and greatnes of the sound. Moreover we must note, that there is a very little hole in each of those stonie bones, in which the hearing is properly made, and within which also there are three very small bones; wherof the one is called an anuile, the other the hammer, because they are made almost of the same fashion, so that a man would say, that nature had framed a little anuile and a little hammer to make sounds, and to cause them to be heard. The third small bone was found out by certaine Phisicians and Anatomists, and being boared in the middest is fashioned like to a little stir-rope, and is alwaies lesse then any of the other twaine. Phisicians that write of Anatomie make no mention of this last, or if any speake of it, they are but few, and of late time. And in deede it is a hard matter, even for them that are most skilfull and expert, to looke vnto all how diligent and able soeuer they be in Anatomie, especially in the view of many instruments, and of their sundry parts, which are so small, that hardly can we discernie them with our eyes if we looke not very narrowly vnto them, and that after we are told thereof before. As for these small bones wherof I speake now, and namely the third, a man may perceiue them better in a dry Anatomy, and in some skull that hath nothing but the bare bones, then he shall in a whole body. Therefore the skilfullest Phisicians and Anatomists confesse, that the body of man hath such wonderfull art in it, that euery day they find some new thing in it, which was not obserued by any in former times. But let vs returne to our speech concerning that which remaineth of the composition of the eares. Besides these litle bones, there are two small skinned full of nerues, which hold and bind these bones in such wise, that they are as it were a litle tabour stretched out in that place. These small skins haue their originall from those sinewes, by which the vertue of hearing proceedeth from the braine to the eares. For after the sounds are made in the aire, they are caried to these skinned, and then heard and discerned by them. Hereupon they are made hollow, to receiue the sounds that come from without, hauing a nature that agreeth very much with the aire, as the eyes doe with the fire, I meane in respect of their vertue which is burning and glistering, albeit their substance be moist. Therefore as the eyes iudge of light and colours, and by that meanes bring great pleasure and profite to men: so the eares iudge of sounds and of the voyce, of notes harmony, and of melodies, whereby man receiueith commodity and delight. And if there were but the sundry notes of Birds, what solace doth he receiue by it? But besides, how many instruments are there of most excellent and melodious Musicke, what voyces and pleasant songs, framed very cunningly, and with great grace and harmony by the art of Musicke? For wee see by experience, that this science is given of God to men, that it might be chiefly dedicated to their eares, to the end that by the sounds and songs which they heare, they might be stirred vp to praise God the giuer of them. Therefore Salomon not without good reason called them the daughters of singing or of Musicke, because of the delight which they take therein, and also because this whole art, and all songs and melody would be vaine and vnprofitable to the life of man without hearing. But aboue all, the chiefest profit that the eares bring to men, is by the meanes of speech, whereby they communicate one with another all their conceits, imaginations, thoughts and counsailes, so that without them the whole life of man would be not onely deafe, but dumbe also and very vnperfect, as if man had neither tongue, mouth nor speech.

And on the other side, seeing man hath alwaies neede of doctrine and instruction, albeit all the other bodily senses helpe him therein, neuerthelesse, none is so fit or more seruiceable to this purpose, next to the eyes, then the eares. Wherfore if Salomon for the cause aboue rehearsed, called them the daughters of singing, a man may also call them the daughters of discipline & of knowledge. For as man hath nothing more proper then speech, wherby he others know what hee hath in his minde and heart, so he hath nothing more fit then that, to teach all things by, whose doctrine is already begunne by meanes of the other senses, but principally of the eyes. For the other senses together with the sense of seeing, are as masons, that lay the first foundation of the frame of doctrine, and afterward speach buildeth vpon this ground-worke: which it cannot doe, if it be not holpen by the eares and by hearing, which agree with the voice pronounced by the eares, that it may be heard and vnderstood of them.

Pro. 1. 5. 6.

How hearing is framed in the eares.

Thus after the knowledge of things is found out, and artes begunne by meanes of the sight, after the same maner that was declared before by vs when we intreated of the eyes, then the sense of hearing teacheth a great deale more, both greater matters and sooner. For we receiue and vnderstand in a short space, that which our master who teacheth vs, hath obtained and prepared in a very long time. For how many things must we see, and what books must we reade before we shall attaine to the knowledge of that, which we may learne by hearing of one lecture, at which we shall be auditors onely one houre or lesse? Let vs consider then how conueniently and bountifully God dealeth with men in this behalfe, when that thing which is very profitable and most necessary is made so easie for them. For nothing is more profitable or more necessary then to learne much, nor any thing more easie then to heare much. Therefore Salomon saith, That a wise man shall heare and increase in learning, and a man of vnderstanding shall attaine vnto wise Counsels, to vnderstand a parable and the interpretation, the words of the wise and their darke sayings. This also is the meanes whereby God hath appointed, that men shall learne and vnderstand his will. And therefore, as we heard that eyes were giuen vnto vs, to this end specially, that they should contemplate the works of God, their & our Creator: so we ought to know that eares were giuen vs, that before all things we should heare & vnderstand his voyce & word, & consecrate them wholly to that purpose: to the end that after the eares of the body haue heard it, they should be the messengers to declare it to the eares of the soule and minde, to cause them also to heare and vnderstand the same. For this cause, as the aire that entreteth into the eares, and bringeth vnto them the sound made in it selfe, when it is stricken and moued, moueth the little hammer of the eares, and causeth it to strike vpon the anuile, and so maketh a sound by meanes of the little taber, through whose sound the spirits of hearing are awakened: so God by inspiration worketh in his Prophets and ministers, who receiue his voice after a diuine manner: and then are they as it were the hammers that strike vpon the anuiles of mens mindes and hearts, by which sound the spirits of the hearers are awakened and stirred vp. But my desire is, that we should thoroughly consider heere this great secret of God that lyeth hidde in nature, namely, the meanes whereby the hearing is made and framed. Neuerthelesse, God giueth vs great light thereunto by the matter and forme of the instruments, which he hath made for the hearing. Wherefore seeing the eares are framed so artificially as we haue heard, as appeareth to the eye by their Anatomie, we cannot doubt but that God would haue their vse and artificiall composition known to them that may behold with their eyes the instruments of hearing, when they are laide open vnto them, as they are to Anatomists, to the end that by the view and contemplation of them, they might iudge of that secret worke of nature which God hath wrought in hearing, which cannot be seene with eyes when it is in doing. For we know by experience whereto serueth a hammer, an anuile, and a taber, and what sound they make when the one striketh, and the other is stricken, and how that hollow things are more fit to receiue sounds, and to cause them to be heard better, then things that are solide and more thicke. So that when we see instruments like to these in the composition of the eares, we may easily iudge, that God hath not placed them there, but to doe that seruice which may be performed by such instruments, to the end we should know the great skill and wisdom of the Workmaster that made them. Now for the conclusion of our speech, let vs learne, that although our eares did vs no more seruice then the eares of brute beafts doe to them, and reached onely to the vse of this life, yet could we not sufficiently acknowledge that good, which God doth to vs by them. But we must make a greater account of this, that by the meanes of his word which he will haue declared to our eares, he causeth them to serue to his honour and glory, & to our owne saluation. Therefore let vs apply these so beautifull & artificiall members, with all the rest of our senses to their principal end, yea to the end of all nature, namely, to the glory of their Maker: & let them be deafe, & stopped vp against all dishonest things that might poison them, & so consequently our minds minds by them. For that which Saint Paul saith, That euill words corrupt good manners, ought to be extended to euery vile, dishonest, and wicked thing which the eares may heare. Wherefore they that abuse them so vilely, deserue that God should pluckethem off, and stoppe them, and make them altogether deafe, not onely their bodily eares, but also those that are spirituall, as hee maketh them blind according to that threatning which hee giueth out by Esay. Now to follow our purpose touching corporal fences & their instruments, I thinke we ought to intreat of the tongue, because it serueth chiefly for speech, whereof we haue already made some mention, & for the sence of taste, in which we must be instructed. Therefore ASER, declare vnto vs the diuers vses of the tongue, and what instruments are necessary both for voice and speech.

Of the diuers vses of the tongue: of the instruments necessary both for voice & speech: how there is a double speech: of the forme thereof: how the spirit of man is represented thereby. Chap. 13.

ASER. If wee were onely of a spirituall nature as the Angels are, it is certaine we should by and by vnderstand one another, by that minde and vnderstanding, wherof we are partakers, as they vnderstand each other; neither should we neede speech, tongue, eares or eyes, to heare & see by, no more then those natures that consist only of spirit, hauing all those things spiritual wherby they communicate both with God & amongst themselves. But we can haue no such communication among our selues by the vnderstanding of the mind & spirit onely, because of that corporall nature which commeth betweene the soules and spirits one of another. Wherefore the help of speech, aswel as of the other externall senses, is very requisite for vs in euery part of life. Also because our soules, being kept vnder our flesh as vnder a veile, vseth cogitations & discourses, it standeth in need of speech, of words & of names, by means of which it may vtter and publish that, that lieth hid as it were in a deepe and darke place, where nothing is seene. Forasmuch therefore as the tongue is the principal instrument, wherby God giueth speech to men, and without which they would be dumbe, and seeing also it serueth the sence of taste as wel as the roose of the mouth, it shal not be without good consideration, if intreating now of this member and of the vse thereof, we place it in the order of our discourses, between the instruments of hearing wherof we spake before, & those of taste, of which we wil speake hereafter, for the agreement it hath with them both.

God hath giue the tongue to man not for one vse alone, but for many: & namely for 3. at the least, which are all necessary for the life of man. The first is to frame the speech: the second for the taste: the third, to help to prepare them meat that is chewed in the mouth for the nourishing of the body. And because the first is the noblest of al, & giuen to man onely, whereas the other twaine are common to him with beasts, I wil begin with that: whereunto this may be added, that because of the conueniencie it hath with the hearing and with the eares, these two matters will agree the better, being ioyned in order one after another. Next we wil handle the other vses that appertaine properly to the sence of taste and to the nourishing of man. Now wee haue first to note that God hath placed many instruments in the body, without which speech could not be wel pronounced & expressed. For first, speech could not be without voice, for the which God hath created many instrumētts that are al necessary for that purpose, as namely the wessell of the throat, the winde-pipe, the throate, the lungs, the breast, & certain back running sinews appointed therunto by reciprocal motiōs. All these parts helpe onely to make the voyce of man, without any framing of speech, except it bee the vessell of the throat, which is a little fleshy and spongie body, in figure like to a pine apple, hanging at the end of the palat, whose vse is manifold. For it serueth first to stay the aire frō rushing in ouer fast & violently into the lungs, & frō entring in too cold & ouer sodainly vnto the. The it serueth also to diuide & distribute the aire whē it ascendeth from the lungs, that it may be the better scattered & disperled into all parts of the mouth. And by this meanes this instrument fashioneth the voice, & causeth it to yeeld a sound, & so prepareth it for the tongue, that it may be articulated & framed into speech by the same. Therefore besides the wessell of the throat which serueth for these two vses, there are fīue other instruments which in regard of this present matter serue only to frame the voice into speech, that otherwise would be but a confused voice. The first is the tongue, which hath the chiefe place among the rest: then the palat, the teeth, the lips, & the nose. For although a man may speak whē he hath not all these parts perfect, yet his speech will not be well framed if he want any one of them, as we see by experience in them that haue lost their teeth, or their lips, or the roofof the mouth, or that haue their nose cut, stuffed, or otherwise troubled. For this cause the Hebrewes name their letters, some guttural, because they are pronounced more in the throat: others, dental, because a man cannot well pronounce them without the teeth: and so they call others, labiall, that is, letters of the lips: and others, letters of the palat, because they cannot be well expressed without those parts of the mouth. The like is in all other languages, albeit they doe not distinguish their letters by such names. Now in such varietie of instruments made for the seruice and vse of one onely thing, we ought to acknowledge the great nobilitie and dignitie of speech, with which God hath indued and honored man aboue al other creatures. For he hath not given it to any of them, but to him only, & by that he hath put a difference betweene him and the beasts; as also by reason and vnderstanding, whereof he hath made him partaker, and in respect whereof he hath given him speech, which is as naturall vnto him as reason, which is the spring-head thereof, and from whence it proceedeth, as a riuer from his fountaine. For how could men make knowne their counsailes and thoughts without speech? And what good should they receiue by that fence and vnderstanding which God hath giuen them more then to beasts, if they had no more speech then they haue, wherby to make it known? And to what purpose would speech serue the, if they knew not what to say? And what should they haue to speak, if they had no more vnderstanding & reason then other living creatures haue? Were it not sufficient then to haue a confused voice onely as they haue? Therefore also we see how God hath ioyned these two things together, granting speech vnto man, because he hath created him partaker of reason and vnderstanding. And hauing deprived beasts of the one, he hath also deprived them of the other, so that they are partakers neither of reason nor speech. For this cause Ecclesiasticks hath ioyned these things together, saying, That God hath giuen to men counsell, and tongue, & eyes, eares, & an heart to vnderstand, & sixtly, hee gaue them a spirit, and senenthy, he gaue them speech to declare his workes. He filled them with knowledge of vnderstanding, and shewed them good and euill. Wherby he teacheth vs plainly, what is the right & true vse of speech, to what end it is giuen to man, & from whence it springeth. For he placeth counsell in the first place, and next the tongue. Againe, after the heart and spirit, he placeth speech, that we might know who is their messenger. Whereupon we may conclude, that the one is giuen for the other, and both to glorifie God, by shewing forth his workes and maruelous acts. To which effect Basil the great saith very well, that God hath created vs and graunted vs the vse of speech, to the end wee might haue ability and meanes to lay open one to another the counsaile and thoughts of our hearts, and to distribute amongst vs that which is in euery one, by reason of that communicable nature in which we are created. For the heart ought to be in man as a secret treasure, or as a larder or pantry in a house, out of which all things necessary for the vse thereof and for the maintenance of the whole family are dayly taken. The hart also is like to a celler or garner, wherein counsels & thoughts are locked and closed vp, and the tongue is like to the steward who draweth out and dispenseth whatsoeuer is to be distributed. For as wee said in the beginning of our speech, our soule vseth thoughts and discourses, which cannot be declared so long as it is inclosed in this tabernacle of flesh, without speech, words, and names, by meanes of which, she bringeth forth and publisheth that which was inclosed & hidden in the secreete closet of her vnderstanding. And so wee say, that there are two kindes of speech in man, one internal and of the minde, the other external, which is pronounced, and is the messenger of the internal, that speaketh in the heart. Therefore that which is framed in voyce, pronounced in speech, & brought into vse, is as a riuer sent from the thought with the voyce, as from his fountain. For before the thought can vtter any outward speech by meane of the voice, first the minde must receiue the images of things presented vnto it by the corporall senses. And then hauing receiued them by the imaginative vertue that is in it, reason must discourse to know & to consider of them well, & to separate or ioyne things according to that agreement or difference, that concord or discord, which they may haue amongst them. Next, it is necessary that iudgement should follow this discourse, to make choice of, & to follow that which it shal iudge to be meete & conuenient, & to reiect & shun the contrary. Lastly, all must bee vttered by significations apt and conuenient for euery thing: so that when the minde hath giuen ouer to the office of the vocall instruments, that which it hath comprised and resolved vpon in maner aforesaide, the same is manifestly declared outwardly by the aire framed into voice, I mean by the moouing of the articulate and distinct voice, whereas before it was hid & cowerd. Now when this voice and speech

Speech is propounded with the mouth, as it is inuisible to the eyes, so it hath no body whereby the hands may take holde of it, but is insensible to all the senses, except the hearing; which neuertheless cannot lay hold of it or keepe it fast, as it were with griping hands, but entring in of it selfe, it is so long detained there whilest the sound reboundeth in the eares, and then vanisheth away suddenly. But albeit the sound & the voice passeth so suddenly, as if presently it flew away, hauing respect to the outward speech, neuertheless the internal speech remaineth, not only in the spirit, hart, & thought that ingendred it, being not in any sort diuided, cut off, or separated, but also it filleth all the hearers, by reason of the agreement that is betweene the spirits & mindes of men, & the speech that is bred there, and because it differeth not much from the minde, & from the thought where it first began and was bred. And thus the thoughts and counsailes of the minde & spirit are discovered & manifested by speech. So that al voice is not speech. For the name of voice generally taken comprehendeth all sounds & things which bring any noyse to the eares. Neuertheless it is more properly and specially attributed to those sounds, which al sorts of liuing creatures are able to make with their throat to signifie any thing therby. But man only hath articulate & well distinguished soundes: vnto which, birdes of all other beastes approach neere, so that even many of them are taught in some sort to frame mans voyce: but it is without vnderstanding. And because that instruments of musick do after a sort imitate the distinct voice of men, wee attribute voice to them: although the sounds which they make be more without iudgement and vnderstanding then that of beastes. But in men, voices framed into wordes are signes and significations of the whole soule and minde, both generally and specially, namely of the fantasie and imagination of reason and iudgement, of vnderstanding & memory, of wil and affections. Wherefore it is an easie matter to iudge by his speech how all these parts are affected, namely, whether they be sound, or haue any defect in them. For if a man bee dull witted, or haue his fantasie and imagination troubled, and his memory slowe and heavy, he shall haue much adoe to speake that which he thinketh and conceineth in his minde, and haue as wee vse to say, but a bad vtterance. VVhich thing may also happen to good wits, either for want of exercise and vse, or through some defect that may be in the body, or in the instruments of the voice, or because the matter whereof they speake may be profound, obscure, and difficult, so that a man cannot easily finde words fitly to expresse the nature of it, as the worthinesse thereof requireth. Which reason oftentimes maketh wise and skilfull men slow to speake, because they know what a hard matter it is to vtter in good sort that which is to be spoken, in so much that they had rather keepe silence, then speake ill or vnproperly. But a light head and a cock-braine that is void of this consideration, will thinke he hath a more ready wit. For he will speake before he ponder or discourse in his minde. So that whosoever hath not a ripe and stayed reason, nor temperate & settled senses, he can not haue his wordes set in good order, nor his speeches well knit and agreeing one with another, as we haue example hereof in children and fooles. And if a man haue reason & iudgement ready at hand, but not stayed and pithy, hee may well prooue some great babbling pleader, but not eloquent. For he onely is to be accompted eloquent, who can conceiue well in his spirit and minde that which he ought to speake, and then is able to expresse it well, both by apt words and by sentences that are well tied and knit together. We see then how the voice and speech of man lay open his whole heart, minde, and spirite. But the voices of beastes haue no significations but onely affections, I meane such as are in men, and which the Grammarians call Interiections, because they are not framed into speech, nor well distinguished as others are. Now if we vnderstand all these things well, they may helpe very much to instruct and confirme vs in the doctrine of the Trinitie of persons, of the Vnity of the Godhead, and of the eternall generation of the Sonne of God, who is his diuine and euerlasting word. Likewise they will cause vs to receiue more easily, how this heavenly and eternal word, namely, Iesus Christ, is the Image and Character of God, the expresse and ingraued forme of his person, as it is in the Epist. to the Heb. & not in shadow or painting. For the glory, maiesty, and vertue of the Father is alwayes hid fro vs, but only so far forth as it sheweth it selfe ingraued in his son & in his word, as the image of the minde appeareth imprinted & ingrauen in the speech that is vttered. And as the internal word bred in the minde departeth not from it neither is separated, & yet it imprinteth an image thereof in the mindes of the hearers, to who it is declared: so the diuine & eternal word begotten of the Father, is alwaies residēt in God, & yet imprinteth his image in the harts & mindes of men, to whom it is manifested by those meanes which hee hath appointed for that purpose. Thus you see a gappe laide open into these high and great secrets of God, which wee ought to marke well, following such phrases of speech as are taken from humane things, & vsed by the spirit of God in the holy scriptures, to the end wee might more easily vnderstand them. Wherefore if there were no other reason, this were sufficient to induce vs to consider more diligently the excellent worke, and great prouidence of God, which appeareth in the framing of the voyce and speech of man, and in the nature and vse thereof, and in those members & instruments of the bodie, which serue to that purpose. Therefore AMANA, let this matter bee the subiect of thy discourse.

Of the agreement which the instruments of the voyce and speech haue with a paire of Organs: what things are to be considered in the placing of the lungs next the heart: of the pipes and instruments of the voyce. Chap. 14

A*MANA*. When we consider diligently all the instruments created by God in the body, as well for the ministry of the voyce as of speech, we shall finde amongst them all things requisite in the best and most perfect instrument of musicke that can bee, to make a good harmony: and we shall know, that no Organs are so well made, or disposed in such good order for the compassing of their sound and melody, as the instruments of the voyce and speech of man are. And by the consideration of this concordance, we are admonished alwayes to haue the same thing in the mouth which we haue in the thought, to the end that from such an agreement, as it were in euery part of an Organ and of an instrument of musicke, there should proceede a good harmony and pleasant melody. For if there should be discord betweene the heart, the tongue, and the speech, the harmony could not be good, especially before God the Iudge of most secret thoughts, no more then the harmonie of a muscicall instrument quite out of tune would be pleasant in the eares of men, and namely of good Musicians, who can iudge best of concords and discords.

First then we must note, that the breast, necke, and head, are as it were the instrument and the body of the Organs, within which they are put and inclosed, & by which they are sustained: next, that the lungs are as it were their bellows to blow them. Therefore it is made of two pieces ioyned together, like to a paire of bellows, to draw in & to thrust forth the aire, and to helpe each other in respiration and breathing. Wherein wee must call to minde how needefull it was, that the backebone and breast, and the building of the ribbes should bee framed in that sort that wee heard before, that they might serue to this vse, and make room for these bellows to enlarge themselves, and to do their duty. Wee see also what their nature is, what motion they haue, and from whence they receiue it. For God hath created them of that nature, that they moue and remoue of themselves, by the vertue of the soule and life in the body, without which they would be voyde of motion, and could not doe their office as we see in dead bodies. And because the lungs are the bellows that blowe winde into the instruments of the voyce, without which it could not bee made, therefore they are lodged next to the heart, so that they cover it, to this end that men should be admonished, that their voyce and their speech is the messenger of their heart: and that for this cause the heart and the mouth, and the voyce and speech which proceede from them, alwayes ought to consent and agree together. For it would be great dissolutenesse, if the heart, which ought to bee the originall and fountaine of the speech, should thinke one thing, and the speech, which is the messenger of the heart, should vtter and declare another. For before the tongue and mouth speake, or speech bee framed in them, it must first bee conceived and bred in the heart and minde, and then brought forth and pronounced by the tongue and mouth. Therefore Elihu saith to Iob, I pray thee heare my talke, and hearken vnto all my words, Behold now, I haue opened my mouth, my tongue hath spoken in my mouth: My words are in the vprightnesse of my heart, and my lips shall speake pure knowledge. We see here, how Elihu ioyneth the heart with the mouth, the tongue, the palat and the lips, all which are instruments of the speech, as wee heard before. Therefore there must alwayes be a good and generall agreement betweene all these things. This good concord beginning in our selues, according to euery mans particular place ought to stretch it selfe generally to all, that we may all agree together, as the spirit of God so often exhorteth vs thereunto in his holy word. And therefore it calleth them, men of double hearts and double tongues, that are not vpright in heart, nor true and certaine in word. Our Lord saietb;

There must be an harmony betwixt the heart and the tongue.

Of the nature of the lungs

Why the hart & speech must agree together.

out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh, and that a good man out of the good treasure of his heart bringeth forth good things, and an evil man out of an evil treasure bringeth forth evil things. For as the tree is knowne by his fruite, so speech maketh manifest both the heart and mind of a man. Therefore he shall be a great deale better knowne by his speech, then by the sight of his face. For his face doth not so well lay open to the eyes his heart, minde, and manners, as his speech discloseth them to the eares: as we may iudge by that which we learned to this effect in the former discourse. Therefore before the bellows of the lungs blow to frame afterward voice and speech in the tongue and mouth, the draught must bee first drawne and framed in the heart, that the tongue and mouth may represent and expresse it afterward: otherwise they will speake to no purpose, but onely giue testimony, that there is little wisdom and vpright affection in the heart. Herofit is, that Salomon sheweth oftentimes, that a wise mans tongue is not lightly set on worke without the direction & counsaile of the hart and minde, whose seruant and messenger it ought to bee: but a foole powreth forth all his minde at once. For he vttereth al that commeth in his mouth, and speaketh before he hath considered what he ought to say, so that his words are sooner spoken then thought vpon. The heart of the wise guideth his mouth wisely, and addeth doctrine to his lippes. Faire words are as an hony combe, sweetnesse to the soule and health to the bones. The wise in heart shall be called prudent: and the sweetnesse of the lippes shall increase doctrine. A wise man concealeth knowledge: but the heart of a foole publisheth foolishnesse. A foole powreth out all his minde: but a wise man keepeth it in till after. There are many such like places in the Prouerbe, which I could alledge to this purpose. And we know what is commonly spoken when a man speaketh of a good affection and in truth that he speaketh from his heart: but if hee bee knowne to be a lyar, crafty, and deceitfull, we say that he speaketh not from his heart. Which is as much as if one should say, that the same thing is not in his heart, which he hath in his mouth. Although in truth when those speeches are thought vpon before, such contrarieties are found as well in the heart as in the tongue and mouth. For if they were not first in that, they would not be in the tongue which is the messenger of the heart. This is the cause of that double heart which wee said was in wicked, close, and disguised persons. You see then what we haue to note, both in regard of the bellows that blow the Organs of mans body, and also of the player that ought to blow and direct them. Now let vs speake of the instruments and pipes into which the waide and breath of these bellows doth enter, and giueth motion and conuenient sound to every one of them. They haue ben named all vnto vs before. Wherefore we haue to consider of that pipe which is called the rough Artery or wind-pipe, which is made like to a flue, and in regard of the matter, is of the nature of a gristle and of skin. It was necessarie that it should be of such matter, because it is to moue when it receiue in, or giueth out the aire, and to be enlarged or restrained as neede requireth. Needfull therefore it was that it should bee compounded of such skins as are easie to moue, and to open, and shut, and which might serue for soft and tender ligaments. And because the voyce cannot be framed, if the aire whereof it is made, be not beaten backe with some thing, it was in like maner requisite, that some gristles should be mingled therewith, and linked together: as it was needfull for the eares to be made winding in that the aire might rebound the better, and receiue the sounds, as we heard before. For this cause it is called a rough artery, as well in respect of the matter whereof it is compounded, as of the figure. For it is made after the maner of small circles and rings, placed in a ranke one by another throughout the whole length thereof, like to the taile of a Crevis: and that with such moderation, that it is thicke, slender and drie, according as neede requireth to make the voyce of a reasonable bignesse. If it bee to drie, it maketh the voyce shrill and hard to bee pronounced: as experience sheweth in hring feauers, and in great droughts. Again the pipe therof is larger beneath then aboue, and so lesseneth vpward where neede is, like to the pipe of a Bag pipe, to the end that the last should neither be too slow and weake in ascending, nor yet ouer hastie and sodaine. If it be slow and languishing, it will turne to winde without any noyse and sound: and if bee hastie and sodaine, it will breede sighes in stead of voyce: as it falleth out to them that are diseased and weake whose breath is short, and to olde men, who haue small vertue of respiration, and much lesse of singing. Therefore some expound that place of Ecclesiastes where it is said, that all the daughters of singing shall be abased, of the voyce of olde men, and of the instruments which breed and pronounce it, and of their vertue and strength: although others will haue it to be vnderstood of the eares. But it may be referred to them both. Now the principall instrument of the voyce is in the head of the rough artery, namely in that place which is commonly called the knot or ioynt of the necke, or Adams morsell, being fashioned like to an Almaine flute. I abstaine from speaking more specially of the rest of these pipes and instruments, which are onely quils to receiue the blowing of the lungs, as also of the three gristles, which make the distinction of the voyce, and namely that in the midst, which in forme is like to that end of the bag-pipe that is put into the mouth, or like to the lips of certaine pots made to powre out wine, or of oyle pots and such like things, as we may see in Apothecaries earthen pots.

Besides, in the midst of that gristle, there is a deepe slit or cleft called glottis, that is, a little tongue, because it is the proper instrument of the voyce, and hath both the sides enlarged or closed vp by muscles proper to that vse & purpose. As touching the gristle before, it is fashioned like to a little shield, so that a man may both see and touch it in the necke. That which is behinde, is of the fashion of a ring which is put vpon the thumb. And as these gristles are dilated and opened, or pressed and shut by their muscles, especially both the sides of that cleft whereof I spake even now, so do they make the diuersities of voices. For as when they are opened, they make the voice big and obscure, as it were the base in singing: so contrariwise when they are pressed, they make it small, cleere, and shrill, like to the countertenor: and as they are more or lesse restrained or opened, so they make diuers notes of the voice, as the tenor, the meane, and such like. And because the pipes cannot make this variety of voyces in this cleft, therefore there are chinkes which serue for the same purpose. In this sort then, this instrument of the voyce, which is placed in the top of the artery and called Larinx by the Physicians, being aided by gristles and their muscles, and by that little tongue whereof I spake not long before, together with these chinkes, frameth of it selfe as many sundry voices and notes as all the pipes and flutes of a paire of Organs being set together, and furnished with all sorts of pipes, both great, small, and meane. Wherein wee see a wondrous full prouidence of God, whether wee consider the instruments named by vs, or the place that containeth them. For the arterie, which commeth vp from the lights to the throat, occupieth but one part of the necke: and yet it doth as much alone, taking it whole with the other instruments of which I haue spoken, as a whole paire of Organs. For in a paire of Organs there must be many pipes, some great, some small, and others of a middle sort that are greater or lesser as it falleth out, according to the diuersity of notes for which they are made because they cannot be either enlarged or restrained, open or shut, but as they are first framed. Therefore there needeth as many of each sort as the parts of Musicke are diuers, and as there wanteth variety of notes to fill euery place, and to furnish both the base and the meane, the tenor and the countertenour. But, as might be gathered by our speech, the pipe and instrument of the voyce is made of such a fashion, that when a man is disposed, he may enlarge it for the base, and then restrain it for a countertenor, or else open and shut it in middle sort either more or lesse to make the tenor or the meane, and to cause the voice to ascend and descend according to those notes and tunes which hee would haue it make, and that by the meanes before touched. The like may be done in speech. For as euery one is disposed to lift vp or to depresse his voice, to enlarge or restrain the pipes & instruments thereof, hee may speake either higher or lower, bigger or smaller, or clearer, and set what sound, tune, and accent he please vpon the speech, which hee will pronounce. Wherefore we may very well say, that euery one carrieth about with him and within himselfe very faire and strange Organes, vpon which he may play at all houres at his pleasure, either in singing or speaking: yea they are so whole and perfect, that they want neither the bellows, nor the cros beame, nor the cords, nor the hollownes for sound, nor the seate, nor the pots, nor the porters, nor the bearer of the keyes, nor the table wheron they are set, nor the Organ pipes. For all this is in a few small instrumētts which discharge their duties, yea they are more perfect in man then in any artificiall Organs. And if any organ-maker could, I will not ly make such, but only counterfeite them, and make as many sundry sounds and tunes with one pipe, as others do with many, all men would greatly admire such a workeman & his worke, especially Organists & Musicians that vnderstood the art of musick. How much more tō ought we to admire that great and diuine Organist, that hath made those goodly Organes of mans body, & given them such a good sound? And how greatly ought we to desire, that they may be the true temples of God, & good Organ-players therein, to cause these faire Organs to sound againe, and to sing and preach his prayes by them? For I doubt not but that these are the true Organs, whereby he will be praised and glorified by vs. But there is yet a great deale more to be considered of this matter, of which both this and the former discourse hath bin made. For these Organs being prepared as I haue set them in sight, haue nothing more then the sound of the voice, as it were an instrument, without speech. Wherefore we must now make a speaking instrument, which hath not his like neither in all the workes of nature, neither in all humane and artificiall workes. This Art and office belongeth properly to the tongue, of whose nature and vse, and of the excellencie and vtility of the Art it hath, which is the speech, thou ARAM shalt giue vs some profitable instruction.

Of the tongue, and of the nature and office thereof: of the excellencie, and profite of speech which is the Art of the tongue; what is to be considered touching the situation therof in the head, and neere the braine. Chap. 15.

ARAM. The Ancients being desirous to extol eloquence, very much propounded the image of an Orator, as it were of one that spake of gold, who in speaking drew out a golden chaine, which comming from his tongue was fastened to the eares of a great many men that heard him, whereby hee drew and led them after him whither he would. Thus they compared the speech and eloquence of an Orator to a chaine of golde, because of the vertue and power which it hath with men, being able to keepe and stay them, to moderate their affections, and to guide and gouernethem easily without force and violence, as if one should leade them tyed with a chaine, whom they would voluntarily follow not being constrained, but onely of their owne good will, which neuertheles should be so drawn that it could not resist. As indeed that perswasion which proceedeth from speech draweth the wills and affections of men, with a sweete and pleasant kinde of violence, which they follow with great desire, and cannot gainsay it. Now this art and office belongeth properly to the tongue, of which we are now to speake.

The tongue then is a fleshy and muscly member, but soft and like to the substance of a toad-stoole, being full of sinewes, arteries, and veines. For it had neede haue good store of sinewes, both because of those sundry motions which it hath necessarily, as also for the sense of tast and of touching, which agree to the nature thereof. Likewise it had neede of many arteries, that so it might haue great abundance of spirite and heate, by reason of the diuersitie of motions which it hath. And to the end it should not want nourishment, it hath in like manner great plenty of veines: and that it should not dry vp through continuall moouing, it hath humidity to wet and moisten it. Wherupon we ought to note wel the providence of God in this, that although spittle be but an excrement & superfluity, which partly distilleth from the braine into the throate, & partly is sent vp thither fro the boiling stomake, yet it is not vnprofitable, because it wetteth & moisteneth the tongue. For being very dry it is more slow in moouing, as we see by experience in them that are subiect to great drought. Therefore God hath provided a remedie for that inconuenience, by meanes of two fleshy kernels like to sponges, on each side one at the roote of the tongue, which are commonly called Almonds because they are fashioned like vnto them: these through passages ordayned for that purpose moysten all parts of the mouth. Moreover, the tongue is tyed to a forked bone with many muscles by two branches, which hold it vp as it were two neere pillars, and that with such a counterpoysse, that it can mooue and remoue it selfe equally on each side. For if it were tyed by one branch onely, it could not keepe it selfe vpright, but should go crossewise only from one side. But God hath provided very well for that: and if we did know and consider it wel, we are admonished thereby, that speech pronounced by our tongue ought first to bee well weighed as it were in a ballance, to the end it decline not, or turne on any side more then it ought, but holde it selfe vpright, and directly follow reason. Moreover, it cannot easily be declared, by what Art the tongue stretcheth forth it selfe so diuersly by the meanes of muscles, and how it hath so many sortes of motions from all sides, so ready, and so sodaine, and for so many things as it hath both to speake and to doe. But it is farre more difficult, yea impossible to tell the causes, how a man can by the tongue frame so many sortes of words and so diuers, which are as it were the markes and paintings, not onely of all visible things, but also of all things inuisible, & of al the thoughts of mā. For if we would intreate of any matter one with another, we know already by that which hath bin spokē, how it can hardly be done without speech, as also that we cannot speake without certain words & names to name and signifie those things by, whereof we minde to speake. For if we have no wordes and names to make them knowne by, we must alwaies haue the things themselues present, that we may point at them with the finger, which is impossible. And although it were so that we had them alwaies before our eies, yet that were not sufficient. For we should be forced to speake to the eyes by signes, & yet we could neuer without comparifon inuent so many signes, nor counterfait and imagine so many things with all the sences and members of our body, as the tongue alone would affoorde vs by meanes of speech. For it giueth a name to euery thing. Therefore it is able to make the natures of things knowne, and to set before vs as well things absent as present, inuisible as visible, spirituall as corporall. In a worde, God hath giuen this benefite to man, by meanes of the tongue and the eares, that they can represent one to another, and cause each other to know and vnderstand as well diuine thinges as humane. And although God made this diuersity and confusion of languages amongst men, to punish them for their arrogancy and ingratitude, neuerthelesse hee hath so provided for this euill, that he hath manifested the more his great goodnesse towards them, and the riches of his eternall prouidence, by that knowledge of so many sundry tongues which he hath giuen them, and chiefly that by them his Gospell might be published. And if this benefite of God be worthy of great admiration, ought we not also to maruaile much at this, that such a varietie of sounds proceeding out of the mouth of man, can be comprehended in so small a number of letters, whereby so many sorts of words, and such diuers languages are expressed? By this meanes also, we see that speech, which cannot bee perceived by any of the sences but by the eares, is made as it were visible, so that by the helpe of letters a man may speake to the eies, and not see them, as hee may also to the eares by meanes of the voice. And although voice and speech flie into the aire as if they had wings, inso much that a man can neither behold them with his eies, nor smell them with his nose, nor holde them with his hands; neuerthelesse speech is kept still before the eyes, and may be called backe when a man will by meanes of writing, and by the benefite of letters. Yea, it may be sent to them that are absent, and as far as one will, that they may vnderstand it, euen to them also that are not yet borne. For wee see how our predecesours teach vs after their death by their bookes and writings, and how by this meanes their words are not onely visible vnto vs, but also as it were immortal. Wherefore the lesse wee can conceine how this may be done by the tongue and by letters, the more ought we to wonder at this great worke of God in man, praise him for it, and giue him thanks. Now albeit the eye of our vnderstanding dazell, and cannot wholly comprehend this worke of God, neuerthelesse we see this well enough, that the tongue doth so helpe to frame the voice into speech, and to make the diuersitie of wordes whereof speech is compounded, as the hands and fingers of the Organ-player who toucheth the Organs, and of the Musicion that playeth vpon an instrument of Musicke whatsoever it bee, serueth to cause the sound thereof to be heard. For although, when one bloweth the Organs, the pipes thereof will yeelde diuers soundes and tunes, if they bee open, according as they are either great or small, long or short, wide or narrow, as wee haue saide: yet these sounds will bee but confused, without harmony and melody, if the Organist doth not play with his hands, thereby to dispenche as neede requireth that winde and breath which is to bee distributed into the pipes, and if he touch not the keyes of the Organs according to those tunes & notes, which he would haue the pipes to make, following the Arte of Musicke. And this wee may see yet more plainly in a bagpipe. For although it soundeth by reason of the winde, within the leather bag, which receiueth and keepeth it as it were a little sacke, yet it alwaies yeeldeth forth but one sound, without distinction and harmonie, vntill the Minstrell play with his fingers vpon the holes of the pipe that belongeth vnto it. Therefore as there is great difference betweene a simple confused voice, and that which is distinct and artificiall, so is there betweene voice and speech. So that when the tongue hath receiued the wind & breath, which ascendeth vp from the lunges by the rough Artery, and is fashioned into voice by the means afore mentioned: then it formeth the same afterward into distinct speech by such an Art and Science, as none can vnderstand, much lesse expresse it, but GOD onely, who hath giuen, it to the tongue, in which consisteth the chiefe dignitie thereof. For it is that science, which is the mother of Eloquence, which men haue in such great admiration: and because of this, the Artes of Grammer, Logicke, and Rhetoricke haue beene published by the best learned men. For all these three Artes are specially appointed for speech: the one to make it proper pure, and neate, namely Grammer, the other, namely Logicke, to knitte wel together all discourses made by speech, and all sentences in them, according as they agree among themselves selves, depend and follow one another, and are grounded vpon good reason: Thirdly, Rhetoricke is ioyned vnto them, to adorne and polish speech, to make it more significant and very eloquent: so that whereas Logicke maketh speech as it were a simple picture, that hath nothing but bare draughts, which serue to make it whole, and furnished in regard of euery part and lineament thereof, Rhetoricke maketh it not onely as it were a picture wel set forth with faire and liuely colours of all sortes, but also adorned and enriched with goodly hills and dales and such like paintings, that it may shewe the better, and bee made fairer and pleasanter, to beholde. Wherefore as there is great difference to looke vpon betweene these two pictures, so is there of speech in respectes of the eares, as it is propounded either more plainely and simply, or more decked and garnished. For this cause seeing God hath vouchsafed vs so much honour as to giue vs speech, especially to praise and glorifie him with our tongue, and for to benefit the common society of men, wee must not bee content onely to speake, but wee must study to speake well, in fit tearmes, and wisely, to the glory of God, and to the good and profit as well of our selues as of them that heare vs. This cannot be done but by the knowledge of God & of his word, without which all the Logicke and Rhetoricke of men is but vaine babbling. But when the one is ioyned with the other, and the artes that teach men to speake elegantly are applyed to this purpose, then is the vse thereof very good, and woorthy of great commendation. Therefore we must acknowledge our selues to bee as it were Organ-pipes, hauing of our selues neither sound, nor voyce, nor tongue, nor mouth to speake of God, and of his workes as we ought, and to praise and glorifie him, but onely so farre forth as hee beeing the Organ-player bloweth within, and inspireth vs by his holy Spirit, giuing vnto vs wisdom and tongue and mouth, and vertue in speaking. Nowe heere wee must not onely call to mind what wee haue already spoken of the causes, why the lungs, which is one chiefe instrument of the voice, & without which it cannot be made, is placed so neere the heart, but also we must consider how neere the tongue & the instruments of voice and speech next vnto it, are vnto the braine, wherein is the principall seate of the spirit, and which is chiefly assigned to the mind of man, & to that part of his soule that is most diuine. For seeing God would haue the tongue to be the messenger, & as it were the interpreter of the spirit & minde, and of all the thoughts thereof, that men might teach one another both the knowledge of God his worship, and of all other good things, and seeing he would haue speech to bee the bond of humane societie and of that communication, which men ought to haue one with another, therefore it was very requisite, that being the instrument of speaking it should be neere the braine, which is the lodging of all the internal sences, of which, if God wil, we will intreate hereafter in their place. For as all the external sences doe carrie to the internal, and the bodily to the spiritual, whatsoeuer they perceiue by sence according to their nature and office, thereby to admonish and instruct them, that they may thinke and iudge thereof and lay it vp in memory: so the internal and spirituall sences carry the same things afterward to the tongue, that it might declare and make them known to those, vnto whom they would communicate their minde and cogitation. Hereof it is, that the tongue is oftentimes taken for doctrine, and for all speech both good and euill: in which sence Salomon taketh it when he saith, The tongue of the wicked shall perish. And S. Paul calleth speaking with the spirit and with vnderstanding also, when such a language is vsed as is vnderstoode of euery one, and which serueth to the edification of them that heare it. Therefore the tongue must not stirre, nor the mouth open it selfe to speake, before it haue received a commandement and charge from reason, which is the Lady and mistresse thereof, to guide and gouerne it, whose messenger and seruant it is to giue notice of that which the reason and minde would haue knownen. Wherefore it is very conuenient that the lady and mistresse of the tongue should haue her lodging ouer and neere about her, and not to be farre from her, to the end she forget not herselfe, nor attempt any thing without a commandement from reason. So that as before we gaue the heart to be the gouernour, guide, and counsaillour of the tongue: so now we appoint the braine as lord and master thereof, to the end it should haue a good guide both aboue and beneath it. For no member in all the body hath greater neede. Therefore S. James calleth the tongue a fire, yea a world of iniquitie, which defileth the whole body, and setteth on fire the course of nature, and is set on fire of hell. Such are the fruits of an vnbridled tongue that is misled & ill gouerned: as contrariwise it is an excellent treasure in man, when it is moderated and vsed wisely and soberly, and in time and place conuenient as neede requireth. Why the tong is so fashioned & fenced

on euery side

these things God giueth vs good instructions in the matter and composition of this member. For first, hee doth not content himselfe in giuing to man but one onely tongue for so many offices as are assigned vnto it, whereas many other members are double, and yet serue chiefly but for one thing: but also hath made it tender, soft and pleasant, and tied it fast with many bands, as it were so many small cords and threeds, to restraine and bridle it, to the end it should not runne ouer or be too forward, and that it should not bring forth bitternes in steade of sweetnes, nor pricke and hurt any body. Therefore it is made blunt on euery side, not sharpe or forked, like to the stings of Scorpions and other venomous beasts. Moreouer it hath the gums and teeth, with which it is inuironed & closed in on euery side as it were with a quick-set, and with a strong rampire to keep it fast shut within the bounds and limits thereof, as it were within a caue. Besides it hath lips as it were gates to open vnto it, or to shut it vp and muzzle it, least it should take too much licence. Therefore seeing God doth garde the tong so on euery side, he giueth men to vnderstand that they ought not to abuse it, and teacheth them what care they ought to haue of this little member, seeing that of al the outward members, none is so hid, couered, compassed about, & locked vp with such a naturall covering and inclosure, as that is. And to end our speech, we know that when the hart & minde, which ought to be the guides & gouernors of the tong, shall be reformed in purity and true knowledge of God by his grace, there wil be nothing but good spech & al truth in the tong, to the setting forth of the glory of his diuine Maiesly, and to the profit of euery one according to the duty of true charity. But if the mind and heart be euil, and blinded with error and ignorance, they wil bring forth like fruites and speeches. Now hauing discoursed at large of the first office of the tongue, which consisteth in framing of the speech, we must consider of the other two vses thereof, which are in tasting, & in preparing meat that is chewed in the mouth for the nourishment of the body. Therefore, thou shalt begin, ACHITO B, to discourse of these two offices, & of those instruments, which serue the tongue to this purpose.

Of the office of the tongue in tasting, and in preparing meate for the nourishment of the body: of the teeth, and of their nature and office: of the conduite or pipe that recei-ueth & swalloweth downe meate. Chap. 16.

ACHITO B. The more we consider the worke and providence of God in the composition of mans body, the more we shall maruaile at it, and daily finde therein new matter and occasion to glorifie his name. Before we considered thereof, as of the frame of an house: now we shall see it as it were a towne or city that hath Milles and Ouens, and Artificers of all arts and occupations. And, which is more wonderfull, we shall perceiue such industry in many of the members, that oftentimes one alone will serue for many offices, for the due performance whereof mans reason would require many members: and yet God hath so well provided therefore, that one alone doth better discharge them, and with lesse trouble then many together could doe. Which may euidently be knowne by those vses and offices of the tongue, whereof we are yet to intreate.

mouth is the fittest place for the tong.

The office of the tongue.

One, and that the chiefest reason why the tongue is fitly placed in the head neere the braine, was declared vnto vs in the former speech: now we must note others, especially why it is necessary that it should be in the mouth, as likewise in the head. For the tongue could not haue satisfied any one office committed vnto it, if it had bene placed barely and openly in the face, as the eyes, nose, or eares are. And seeing it was requisite to haue it couered, it could haue no better couering then the mouth, as may be proued by many reasons. The first is, that seeing it is the instrument of speech, which must be holpen by many other parts to haue it well framed, as we heard before, it was to be lodged in a place where it might haue neare at hand all instruments needefull for that seruice. Now this vse of speech is proper to the tongue of man onely, and not to that of brute beasts: but to the other twaine following, are common to man with beasts; namely the sense of taste, for which God hath appointed both that and the pallat: to which cause it was requisit also that it should be neare the brain and in the head, as the other instruments and members of the senses are, as also in the place appointed for the preparation of bodily food. For it must first iudge of tastes and discern betweene good and bad meate, and betweene good and bad drinckes, to the end, that what-whatsoever is good for the nourishment of the body, may be kept, and that which is bad, rejected: and that afterward, which is the last office, it may helpe the teeth and mouth to chew the meate, and so to swallow it down. For the iawes and teeth are as it were the stones of the mill, which serue to prepare the meate for all the body. Wherefore as there are two stones in every mill, namely, one beneath, which abideth alwaies stedfast, & turneth no way, and another above, which alwaies turneth about to bruze & grind the graines of wheat that are betwene them: so in the mil of mans body there are two iawes like to two millstones, of which the one is alwaies firme, & the other mooueth. But there is this difference betwene these & millstones, that the neather iaw onely mooueth, which is true, not only in man, but also in all other living creatures, except in the Crocodile, who in this point quite differeth frō all other living creatures that haue iawes & teeth. Now God hath so appointed this motion of the mill stones of mans body not without good reason. For seeing the braine is so neere, & that there are so many goodly members in the head about the vppermost iawe bone, it were to be feared, that the continuall and great moouing thereof would shake them, and bring them into some inconuenience. And that the iawes might bruze & breake whatsoever is put betwene them, as the stones of the mill grinde the graines of corne, the teeth are planted in them to serue them in this worke.

Of the mil of mans body.

And in steade of winde or water, which driue artificiall mills about, this natural mill of which we speake, hath his muscles and sinewes to mooue it, and to set it a working when neede requireth. For this cause Salomon, meaning to shew the defect of teeth in olde age, & what small strength old men haue to chew their meate, saith, that the grinders shall cease because they are few, and the doores shall be shut without by the base sound of the grinding. These doores are the lips, because they serue the mouth, and the mill which is within them. For wee vnderstand by the mouth, all that is from the lips vnto the throat & winde pipe; whereid not onely the mil of mans body is contained, but also as it were a part of the bake-house, in which the meat that is grinded is to be kneaded, & so made ready for the ouen, that afterward it may be baked in the stomake, which is as it were the ouen and kitchen of the whole body to dresse meate for it, wherewith all the members thereof are to be fed & nourished. For foode cannot nourish the body if it still continue such as it is put into the mouth, vnles it be better prepared & dressed in such sort, that it may easily be turned into the substance of the body that receiue it. As then the iawes & teeth are the mill & millstones, which bruze & turne to meale the wheate that is put betwene them, that is to say, all kinde of meates, both hard and tender, for the nourishing of the body: so we may say, that the tongue in this respect playeth the miller, and serueth in stead of a hopper, into which those graines that otherwise would skatter from betwene the millstones are put that they may be ground. For when the meate falleth on any side frō betwene the teeth, the tongue serueth to send it backe againe, that it may be well chewed, & not auoid the grinding of the iawes & teeth. Thus we daily come to greater knowledge of strange instruments in the body of man. For we heard before what Organs & what kind of muscicall instrument God hath made in him for the voice & for speech: now we may see how there are within him, a mill and a miller, a bakehouse and a kitchen. Hereupon we ought to thinke, that the Master & maker of these, hath not created the that they should be idle, as though he had giuen them nothing to grinde, or to bake. For he is no such workmaster as to make any worke, & not to set it a working, or to leaue it vnfurnished of things necessary: neither any such master or Lord, but that he can easily doe it. Wherefore although there are as many of these milles and ouens, as there are not only reasonable creatures but also beastes, and although he hath vndertaken to maintaine them alwaies, euen from the creation of the world vntil the consummation thereof, yet he neuer wanted matter to set them on worke when it pleased him. Hereby wee may know whether wee haue a rich Father or no, and what cause we haue to feare that he will leaue our milles and ouens emptie, although we had many houses full of them, as indeed we haue in our selues, our wiues & children, so long as we acknowledge him to be such a one, and that we yeeld obedience vnto him, as becometh his children. But wee haue further to note, that as our mill is not without a Miller, & such tooles as are necessary for him, so the Ouen & Kitchen haue their Baker & cooks. For first, the teeth do not only serue for a mill, but they discharge some part of a cooks office, because the more they chop the meat, & chew it wel, it is the better prepared for the stomack to bake it so much the sooner. Therefore we say commonly, that the first preparation & digestion of meat is made in the teeth. For this cause God hath giuen a great number of them to man, & hath made them of bone, & distinguished them into sundry sorts, according to that office whereunto he hath assigned euery one of them. For right afore there are foure aboue, and as many beneath, that are broad, sharpe & cutting, which are called Incisorie teeth, because they are apt to diuide and to cut the meate as a knife doth: and these haue but one roote. Then there are other twaine on each side commonly called Dogg-teeth, because they resemble teeth of dogges, which are broad towards their roote, but sharpe and pointed aboue: and these also haue but one roote of a reasonable length. Their office is to breake the meates and other things, which by reason of their ouer great hardnesse could not be cut by the first. Next, the other teeth are appointed to bruze very small those meates, which haue already passed through the former, euen as millstones bruze wheate. Therefore they are sharpe, broad, hard, and great, and haue more rootes then the other. And because of the similitude which they haue with millstones, they are called by the same name both of the Grecians and Latines, as also Lawe-teeth and grinders. All teeth are planted in the Lawe-bones by meanes of the Gummies, being fastened within them, as it were nailes, so that they cannot easily be moued, shaken, or plucked out. And although bones naturally haue no feeling, yet teeth are very sensible, by reason of certaine branches or small soft sinewes which enter into their substance. For this feeling is necessarie for them, both because they are bare and couered with flesh, as other bones are as also for the meates sake & for taste: as they that in some sort are seruiceable to the tast, as well as all the other parts of the mouth. Thus you see how the teeth serue at one time both for a mill and a cooke together with the tongue & the rest of the mouth. Again, the tongue serueth for a baker, hauing this office laide vpon it, together the meate together after it is well ground and chewed, and to fashion it round like to pilles or small loues that are yet but dough, to this end that it may with more ease be swallowed downe. Wherein it dealeth like a Baker, who first fashioneth his bread into loues. Next it plaith the part of a baker and of a peelee both together, as that which setteth in the meate, and causerh it to descend into the stomacke, which is the ouen wherein it must bee baked, that afterward it may nourish the whole bodie. For this cause it was necessarie that the tongue both in breadth and length, should bee answerable to the whole mouth in such sort, that it might touch all parts of it to discharge so many offices.

Wee see then that mans bodie is not onely like to such a frame of a house as we considered of before, but also like to a great Citie, wherein there are Milles and Ouens, and Artificers of all occupations.

Now vpon this that hath bin discoursed touching this last vse of the tongue in preparing and swallowing downe meate, we must further note, that as there is a pipe that reacheth fro the lungs vnto the mouth for respiration, & for the breath of the voice, as hath bin declared vnto vs: so there is another from the stomake vnto the same place, properly called the Gullet which the Phisicians commonly call by the Greeke name δυσίπυλός: whose office is to carry the meates & drinke into the stomacke. And as the other pipe is in the former part of the necke, that it may goe right to the mouth to draw in the aire, so this second is behinde in the necke, that it may keepe more heate in it, and it is longer then the first. Neuerthelesse, many thinke that there is but one pipe for breath and for meate and drinke: as there are some also, who albeit they know well there are twaine, yet they suppose that the one is for meate, and the other for drinke, that the lightes also might be moystened thereby. Yea, there haue beene skilfull and great Philosophers, who seeme to haue beene in this error, or at leastwise hath disputed thereof. But because GOD hath so distinguished these passages, and that the first is the breathing pipe, for the reason vttered before, this excellent Workemaster hath made another little instrument, called Epiglot by the Phisicians, made of gristly matter, reasonable harde, and fashioned like to a little tongue that is of a triangle forme, or like to an yuie leafe. This instrument serueth to couer the pipe for breath at the very top of Larinx, as it were a couer of a pot. It serueth the pipe to this vse, not to keepe euery thing out of it, but to suffer no meate or drinke, or any other thing to enter in, in any such quantitie as might hinder breathing and respiration. For a little thing will stoppe a mans breath and strangle him, as appeareth in those whome Histories affirme to haue beene strangled, some by a little haire, others by a stone of a grape, some in supping vp milke, and others by such like trifles. Yea many times wee haue experience of this perill when wee eate and drinke, if neuer so little meate or drinke enter into this passage. Therefore God teacheth vs two things thereby: the first is, vpon what a slender threed our life dependeth, seeing so little a matter is sufficient to deprive vs of it.

The

The other is to admonish vs how quiet and sober wee ought to be in eating and drinking, not gluttonlike; and also in speaking, when we take our refection. For then is the danger greatest, if we speake whilest we eat: because we cannot speake without voice, nor haue voice without breathing, nor breath without opening this little couer. And because the breathing pipe is formost, the meat and drinke must needs passe ouer this little tong as it were ouer a little drawbridge. So that if the small couer were lift vp and opened, in stead of going beyond the pipe of breathing, it would enter into it. But it must not be so fast shut vp, but that breath may alwaies issue out, and that some thin humour and liquor may enter in, to moisten and supple both the artery and the lungs: otherwise potions appointed for that purpose by the Phisicians, were vaine and vnprofitable. Hauing now spoken sufficiently of those instruments which are seruiceable to voice and speech, and of all the proper offices of the tongue, it will be thy part, AS ER, to morrow, to take in hand againe, and to pursue our matter of the senses, and of their instruments, and first to instruct vs what the sense of taste is, and what the palat is that serueth it.

The end of the second daies worke.

The third daies worke.

Of the sense of taste giuen to the Palat: what tastes are good to nourish the body: of the diuer sitie of them: of hunger and thirst, and of their causes. Chap. 17.

AS ER. It is wonderfull that God causeth al things whatsoeuer they be to serue his work in such sort, that nothing is in vaine, idle or vnprofitable: wherof we haue already seene many testimonies in our former discourses of the least parts of the body. But, which is yet more wonderful in his prouidence, he hath created, made & disposed nothing throughout al nature without great order, excellent measure, & moderation in al things: which gaue occasion to the first Philosophers to call the whole frame of the world, Mundus, which is as much to say, as an Ornament, or a well disposed order of all things. Wherby God would haue vs especially learne to know, how greatly order pleaseth him and how he abhorreth all disorder and confusion, and how greatly he desireth, that men after his example, should obserue measure and moderation in al their works. Hereof we may haue a goodly instruction in this place, if we consider how al the senses, & namely, the taste with those sauiory relishes that agree with it, receiue their strength, vertue and nature from all the elements, according to that agreement, which their nature and offices haue with them: as also what pleasure wee take in the relish of all things, when it agreeth with our taste: and contrariwise how it troubleth vs, when it is vnpleasant and not agreeable to our taste.

Yesterday we discoursed of the corporall senses, and of their members and instruments: wherupon we spake of the tong, both because of the agreemēt it hath with the eares by reason of speech, as also because it is the instrument of taste together with the palat, which is the vpper part of the mouth, made like to a pretty vaute, and to a little heaven. Therefore Iob said, Doth not the eare discern the words, and the palat taste meat for it selfe? And againe, The eare trieth the words as the mouth tasteth meat. The sense of taste then is that sense, wherby the mouth iudgeth of all kindes of tastes, which are many in number. And this is a notable gift of God, in that he hath giuen such relishes to meates and drinckes, whereby not onely men, but also all liuing creatures can presently know by their taste what things are good to eat & drinke, and what are otherwise. For if God had not giuen the sense of taste to all liuing creatures, that they might iudgetherby of al meates & drinckes, what would their life be? But we are to know this thing further, that men iudge by their taste, not only of such things as may serue to nourish them, but also of medicines. For Phisicians know the qualities of herbs & simples more by their taste, then by any other sense: afterward by this knowledge they iudge easily of their natures & properties, & for what remedies & vses of Phisicke they will serue. Therefore this iudgment of the tast is very necessary for the life of mā, especially for the nourishmēt of all liuing creatures: because all things which the earth bringeth forth are not good to feede them. For some things are diuers fro nourishment, as earth, clay, wood & stones: other things are altogether vnauory, and haue no taste, and some haue but a very little. But God hath provided a remedie for this, by the meanes of salt, and of sundry sortes of sauces and spices, wherby they may be made to haue a pleasant taste. There are some things also, which are cleane contrary, either by reason of their euill taste, as gall and wormewood, or else because of the hurt which they may bring with them, as those things that are venomous, and very poison. But God hath very well met with this inconuenience both by this gift of the sence of tasting, and also by putting into such things as might hurt either man or any other living creature, a certaine qualitie, which we call relish or taste, that is contrary and very vnpleasant to the sence of tasting: as likewise hee hath giuen to those things that are healthful and good to nourish, a relish that is agreeable and pleasant to our taste, if it be not corrupted, either by sickenes, or by some vnbrideled appetite: the like is to be said of the spittle, which beside the vse before named, hath this also, that it helpeth the taste. Wherefore if it be already infected with some euill taste, it will not well receiue others, but will cause euery thing to bee of the same taste wherewith it is infected and corrupted. Now those things are most sauorie, and haue the best relish, that haue in them the best mixture of heate and moysture, which two qualities make the relish of things, and without which wee see that all extreame colde and drie things haue no smacke or taste, as flax or tow, and dry woodde, or water that is very pure. In other things, those that haue more moisture then heate, haue their taste lesse sharpe, so that according as heat and humidity are tempered together, the diuersitie of tastes is framed. For if humiditie doth not exceede and surmount earthy drynesse, or both of them bee consumed by heate, there is no taste. So that as all bodily things are compounded of all the elements, and differ one from another, according as they haue more or lesse of the elements, so is it in tastes. For this cause this sence of taste answereth to the element of water, and holdeth most of the nature thereof: as the sence of touching hath more affinitie with the earth, to the ende it might agree better with those things that are to be felt thereby. For the vigour and sence thereof ought to be close together and throughout, and such as taketh faster hold then any of the rest. So likewise the sence of sight agreeth with the fire, and that of hearing with the aire, as we haue already touched it. And as for the sence of smelling, it agreeth both with the fire and with the thicke aire, because smells are stirred vp by heate, as smoke is by fire, which afterwards are by the meanes of the aire caried to the sence of smelling, whereof we will speake hereafter.

Of the prouidence of God in the variety of tastes.

The sense of taste necessary for Phisicians

preseruets of life.

But let vs goe on with our discourse of tasting, and of such things as are apt to nourish the body. For we cannot liue without the helpe of many things: amongst which, meates and drinckes are chiefest: because that as hunger requireth meate, so thirst desireth drinke. Wee must therefore vnderstand, that this soule and life which is called Vegetative or nourishing, and which is common to man with all other living creatures, hath two principall instruments in the bodie, namely heate and humidity: of which, heate is first and chiefe, belonging properly to the vertue of nourishing: next humiditie is ioyned to heate, that it may feede and preserue it. For life is preserued in the body by heate, which is the chiefe instrument thereof: so that as soone as heate is gone, it becommeth starke dead. And because this heate would easily and quickly consume it selfe, if it were not nourished and maintayned, the moysture is ioyned vnto it in liuing bodies, as it were a bridle to keepe it backe, to the end that life might be prolonged, which otherwise would faile presently after it were forsaken of heate, as heate also would decay, if it were not nourished and preserued by humidity, which it necessarily requireth. For heate draweth humour vnto it selfe, and sucketh and drinketh it vp: likewise humour refresheth heate, and slaketh the vehemencie thereof: all which wee may plainly see in a lampe. For let vs compare the light of a lampe with life, and then let vs consider, whether this light can be preserued without fire, and whether this fire can continue any long time and not be extinguished, vnlesse it haue two things. The first is matter, as namely the wicke of the lampe: which matter cannot be firme if it haue no drynesse in it whereof fire may take holde. For fire being hot and drye, cannot haue any fellowship with coldenesse and humiditie, without some middle qualitie agreeable to his nature. On the other side it will soone consume the drie matter, on the which it delighteth, if the vehement heate thereof bee not abated and tempered by some humidity, which both resisteth the drynesse, and also by the coldenesse it hath, moderateth the heate of the fire. Therefore we see, that the matter of the wicke of a lampe cannot continue long beeing once lighted, if it bee not greased with some tallowe, or some humide humide matter to preferue both that and the fire of which it receiue light. For when it is burnt out, the fire also dieth with it through want of nourishment that might maintaine it. But it is not ynough although the fire haue meete matter to nourish it. For they must bee so well wrought and mingled one with another, that there bee neither too much nor too little of eyther, but as much as neede requireth. For if there be a great deale of wicke and but a litle oyle and tallow, it will endure so much the lesse while: and if there be too much oyle or tallow in respect of the wicke, it will flake the fire ouermuch, yea it may be in such great quantitie, that it will put it quite out. But if due proportion be kept betwene the cotton and the oyle or tallow, the fire will preferue it selfe very well, and giue a goodly cleare light.

The like is done in our bodies. For if they were without naturall heate, there would be no life in them: and if this heate had not meete matter to preferue it selfe within them, it would quickly be extinguished. Now seeing it must be nourished and maintained, this cannot be done vnlesse it haue some solide and firme matter, which cannot be consumed so quickly, but that it may preferue it selfe sometime. Againe, forasmuch as there is no matter so solide and firme, which is able any long time to resist the fire that consumeth all, if the violence thereof be not moderated, this matter must of necessitie be moistened. Heere then the meate, which is most solide, standeth in stead of match or weeke to this naturall fire, from whence proceedeth life to the body: and drinke is as it were oyle in a lampe, to moisten the meat, to the end that this fire should not consume it so quickly. And because it must alwaies be kept burning, (otherwise the light thereof, which is the life, will die together with it) it must haue new matter continually ministred vnto it, as it were to a fire that cannot alwayes continue kindled in the chimney and not goe out, if it be not preferred by wood or coale, or in a candle or lampe, if it haue not alwaies cotton, or weeke and oyle, or some other tallowy and moist matter. Therefore we see that when either of them beginneth to faile, another is put in to supply the place of it. And thus as fire and the light thereof are maintained in a lampe or candle by meanes of that nourishment they haue both in the weeke and in the tallow thereof: so life and that naturall fire which giueth life to the body, are maintained by that food, which they receiue ordinarily in eating and drinking. The meate then in mans body, is to nourish and preferue the naturall heate thereof, as the weeke is in a candle or lampe: and the moisture which it receiue by drinke, is vnto it as the oyle and tallow.

For this cause if heate be stronger in a man, he shall feele thirst, which is an appetite and desire of that which is moist and cold, that is, of such qualities as are contrary to the fire, which is hot and dry. For the moisture must be confirmed and strengthened to moderate the burning heate, as it is when oyle is powred into a lampe. And if both heate and moisture consuming each other, beginne to waxe faint and to faile, they must both be holpen, that they may gather more strength: as when we put not onely oyle, but wicke also into a lampe. And this is the cause of hunger, which is a desire of that which is hot and moist.

But there is difference betwene the humiditie required in hunger, and that which is required in thirst, because the moisture desired in thirst is more thinne and lesse earthy, then that which is required in hunger. And if the moisture be increased ouermuch, so that the heate decreaseth and languisheth, and consequently the appetite to meate and drinke and to receiue nourishment, decayeth, it must be restored againe by Phisicke. For although all nourishment be as it were Phisicke to the body, neuertheless, there is this difference, in that foode repaireth the whole person and all the body, whereas Phisicke repaireth onely the instruments of the body, which are to serue for nourishment. For this cause foode is alwayes necessary for all, at all times, and in all places: but besides that all stand not in neede of Phisicke, they that want it, vse it but at certaine times as necessitie requireth. For if those members that serue to nourish the body be well disposed, and discharge their office so well, that all the parts of the body receiue due nourishment, and the whole body be healthy and sound, there needeth nothing but ordinary foode to preferue the body, and to keepe it in good health. But if any member be weakened, and doth not his dutie well, especially any of those that ought to serue to nourish the whole body, it must be restored againe to strength by the meanes of Phisicke. Now albeit the sence of taste whereof we haue presently discoursed, be not so apt to teach, especially, the knowledge of spirituall and diuine things, as the senses of seeing and hearing, of which we haue spoken heeretofore: yet we may receiue much good doctrine thereby. For as the body cannot liue except it haue such corporall foode as agreeth to the nature thereof, so the soule cannot liue if it haue not that knowledge, which God hath appointed for it. And as life is kept in the body by heate, which is the chiefe instrument thereof, so the life of our soules consisteth and is preserued and increased by heate, namely, by the loue and charitie of God, without which it cannot liue that life that is agreeable to it owne nature. For the soule that is separated from the loue of God, is dead in respect of the true and blessed life, seeing God liueth not in it, nor it in God. For this cause this loue must be alwaies nourished and maintained therein by the celestiall and diuine moisture, agreeable to the nature thereof. Wherefore as it is of a heauenly and celestiall nature, so the food thereof must be answerable thereunto. This food therefore cannot be had but of God, who is the life of the soule, as the soule is the life of the body: and the meanes which he hath appointed to minister this food vnto it, is his heauenly and eternall word, and those spirituall graces which he communicateth vnto vs thereby. But let vs follow our matter subiect of corporall sences. And seeing we haue intreated of the meanes wherby the body is nourished, we ought to consider more particularly of those things that are meete and conuenient to maintaine and preserue the body of man, and see how God prepareth them to this end: in which thou shalt instruct vs, A M A N A.

Of helpes and creatures meete for the preseruatiō and nourishment of the body: how God prepareth them to serue for that purpose: of their vse. Chap. 18.

The equality of heate and moisture preserueth life.

A M A N A. God being carefull ouer the welfare of his creatures that haue life, hath put in them a desire to preserue themselves, to the end they should follow after such things as are profitable for their health, and shunne that which is hurtfull and contrary vnto it. Now this preseruatiō consisteth either in the equalitie that may easily be reduced and brought to an equalitie by that which we eate and drinke. For if there be so great exceisse of heate or moisture that the one consumeth the other, death followeth necessarily: if there be no exceisse of either, but a good equalitie, the body is very well affected. But it is very hard to find a body so tempred. And although such a one might be found, yet it could not long continue in that estate, but that it would quickly change, as we may iudge by that which we haue learned in the former discourse. But when this change doth not bring with it so great exceisse and inequality, but that it may be kept vpright by nourishment, the body is neuertheless well disposed, vntill such time as the exceisse is greater then can be repaired by foode. For then if foode will not serue the turne, we must haue recourse to Phisicke: and if the inequality be so great, that by the helpe of Phisicke no remedy can be found, there is no other naturall aide to be had.

Now this inequality that approacheth so neere to equalitie, is very pleasant, as that which is the pricke and procurer of naturall pleasures, necessary for the life of man to incite him to desire them, and as it were the sawce to make them toothsome. For if there were alwaies equalitie, we should neuer be affected with hunger or thirst, nor with any appetite to eate or drinke. And if this appetite were not, we should not haue those pleasures, which we receive by meates and dringes, and by their diuers tastes and relishes. So that we should not haue such a notable testimonie of the goodnesse and bountifulnesse of God towards vs, and of his care, as we haue by the sence of taste which he hath given vnto vs. Wherein also hee admonisheth vs in such sort of our mortall nature through the necessitie we haue of foode for the preseruatiō of our life, as that withall he supplieth this want and necessitie, that we may the better know and taste the sweetnesse of his loue toward vs. For, whereto would those creatures serue that are good for our nourishment, if we had no vse of them? And how could we vse them, if we stood not in need of them? Therefore seeing the matter standeth thus, it appeareth euidently, that we are nourished by such things as are familiar and like to our nature, and are healed by things contrary to that which hurteth vs. For the nearer any thing approacheth to our nature, the sooner it is converted into it. So that amongst those meates that are familiar vnto vs, they nourish best that draw neere to our nature. For this cause babes new born that are little and tender, haue milke for their foode, which is very meete for them by reason of the agreement that is betweene it and the matter whereof their bodies are made. For, as we haue already heard, the milke is made of the selfe same blood wherewith they were nourished in their mothers wombe, and wherof they were before ingendred and conceived: forasmuch as the parents seede, of which they were framed, is deriued from their owne blood. Whereupon it followeth, that the matter of their bodies is of the same substance: and so that food which draweth neereſt vnto it, is moſt naturall and meete for them. For this cauſe we ſayd before, that all things are not ſeruiſeable for meate, drinke and nourishment, but thoſe onely that haue a nature agreeable thereto, and that for the reaſons ſpecified by vs. Heere then we muſt call to minde that which we haue already touched elſe where, namely that ſeeing the body of man is compounded of all the elements, it is therefore needfull that the nourishment wherewith it is to be preſerued and vpholden, ſhould participate of all the elements, to the end that all and euery part of mans body ſhould be maintained and preſerued by that which is like to it ſelfe. Therefore God hath well provided to this purpoſe, as we ſee in the matter whereof our bodies are made. For we haue heard what difference there is according to the ſundry parts and diuerſity of members in the body: and yet the whole matter of them all is taken from the ſubſtance of the ſame elements, and the difference betweene them commeth of this onely, that ſome parts participate more of ſome elements, & others of other elements. Heereof it is, that the hardeſt parts of the body, as the bones, are moſt earthy: and ſo conſequently all the other parts, as they haue either more or leſſe of all the elements and of their qualities. For this cauſe all the parts and members of the body muſt haue food agreeable to the nature of the elements whereof they participate, according to that portion of matter which is in euery one of them. Wherein we ſee a goodly teſtimonie of the bond and agreement that is among all creatures, yea in all nature it ſelfe, together with the correſpondencie that euery creature hath with it like. Therefore if we want ayre for breathing, we draw it in euen as it is of it owne nature, together with thoſe qualities which it bringeth with it ſelfe. If we deſire drinke, onely to reſreſh and to moiſten the body and the meate it taketh, pure water ſerueth that turne, which is common drinke for all creatures, and ſufficient for the whole life of man, although there were no other. But God hath given this advantage to men aboue beaſts, that beſides this drinke common to them both, they haue others, not onely more pleaſant to their taſte, but alſo more forceable to nourish them. For if the queſtion be of taking ſuſtenance either by meate or drinke, we muſt haue ſuch meates and drinckes as are more firme then the ayre & the water, and which are able to ſuſtaine the body according to it owne ſubſtance and nature. For as the water and the ayre, whereof the body is made, could not conſiſt in the compoſition thereof, but would ſlide and fall away, if they were not intermingled with ſome other matter that is more earthy and ſolide, thereby to keepe and knitt them together: euen ſo, if food conſiſted only in liquid and moiſt things, that had no other ſubſtance of more earthy and ſolide qualitie, in which the vertue of heate might remaine, and which might be conuerted into the greatneſſe and maſſineſſe of the body, the living creature would alwaies haue an appetite, and neuer leaue eating. Therefore God hath ſo framed thoſe creatures, which he hath given to man for meate, that whatſoeuer is earthy therein doth not ſtill retaine the nature of the earth, as if it were nothing but ſimple earth: and ſo likewiſe that which is of the nature of fire, or of the water, or of the ayre: but all is ſo well mingled and tempered one with another, that the taſte and ſauour thereof is pleaſant and fit for all the parts of the body, that are to be nourished. And according as the qualities of the elements are mingled one with another, ſo the meates and drinckes compounded of them, haue their ſundry taſtes together with their other qualities. For if God had not ſo provided for it, man could haue no taſte therein: and if he taſted not, he would haue no appetite, and ſo could neither eate nor drinke. And if he could neither eate nor drinke, he could not liue, as we may iudge by that which we haue already heard.

Now as he cannot liue without eating and drinking, ſo it is requiſit that he eat & drinke with that moderation, that he take in no more meate & drinke then he ought to doe. For if he take too little, he cannot be ſufficiently nourished: & if he take too much, in ſtead of being ſatiſfied, he ſhal be burdened, & in ſtead of preſeruing his life, he will kill himſelfe. Therefore it is very neceſſary that euery one ſhould alwaies obſerue great ſobrietie, otherwiſe God will correct our riot, our gluttonie and drunkenneſſe. But the danger that commeth by not keeping a mediocritie, is a great deale more to be feared on the one ſide then on the other. For there are but few that breake not ſquare oftner in eating & drinking too much then to little. Now to end this ſpeech, we haue farther to gather ſuch good inſtructions as all men haue in thoſe things which God hath given them for nourishment, yea in their mouth alſo, to the end to render vnto him honor, glory & praiſe. Whenſoeuer beaſts doe eat, their tongue ſerueth to feed them, no otherwiſe then that of men doth helpe them: but they praiſe not God with that tongue which ſerueth to nourish them, becauſe he hath not given them that gift of ſpeech, speech, wherewith he hath endued man, and that for the cause which we haue already heard. For as a fountaine cannot be without a riuer, so a riuer cannot be without a fountaine. For this cause seeing reason, of which God hath made man partaker, is as it were a fountaine in him, and speech as the riuer that issueth from it, the Grecians expresse both reason and speech with one and the same word, which Saint Iohn also vsed, when speaking of the Deitie of Iesus Christ, he said, In the beginning was the word, and the word was with God, and that word was God. For as all the workes of God are perfect in their kind, so he maketh nothing without cause, and which hath not his vse. So likewise he giueth nothing to any creature, but withall he giueth the instruments and meanes which it ought to vse, therby to be made seruiceable as the thing it selfe requireth. Heereof it is that he gaue not speech to beasts, because he made them not partakers of reason, without which speech would stand them in no stead: so that it would haue beene a superfluous worke of God. Therefore seeing it is so, God requireth not of beasts that they should by speech praise him with their tongue, as he requireth it of men, vnto whom he hath given the meanes to performe it. For beastes haue neither reason to vnderstand what is spoken, nor speech to vtter any thing thereby, whereas man hath both the one and the other. He hath both the fountaine, and also the riuer that runneth from it. Wherefore when he sitteth downe to meate, and whiles he is taking his refection (to which vse his tongue serueth him, according as we heard before) and when he riseth from table, truly he is much more brutish then any brute beast, if with the selfe same tongue he doeth not praise and glorifie G O D, acknowledging as he ought the goodness of that celestially Father, that giueth him that foode, and that nourisheth him. If hee doe otherwise, he looketh no more from whence the meate commeth vnto him then doth the hogge, who with his snout alwayes towards the earth, feedeth vpon the Akornes that are vnderneath the Oakes, and neuer looketh or considereth from whence they fall. Yea, the Hogge doeth a great deale better discharge his dutie in praising G O D then such men doe, that eate and drinke as brute beasts without giuing thanks to G O D for the benefite he distributeth amongst them. For he praiseth God in his kind, as all other creatures doe in theirs, according as the kingly Psalmist testifieth in many places of his Psalmes. Neither doth God require more of them then he hath given vnto them. But seeing he hath giuen more to man then to all other visible and bodily creatures, he requireth so much the more of him, and that very iustly. For as it is written, To whom much is committed, more shall be demanded of him. Wherefore man is not onely too too inexcusable, but more vile and sauage then any brute beast, if his tongue serue him no farther at the table for the praising of God thereby, then if (beastlike) his snout and nose were in a cratch or manger. For how shall the foode in the vse thereof be sanctified by the word of G O D and prayer, if he take it after that sort? And if it be not sanctified vnto him by that meane, as Saint Paul teacheth, he vseth it not as the child of G O D, but as a theefe and a very prophane man. For as Every creature of G O D is good when it is receiued with thanksgiving, so it is defiled to the filthy, not through any fault of the creature, but of such as abuse it like to Infidells. But all they abuse it that giue not thanks for it to the Creator. Wherefore as every thing is cleane to the cleane, that haue their hearts purified by the word of G O D which they haue receiued by faith, so nothing is cleane to the defiled and to Infidells. But if these men of whom we speake, be vnworthy to be taken for men, yea, to be compared with hogges, then whom they are much more vile and detestable, we may easily iudge what is to be sayd of those that doe not onely not praise God or giue him any thanks, but which is worse, blaspheme, and as it were despite him in lieu of recompensing him for the benefites they haue receiued of him, which is vsually done by gluttons, drunkards, and swearers. What shall we say of such men, but that they deserue rather to be called mad dogges then men? except we had rather call them children of the Diuell, whose instrument, tongue and mouth they are. And as for those that cease not to prattle and babble about vaine and vnprofitable matters, and that take delight in backbiting and slaundering every one, we may with good reason compare their tongue to the clack of a Mill. For seeing every one of vs carrieth a mill in his mouth, as we shewed before, these men may truly boast that their Mill is better furnished with all kind of instruments then others are. But they are not the more to be esteemed for that, but rather the lesse, for the reasons which we haue already heard. And when they adde to their clacking euill speech and backbiting, infecting all tables where they come with their tongue, they may well bee compared to dogges that doe not onely barke but also bite. But it is time to draw the last draught of the pensill vpon the face face of mans body, by considering the sence of smelling with the member that belongeth vnto it: wherein we looke to be instructed by thee, ARAM.

*Of the Nose; and of the sence of smelling, and of their profite and vse:
of the composition, matter, and forme of the Nose. Chap. 19.*

ARAM. Forasmuch as beautie is a grace that proceedeth of the proportion, agreement and harmonie of things, it is then very seemely in mans body, when it followeth nature onely, and is without any blemish or defect. Nowe this beauty consisteth in foure things, namely, in figure, in number, in greatnesse and in situation. For the members of the body are well or ill coloured according to the disposition of the matter. And the correspondency of the members one towards another, as wel in the number, as in the length and greatnesse of each of them well compassed and proportioned together, is one cause also of beauty: as likewise the placing of every one of them in his proper place, most conuenient and agreeable to his nature and vse. For if any thing be wanting of all these things in any member of the body, there is deformitie in stead of beauty.

What beauty is, and wherein it consisteth.

But if we consider onely the beauty of the head and of the face thereof, whereof wee discoursed yesterday, we shall not finde any one member that hath not singular beauty in it, and that agreeth not very fitly with the rest, being of so good proportion and measure, and hauing such a great and excellent grace, that a man may truly say that the whole worke hath in each part thereof so great perfection, that nothing can bee added or taken away nothing can be wished to make it more faire, profitable, excellent or perfect then it is in it owne nature. To the setting forth of this beauty, the Nose, whereof we are to speake, serueth very much, yea so much, that hardly any member in all the face or head so disfigureth a man, or maketh him more deformed then the nose, if it be euill fauoured, disfigured, or taken cleane away. But besides this beauty, which it bringeth to a mans head, we are to know that it is very seruiceable to the whole body, and chiefly to the braine lodged in the toppe thereof, as it were the Lord and Master: that as it giueth motion and sence to all the members: so it might be compassed about with all the senses as it were with seruitours and men of garde. Therefore as it hath neere about it, the eyes, eares, tongue, and palat, which are the instruments of seeing, hearing and tasting: so the nose is needfull to serue the sence of smelling. Neither is it placed so neere the sence of tasting without the great prouidence of God. For there are many things in nature, which if they be tasted onely are deadly, or at leastwise very dangerous and hurtfull, as appeareth chiefly in things that are venimous and poisonfull. For this cause, albeit the sence of smelling be not altogether so necessary for liuing creatures, namely, for such as are most perfect, as the other senses, so that they may more easily want it, neuertheless GOD hath giuen it them, to the end it might be as it were a messenger to the tast to shew what is good for it and what not, and this chiefly for two reasons. The first is, to keepe men from hazarding themselves through an immoderate desire to eat and drinke, before they haue discerned by the smell of such things as are to be taken, whether they be profitable or hurtfull for them. The second reason, is to take all suspicion and feare from them, which otherwise might cause them to abstaine from those things that are good and profitable for them. And therefore this sence of smelling is neerely conioyned, and hath great agreement with the sence of tasting. For this is a generall rule, that, albeit euery thing that smelleth well hath not alwaies a good taste, yet whatsoever a man findeth good to his taste, the same hath also a good smell: and contrariwise, that which is founde to haue an ill relish, the same hath also the like smell. For the taste and smell are giuen not onely for profite, but for pleasure also and delight. Neither doe those thinges which serue for delectation, alwaies bring profite, but sometime the contrary, principally through their fault that knowe not how to vse them moderately. For they are so subiect to their pleasures that they can neuer keepe measure in any thing, as we see by experience, especially in these two senses of taste and smell. For as the ordinary meates satisfie not the delicate appetites of men, but they must haue new dainties daily inuented to prouoke their appetite further, and to cause them to eate and drinke more then is needfull, to their great hurt: so men are not contented with naturall odours which nature bringeth forth of it selfe, but now they must haue muskes & perfumes, with infinit varietie of distilled waters & artificiall smells, in regard of which, naturall saours are nothing set by. And yet if they were vsed with sobriety, there were no cause of reprehension, seeing all the creatures of God are good, if they be vsed moderately, and as they ought with thanksgiuing. Hereof it is that they are often mentioned in Scripture in the good part. And not to seeke farre off for examples, wee haue the testimonies of the holy Euangelists, as our Lord Iesus Christ himselte, who was neither nice nor voluptuous, but the perfect patterne of all sobriety and temperance, did not reiect nor condemne precious ointments and sweete odours, but sometime permitted the vse of them vpon his owne person. Moreouer, it is certaine, that the animall spirits in the braine are greatly relieued and recreated by those good and naturall smells that are conueied vnto them by meanes of the nose, and of the sence of smelling placed therein: as contrariwise they are greatly offended by euill odours, yea oftentimes by artificiall saours, which commonly cause rheumes, catarres, and great headaches. For the spirits of the head are subtle, pure, and very neate, so that sweet smells are good for them, and stinking saours contrary vnto them. To this end therefore that the braine might receive this benefit of good odours, God hath placed both the sence and instrument of smelling so neere vnto it: the instrument to keepe & conuey odours vnto it, the sence to discerne & iudge of them. Therefore this sence of smelling hath some agreement both with the fire, and with thicke aire, because smells are stirred vp by heate, as smoke is by fire, which are after carried by meanes of the aire vnto the sence, and received and kept by the nose. Forasmuch also as the braine needeth aire to nourish and preserue the animall spirites, the nose in this respect also standeth it in great steade. Therefore God hath created it not onely to serue the sence of smelling, but also for respiration, that it should be the principall pipe and passage, by which both the braine and lungs may draw in or let out breath as neede requireth. For this cause the braine doth stretch out and restraine it selfe: and as by stretching forth it selfe it draweth in the aire by the nosethrilles, so by keeping it selfe close together it retaineth the aire. And so the externall aire being drawne in by the nosethrilles, is distributed by the cranies that are open in the palat, in such sort, that the greatest part is drawne into the lungs, and the residue goeth to the braine by the passages and holes that leade vnto it. And although the mouth serueth also for respiration, yet the nose is appointed more especially for that purpose, and is much more fit and apt for the same. Therefore God hath giuen it both matter and forme agreeable for that office. For first concerning the matter, it is not made all of bone, nor all of gristles: because if it were all of bone, a double inconuenience would ensue thereof. The first is, that the bones would be in danger of breaking, chiefly about the end of the nose when it should hit against any hard thing, because they would not bend and giue place easily, as sinewes will do. The second inconuenience would be this, that the ends of the nosethrilles could neither open nor shut, neither enlarge nor restraine themselves, but would continue alwayes at one stay: whereupon two other mischiefs would follow. First, the nose could not open and enlarge it selfe so much as were requisite many times to draw in great store of aire to coole and refresh both the lungs and the braine, especially when they are heated and set on fire. For at such a time there is perill of strangling. Secondly, for as much as the nose is giuen to man that it might serue the braine in steade of a pipe and spout to purge it of flegmatike humours, a man could not by blowing, close it together & straine it to get the filth out of it, as neede requireth many times. For the humours that distill from the braine are not alwaies very liquide and running, but sometimes so grosse and thicke, that a man cannot easily purge the braine or nose, except it bee closed and strained hard. Thus you see two euident causes why it was needefull that the nose should bee compounded of gristles, and not of bones onely, at leastwise from the middledownward. On the other side, if this lower part had beene made of flesh onely, or of kernells, or of skinnies, the nosethrilles could not so well haue beene enlarged or restrained, nor continued so open, as is requisite for the seruice of all those duties and offices already mentioned: besides that those parts could not so well withstand the inconueniences whereunto they might be subiect, if they were of a more tender matter. Lastly, as it was needefull that one part of the nose should consist of that matter for those causes spoken of, so also it was necessary that the vpper part should bee made of bones, not onely to keepe the sence of smelling the better, which is in that part, and to be as it were a buckler vnto, it but also to serue in steade of rampires both for the eyes and for the braine. As for the inward parts, there are two nosethrilles distinguished distinguished one from another by a gristle which is betweene them both, as it were a little wall to diuide them, to the ende that if the one be stopped, the other may alwayes discharge the offices assigned to them both. And to the end they may more easily draw in the aire for the seruice as well of the lungs as of the braine, and also receiue in the odours, they are larger at the first entrance, and after as they ascend vp they waxe more narrow, and that not without good reason of the prouidence of God. For he hath in a manner taken the selfe same course that he did in the composition of the eares, which hee made large and wide at the entry, hauing that forme, and that hole within, which we heard spoken of before, together with the causes why. The selfe same reason in a manner may be rendred here. For as it is to be feared that ouer great sounds would hurt the eares if they entred in all at once, so the lungs and much more the braine might be ouer cooled by the aire that should enter in at the nosethrilles, if it should ascend vp too fast at once, too sodainly, or too vehemently. By reason whereof it is requisite, that it should be retained in some sort, to the ende that by the tariance which it maketh it should be heated and better tempered. The like consideration is to be had of the vapours and smelles in regarde of the braine, not onely of euill sa- uours, but also of those that are good. For some are so violent by reason of the abundance of heat in them, which falleth out chiefly in such as are most excellent, that if they bee not dispensed moderately, they hurt the braine. This commeth to passe in some persons, through the weakenesse of their braine. There are others, and namely such as care not for sweet things, who take no pleasure, no not in good smelles, so that oft times the sweetest and most delicate odours are hurtfull to their head. Now God hath well provided for all these things, hauing placed a little bone in the top of the nose, which is pierced through like to a little siue. Hereupon it is called by the Physitions the siue-bone, or otherwise, and that more properly, the spongy bone, because the holes thereof are not strait, as are those of a siue, but somewhat spongy like to the holes of a sponge. And this serueth for the better and more commodious discharging of all those vses declared by vs, and for the auoyding of those discomforts which we haue heard of. Whereunto may bee added, that the humours which descend from the braine may not fall downe so fast together, but distill better by little and little, and the good humors be kept more easily from falling downe all at once together with the euill. I passe ouer heere briefly the muscles giuen to the nosethrilles to mooue them, as also the nerves, which are sent from the braine to the sence of smelling to bring vnto it the vertue of smelling, as the eyes, eares, palat, and tongue receiue from thence their nerves also, which bring vnto them that facultie and vertue that is meete for their nature. Wherein wee may further note one goodly point of the prouidence God, in that giuing motion and sence to every member of the body by the sinewes, hee giueth a speciall and proper sence to those nerves that are to minister vertue and power to every one of the corporall senses, which the other sinewes haue not. For there is none that giueth the sence meete for sight, but those that are allotted to the eyes for that purpose. The same may bee said of those that are giuen to the eares for hearing, and to the tongue and palat for the tast, and to the nose for smelling. Now to end this speach, we are to draw out some instruction meate for the minde, according as we haue done in our discourses of the other sences of the body. As then we iudge by the nose and sence of smelling which God hath giuen vnto vs, what difference there is betweene a good and stinking smell, and how the one is pleasant and delightfome, and the other vnpleasant and abhominable: so likewise we ought to consider what small pleasure God taketh in the infection and stench of our sinnes, and how hee is delighted with the sweete smell of the iustice and vertues of Christ Iesus, when wee are perfumed therewith, and when he smelleth the sauour thereof in vs. Therefore whensoever, and as often as we feele some stinch and abhorre the same, that euill smell ought to admonish vs of the filthinesse of our sinnes, and teach vs to haue them in greater abomination then any carrion smell whatsoever, and to abhorre our selues when we present our selues before God, perfumed with such an infernall sauour. For if we turne our faces aside, and stoppe our nose, and euen spit vpon the ground when we meete with some great infection, shall we not thinke that God turneth his face from vs when he findeth vs so stinking & infected? Contrariwise when we smell some good sauour, it ought to bring into our remembrance the odour of Iesus Christ his sacrifice, & of those vertues that are well pleasing & agreable in the sight of God, and stirre vs vp with all indeauour to present him with such smels, to the end wee may be of good odour before God and men. Which the holy word will teach vs, after hee hath giuen vs a spirituall nose whereby we may attaine to the right sence and smell of that good odour of Iesus Christ and of the Gospel, working in vs the spirit of discretion to discern truth from lying, that our soules may be refreshed, as the braine is by those good smells that are brought vnto it by the bodily nose, and by the sense of smelling that is therein. Now therefore being come to the end of this goodly matter of the five corporall and externall senses, me thinkes we should profit much by a brieue collection of their vse, and of the commodity which they bring to men: considering also the diuersity that is in their faces and visages, in which these goodly organically instruments of the senses are painted: and how their faces are images and pictures of their heart and minde. The discourse of this matter appertaineth to thee ACHITO B.

Of the vse briefly of all the outward senses for the seruice of man, namely in purging the superfluities and ordures of his body: of the diuerſitie that is in mens faces, and of the image of the minde and heart in them. Chap. 20.

ACHITO B. When we take some pleasure by considering the workes of God, namely those which we beare about vs in our nature, (as indeede such contemplation affordeth great delight to their soules that are not buried in ignorance) we ought to thinke that we haue great occasions and certaine meanes to consider, what pleasure and ioy it would be to see and behold the Creator and Workmaster, who hath made and giuen to man such excellent senses, such wonderfull vertues and faculties: what delight ariseth of hearing and smelling onely some small odour, and of tasting a little of his providence, wisdom, goodness, benignity, grace, and mercy, much more, when they are thoroughly tasted and relished of vs. Which may be performed by them that imploy all care and diligence in meditating on his eternal word, and in considering the workes of his Almighty power, vntill such time as by the dissolution of this mortall tabernacle of the body, they shall haue put on immortalitye to enioy true contemplation, that is, to beholde him face to face, who onely is able to satisfie the soule with goodness and felicity, as the Prophet teacheth vs where hee saith, In thy presence is the fulnes of ioy, and at thy right hand there are pleasures for euermore. Now then wee may knowe by that which wee haue hitherto heard in these our discourses, what testimonies God hath planted of his great providence in all the partes of our bodies, what care he hath had and still hath of man, and how hee hath giuen him as many corporall senses as he needeth for the vse and fruition of all those visible and bodily creatures which he hath created. For he hath eyes, whereby he vseth and enioyeth the light, and the pleasure of such diuersity of colours as may be seene in the world, as well naturall as artificiall and compounded, with the sundry mixtures of naturall things. Then by the eares hee hath the vse of all kinds of sounds, and principally of speech, together with the pleasure of harmonies and melodies consisting in the varietie of tunes and songs, as well of mans voice as of birdes and other creatures, and also of instruments of musicke, which are so many and of such diuersity amongst men. And by meanes of the nose & nosethrills he hath the fruition & pleasure of odours and smells so diuers in nature, both natural and artificial: and by means of the mouth, tongue, and palat he enioyeth and iudgeth of al sorts of tastes, which also are very diuers, and chiefly of meats and drinks wherewithall he is nourished. For this good God hath appointed a meane for the preservation of mans life, whereunto hee hath ioyned pleasure with profit, if men know how to vse the same with moderation and measure, rather to make supply to necessity then to satisfie pleasures. The like may be said of al the rest of the feelings and touchings of al the bodily members, of which there is great variety.

But hauing spoken sufficiently of the composition of the external parts of mans body, & of the outward members, of the natural senses of man and of their vses, we ought to consider also what instructions God giueth by them vnto men concerning their infirmity. For although the body of man be so beautifull and excellent outwardly as wee haue declared, yet it hath infection within, which of necessitie must appeare and breake forth outwardly, that it may be purged and vburdened. For the body cannot reape that profit of the nourishment it receiveth by all the elements, and chiefly of that which it eateth and drinketh, as that it can conuert and turne all of it into nourishment and substance, and auoid all those accidents and inconueniences whereunto it is subiect by reason of the infirmity of it owne nature. Therefore it commeth to passe necessarily, that the body is full of excrements, of much much superfluity and ordure, which would kill it if it were not disburthened thereof. For these excrements would be poison vnto it in steade of nourishment. Therefore the providence of God hath so provided a remedie for the same, that admonishing man of his infirmity, to the end he should alwaies remember that he is created of clay and of earth, and that he shall returne vnto it againe, it hath withall ordained the meanes wherby man shall be comforted, & discharged of those excrements and superfluities which might hurt him. And for this cause there is no member but hath his proper passages appropriated for purgation & serving in his place, yea even the noblest members. For I speake not only of those members, which we account most vile, abiect, & shameful, & which nature teaches vs to couer & hide, being appointed for the voiding of the grossest, vilest, & most filthy excrements, but also of those that are the excellentest and chiefest in the head and face, so that there is no part of our body out of which there proceedeth not some infection & filthines. In somuch that a man may well say, that our whole body is within as it were a stinking draught or puddle that emptieth it self on euery side as it were by sinks & gutters. For if we consider it generally, there is no part that is not subiect to sweat, (which oftentimes sauoureth very strongly) & that purgeth not it selfe by sweating fro that superfluity, which it casteth forth by that meanes. Therefore the providence of God hath so well provided for this, that the skin hath in it little holes called by the Philosophers, Pores: which are so subtil & so small, that they cannot bee perceiued by the eye. Through these pores, the superfluities that are evaporated by sweat haue their issue, so that it cometh to passe oftentimes, that sicke persons are cured by this only remedy, or at least are greatly comforted thereby. But let vs come to the noblest members in the head, and in the goodliest part of man, which is the face. The eyes, eares, nose, & mouth serue for pipes & spowts to the braine and head, to purge it of those superfluities that otherwise might oppress it. Wherin we are againe to consider of the providence of God, & of that care which he hath of vs. For seeing the head is the principall member of the whole body, and seeing the braine within the head is so noble a part, God hath giuen vnto it more passages for the purging of it, then he hath done to all the other members. Therefore we see what store of flegme doth daily issue out by the nose & mouth, so that a man is many times much troubled both in blowing his nose & in spitting. In this respect it seemeth the nose maketh the face to looke like a Limbeck, albeit the water that distilleth through it hath no very good smel, neither is pleasant to looke vpon, no more is the spittle that cometh out of the mouth. As for the eares they are not without filth, so that they must be oftentimes looked vnto & cleansed, and the waxe that is in them taken forth: which differeth much fro the waxe that is made by Bees. For as Philosophers testifie, this eare-waxe is nothing else but the superfluity of the cholericke humour, which is purged there by those pipes: as they say also, that the melancholy humour is purged by the eyes, which are many times watrish & very foule by reason of the rheumes and sundry humours that fall downe vpon them. Whereby we see, how God doth admonish vs on all sides through the infirmities of all our members, what account we are to make of our selues. For if the goodliest and most noble members, if the pleasantest, most delicate, and neatest parts are so foule & filthy, what shal we say of the rest that are of the basest and most abiect, which are appointed for no other vses then to be as it were the draughts and sinks of the whole body? But on the other side, let vs consider how God by humbling vs on the one side, doth yet on the other side provide for our necessities by those meanes of purging which he appointed for the body of man. Where we haue further to obserue, that there are many superfluities and excrements purged from the braine, which are profitable for those members that are assigned to bee the instruments of their euacuation: as we see it plainly in the yellow humour that is purged by the eares. For it defendeth them against fleas, little flies & other small wormes and beasts, that might otherwise enter within them.

We haue further to consider for our better humilatiō, that God hath so created all the members and instruments belonging to our corporall senses, as that he admonisheth vs thereby of their nature, and what they can doe of themselves. For there is not one of them, but it is in some sort made hollow, to giue vs to vnderstand thereby, that they exercise their principall and chiefe office by receiuing from without, that which belongeth to their nature, and not by sending forth any thing of their owne. For when the eyes see, they receiue into them images of those things that are before them. And if they send forth any thing, it is so farre from helping them to see better, that it hindereth and dimmeth the sight, as wee see when men weepe, or when any humour runneth out of their eyes. Likewise our nose hath no sence of the odours by meanes of that

winde and breath which proceedeth out of it, but when it draweth in the aire with which the odours are conuained vnto it. And so it is of the other senses. Whereby wee are taught to know the nature of our soule, which can bring forth no good thing, if it haue not receiued it before of God, to whom she can giue nothing, but onely receiueth from him. You see then many good lessons, which we are taught by the instrumēt of our senses & by our own nature, but we commonly passe them ouer and neuer thinke of them at al, or if we muse vpon them sometimes, we say as much indeede, and confesse it in word, but in the meane time wee are nothing humbled thereby. Now then we haue bestowed doores and windowes vpon the frame of mans body, and may with ease beholde the outward excellencie and shewe thereof, in regard of so many goodly workes as are cutte out and ingrauen in euery externall part of it. Wee are by and by to looke vpon the inward furniture, being enriched with all sorts of rare, great, and sumptuous workes. But for the end of our present matter, seeing wee are taught that so many profitable and pleasant senses and members are planted chiefly in the face and visage of man, it cannot bee without fruite and great admiration at the prouidence of God, if we consider that amongst so many faces as there are of men, women, and children, a man shall hardly finde two in all the world, that resemble each other so neere, but still some difference will appeare to him that looketh narrowly vpon them. And if there be any so apparent resemblance that a man cannot finde any difference, yet that falleth out very seldome. Neither is this seene onely in the whole countenance, but also in the seuerall parts thereof, and namely in the nose, whereof there is so great variety, as that you shall finde very few that are like in all points: so that it is to be wondered at, that in such a great similitude of faces there is so great dissimilitude. For there is great likenesse in that they are all humane faces, made of the same matter, and hauing the same parts: but yet they are very vnlike in respect of the particular differences, which are in each of them and of their parts. Now if wee haue occasion to admire this diuersitie that is among many, what shall we say to the dissimilitude and difference of countenance that is to be seene in one and the same man, as if he had many faces to vse & change at his pleasure, as we see men may change masks before their faces? It is certain that there appeareth great difference in the countenance of one and the same man, as he is either young or olde, sound or sicke. For as a mans yeares alter, so there will be some change in his face, bearing his countenance according to the health or sickenes that is in him. But I speake not now of this diuersity, but of another which happeneth to men in all ages, & at all times. For there is great difference to be seene in a mans face according as he is either merry or sad, angry or pacified, humble & modest, or lofty and proude. For if he be quiet and modest, he will haue a sweete, milde, & gracious countenance: if he be angry, hee will haue a furious face, as though hee were transfigured into a sauage beast, hauing fierie eyes as if hee cast from them flames of fire: he will cast forth smoake at his nosethrilles, as if he had a fornace kindled within him: his whole countenance will bee redde as if fire came out of it. Therefore it was not without reason said of a Philosopher, that angry and furious men should beholde themselves in a glasse: to the ende they might know thereby how such passions change the countenance, and how they are transformed thereby and looke hidious and fearefull. And if a man be loftie and arrogant, his visage will testifie the same sufficiently, especially his eyes and eye-lids, which will be lifted vp, as if pride and arrogancie had there placed their seat. For if wee denie or graunt any thing that pleaseth or displeaseth vs, we declare it by them, speaking by signes as the tongue doeth by wordes. And although pride bee conceived and bredde in the heart, yet it is seated on the eye-liddes, where it sheweth and manifesteth it selfe. For seeing it desireth alwaies to be aduanced and to be lift vp aboue all, yea to be alone without any companion, that place is very fitte and conuenient for it, being high, eminent, and apparent. But a proude person ought to consider, that, that place is very much declining, to the ende hee may thinke of the danger of falling downe, as they that are in some high and steepe place where they can take no holde. For it can not bee but that pride will haue a fall, howsoeuer it may seeme very long first. For that sentence of Iesus Christ is alwaies true, who sayeth, that, Who soeuer will exalt himselfe shall be brought low, and who soeuer will humble himselfe, hee shall be exalted. The eyes also do speake and testifie of the heart within. For if the heart bee humble, modest, chaste, and well stayed, the eyes will be so answerable thereunto, that their very lookes will declare sufficiently how it standeth affected. Contrariwise, if the heart be proud, vnchaste, loose, impudent, and lasciuious, the looke and countenance of the eyes will openly bewray bewray the same. Also wee say commonly of such as are past all shame, that they have brazen and shamelesse foreheads. And it seemeth that the French worde Affronteur, is derived from thence, because they that are of that occupation must have good foreheads, they must be bold and shamelesse, like to harlots and murderers. And as shame is seated and appeareth principally in the forehead and cheekes, so is it a note of impudency when shame is banished from thence: as that which then possesseth the place assigned to shame and modestie.

Of the true
Physiognomy

Therefore the Scripture attributeth a brow of brasse and of yron, a hard forehead, and a strong face to them that are impudent and past grace, to such as are vnttractable and rebellious. By these things then we know how the face is the image, messenger, and witnesse of all the affections of the heart, inso much that it is very hard for him, do what he can, to cover and conceale them. Also it is the image and witnes of a good and euill conscience. For as a good conscience causeth it to appeare ioyfull and open, so contrariwise an euill conscience maketh it sad and hidden; as it were the visage of a condemned person. We commonly call Physiognomy the Science wherby men iudge of the nature, complexion, and manners of every one, by the contemplation of all the members of the body, and chiefly of the face and countenance. But there is no Physiognomy so certain as that which we haue now touched, whereby men may be easily conuincid of that which they thinke to hide in their heartes, which notwithstanding is quickly discied in their countenances, as if we read it in a Book. Now it is time to enter into our edifice & building; there to contemplate the internal and spirituall senses, which the soule vseth in her works and operations. But first wee will make the way more easie to attaine to so high a matter, by learning briefly what is the nature, faculties, and powers of mans soule, and what are the sundry kinds of the soules, the burthen whereof I lay vpon thee, A S E R.

Of the nature, faculties, and powers of mans soule: of the knowledge which we may haue in this life, and how excellent and necessary it is: into what kinds the life and soule are diuided. Chap. 21.

A S E R. If God hath shewed himselfe wonderfull in the creation, composition, nature, and vse of the externall senses and members of mans body (of which we haue hitherto discoursed) both in the matter whereof they are made and in the forme giuen vnto them, and in all other things that belong vnto them: no doubt but wee shall haue much more cause to maruaile at the excellent workmanship of his providence in the composition, nature, and vse of the internall senses and members, which lie hidden within the body, whereof the sequelle of our speech requireth that wee should intreate. For these are the principall, by meanes of which the other receiue life, and are kept and preserved in life. But forasmuch as the soule giueeth life to the whole body and to all the members thereof, we are withall to consider of the nature thereof, what faculties and vertues it hath, and how it worketh in all the partes of the body, according to the knowledge which GOD hath giuen to men, both by the testimonie of his worde, and by the effectes of the soule. For neither the body nor any member thereof should haue aty more motion or feeling then is in a blocke or stone, if it had no Soule to giue it life. For this cause after Iob hath spoken of the creation and composition of the body, he addeth, Thou hast giuen mee Iob. 10. 11. life and grace, and thy visitation (that is to say, thy providence) hath preserved my spirit. This agreeth with that, which we haue heard before of Moses, where he sayeth, That the Lord Gen. 2. 7. made man of the dust of the ground, and breathed in his face breath of life, and the man was a liuing soule.

First therefore we must vnderstand that there are in man three kinds of faculties and vertues that worke continually within him and neuer cease: the first is commonly called Animal, the second Vital, the third Natural. Of these two latter we will speake hereafter. Concerning the Animal facultie, it is diuided into 3. kinds: the first is called Principal, the second Sensitive, the third Motive. The Principal is diuided by some into three kinds, by others into five. They which make five sortes, distinguish betweene the common sense, the imagination, and the fantasie, making them three: and for the fourth they adde Reason, or the iudging faculty: and for the fifth, Memorie. They that make but three kinds differ not from the other, but only in that they comprehend all the former three vnder the common sense, or vnder one of the twaine, whether it bee the other imagination or the fantasie. As for the Sensitive facultie, it comprehendeth the vertues of the five corporall senses, of which we haue spoken before. As for the Motive vertue, it comprehendeth the moouing of all the outward parts of the body from one place to another, especially of the feete and legges which is to walke, and of the hands which is to apprehend & to gripe. This moouing is done by the sinewes, muscles, and filaments, as we haue already declared: but not without knowledge & will, as the other that are more properly called naturall motions, of which wee may speake in their order. And this notion is led by the imagination in regard of beastes, but in regard of men, by reason. But because wee haue already handled at large these two last powers of the soule, namely, the Sensitive and Motive, when we spake of the externall members of the body, we will now speake especially of the first, which comprehendeth the internall senses spoken of by me euen now, which answer to the externall senses, according to the bond, agreement, and communication which the body and soule haue together. And because we cannot know the faculties and vertues of the soule, but only by meanes of those instruments whereby it worketh, as we shewed in our former discourses the nature and vse of the externall members, and how the soule is serued by them: so now we will do the like by the internall parts, to the end that we may the better know the nature of the soule by her operations and instruments, as the labourer that worketh by his instruments, and frameth those workes that are before our eyes. For the soule being of a spiritual nature and not bodily, we cannot see it in it owne substance & nature, nor haue any knowledge thereof but by the effectes, by which we may iudge and conclude of their cause, as also by those testimonies of the soule, which the Lord affoordeth vs in his word. And although the vnderstanding of man can not attaine to an entire and perfect knowledge of the soule, yet that small knowledge which we may haue, doth exceedingly profit and delight vs. For seeing it is the most excellent creature that is created vnder the cope of heauen, yea more excellent then the heuens themselves, or any of the celestiall bodies, because the soule only is endued with reason and vnderstanding, there is no doubt but the knowledge thereof is more excellent, profitable, pleasant, and necessary, yea more worthy admiration then of any other thing whatsoever, as that which alwayes yeeldeth profit to the greatest things that can be. Therefore we ought not to set light by that knowledge of it which we may attaine vnto. For there is in it so great variety, beauty, and harmony, yea it is so well adorned and set forth, that no heauen nor earth is so well painted or bedecked with such beautifull, lively, and excellent images and pictures as that is. On the other side, she is the Mistresse and Author from whence proceedeth the inuention of all Artes and Sciences, and of all those wonderfull workes that are made throughout the whole course of mans life. Therefore no man can beholde her or think vpon her without great pleasure and admiration. And seeing the fountaine and well-spring of all good and euill that befalleth vs is in the soule, there is nothing more profitable for men then to know it well, to the end they may labour more carefully to keepe this fountaine pure and well purged, that all the riuers of their actions and workes may issue & flowe pure and cleane from thence. For that man can neuer gouerne his soule well, nor bee master of himselfe, that doth not know himselfe. If we desire to know what workes we are to looke for of a workeman, what he can doe, or what may befall him, what hee is good for, and for what he is vnmeete, he must first of all be knowne what he is. Therefore that sentence of which we haue already spoken, that saith, Know thy selfe, ought here especially to take place and to be practised. For it is a harder matter to know the nature and quality of our soule & of our minde, the vertues & affections therof, to enquire & consider of it wel, & to know what may be knowne therof, as also the diuerse & holow lurking holes, the turnings & windings therin, the to know the bones, flesh, sinewes, & blood of our bodies, withal the matter wherof it is made, & al the parts & members therof. Seeing then we are to make enquiry of the nature & power of the soule by the effects therof, according as I haue already spokē, and seeing the principall effects is the life which it giueth to al liuing creatures, let vs first consider of the difference that is betweene the creatures void of life, & of those that haue life in them. Afterward let vs looke into the sundry sorts of liues that are in liuing creatures, as that which will helpe vs well to the vnderstanding of that we seeke for. First then we must note that al creatures are either spirituall or bodily. Al they are spirituall creatures that are without bodies, & which cannot be perceiued by any bodily sense, & such are the Angels both good & bad, & the soules & spirits of men. The bodily creatures are al those that are visible, & that may be felt & perceiued perceiued by corporall senses; amongst which some haue no life; and some haue life. Again, Of creatures those creatures that haue no life, differ in two respects; for some of them haue no naturall without life. motion, as stones, metalles, mineralles, & such like creatures. Others haue their naturall motion; amongst which some are mutable, corruptible and subiect to change, others are immutable and incorruptible, continuing alwaies firme in their estate during the course of this world. The water, the aire, the windes, and the fire, are creatures hauing motion, albeit they haue no life; but they are subiect to corruption, and so are all the creatures that are compounded of the elements, whether they haue life or no. For being made of contrary matters and qualities, they corrupt and change, not in respect of their first matter and substance, which can neuer perish, according to the testimony of Philosophers, notwithstanding it alter in forme, but alwaies returneth to the first nature. Stones & mettalles, albeit they be very hard, yet are they not freed from corruption and consuming through vse. But the celestiaall bodies are of that matter and nature, that they moue continually, and yet abide alwaies intire and in their first forme, not being subiect to any change in respect of their bodies; neither do they weare or consume away as other creatures do that are vnderneath them. In so much that none of the celestiaall spheres are either wearied, worbe or spent more with all the labour they haue vndergone by the space of so many yeares, then they were the first day of their creation. For we must not take it for a change of their natures and qualities, that according to their diuerse course, the sunne, moone, and other planets and stars are sometimes further off, sometimes nearer each to other, that they haue their oppositions, coniunctions, diuerse and different aspects, according to the diuersitie and difference of their course and motion. We may say as much of the Eclipses both of the Sun and Moone. For the change that is amongst them is not in their owne bodies, substance, and qualities, but onely in regarde of vs and of our sight. Concerning the creatures that haue life, they are for the most part diuided into three kindes; but they that distinguish more subtilly make foure kindes. Of creatures hauing life. And because life is giuen by the soule, the Philosophers make as many sortes of soules as they doe of liues, and call them by the same names. They call the first, the nourishing or vegetatiue soule or life: the second the sensitiue: the third, the cogitiue: & the fourth, the reasonable soule, or the soule partaker of reason. Of the vegetatiue life. Touching the first, there is a kinde of life, that hath no other vertue in the creature to which it is giuen of God, then to nourish and cause it to increase, and to keepe it in being, vntill this life faile it. The soule that giueth life with these effects is called nourishing or vegetatiue; and this is proper to all herbes, trees, and plants that are maintained and kept in their kinds by the seeds, or by planting, setting, and such like propagations. Of the sensitiue. The second kinde of life named sensitiue, is so called, because it giueth not onely nourishment and groweth as the first, but sense also and feeling. They that will haue but three kinds, make but one of this, and of that which is called cogitiue by them that make foure, who attribute the sensitiue soule to the sea sponges, to oysters, cockles, and to those creatures which the Gracians and Latins call by a name, which in our language signifieth as much as plant-living creatures, because because they are of a middle nature betweene plants and living creatures hauing life and sense, as if they were compounded of both these natures together: so that they are more then simple plants, and yet are not perfect living creatures, as those are to whom is attributed the Cogitiue or knowing soule. And this is a soule and life, which not onely giueth whatsoever the two former imparteth to the creatures in whom they are, but also a certaine vertue and vigour, as of cogitation, of knowledge and of memorie, that they may haue skill to preserve their life, and know how to guide and gouerne themselves according to their naturall inclinatio. This soule is proper to brute beasts, whom some think to be partakers after a sort of reason, so farre forth as it concerneth things belonging to their nature. But wee will proceede no further at this time in this disputation: onely let vs note that they which make but three kindes of soule or life, doe giue to brute beastes that which wee called Sensitiue, comprehending them vnder that kinde of life, vnto which they attribute the same vertue and vigour whereof wee now spake, and which is distinguished by others, from that kinde of soule that giueth onely simple sense vnto the creature. Of the reasonable soule. The fourth kinde of soule and life is that of men, which hath all whatsoever is in the former kindes; and ouer & besides that (which is more excellent) is partaker of reason and vnderstanding: wherein it agreeth with the life of Angells, as wee will declare more at large in place conuenient, and shew also the difference that is betweene them. For this cause the soule of man giuen vnto him, is commonly called a reasonable soule, as all the former are called by names agreeing to their nature, as we haue declared. Therefore seeing the kinde of beasts in vnderstanding &

immortality.

soule and life comprehendeth all the vertues and properties of the rest, it must be called Vegetative, Sensitive, Cogitative and Reasonable altogether. But we must note heere, that there is great difference betweene the soules of men, and those other of which wee spake before. For beside that the soule of man is partaker of reason and vnderstanding, with all properties that are in the rest, it hath that common with the Angells, who are spirits created of GOD, to live a spirituall life without bodier, that it is immortall also as well as they. But of this, immortalitye we hope (GOD willing) to intreate at large hereafter, as also of the creation and proper nature of the soule. In these two points then of vnderstanding and of immortalitye, the soule of man doth much differre from that of beasts. For although they haue a soule that giueth vnto them life, motion, and sence, with all other things touched by me, yet it is not partaker of vnderstanding, nor of an immortall nature as the Angells & soules of men are, but it is of a mortall nature, which endeth and dieth with the body. Therefore albeit the soule of man hath in it whatsoeuer is in the rest, beside that which is proper vnto it aboue the rest, and that which it hath common with the Angells, neuerthelesse it is called onely by the name of that thing which is the principall, chiefest and most excellent in it; as also the like is done with all the other kindes of soule and life. But methinkes we ought to consider more fully of that which man hath either common or diuers in his nature from the soule of beasts, and what are the proper actions of the soule ioyned with the body, and how it is hindered by the body without any change of nature. For the consideration hereof will greatly further our knowledge of the internall and spiritual sences, of which wee are to discourse, that we may step by step ascend vp to the highest vnderstanding and knowledge which the minde of man can attaine vnto concerning the soule. Let vs therefore heare AMANA of this matter.

Of the two natures of which man is compounded: how the body is the lodge and instrument of the soule: how the soule may be letted from doing her proper actions by the body, and bee separated from it, and yet remaine in her perfection. Chap. 22.

The soule is the proper inhabitant of
mans body.

A*MANA*. Albeit the greatest excellencie of man, which far passeth that of all other liuing creatures, ought to bee valued according to the soule that God hath given him, differing from the soule of all other living creatures, his body beeing mortall and corruptible as that of beasts is; yet there are other points of excellencie in the matter, forme, and vse of all the parts and members of which the body of man is made, that are not found in any of the other, as we haue sufficiently shewed in our former discourses vpon this matter. When by God would teach vs, that he hath prepared and built this lodging for an other manner of inhabitant then he built the bodies of beasts, euen for a soule that differeth far from theirs.
For seeing hee maketh nothing without good reason, or that is without his profite, hee sheweth by the instruments prepared for the workeman whom he will set on worke, what manner of one he ought to be, and what workes he hath to make. And because he hath appointed workes and offices for the soule of man, which he would not haue in the soule of brute beasts, he hath given to man such members and instruments as he hath not given to other living creatures. As for those instruments which he hath common with beasts, God hath otherwise disposed and placed in his bodie according to the office euery one hath, as we may learne by their discourses.

Two natures
in man.

It is very euident, that man is not onely this masse and lumpe of skin, flesh, sinewes, bones, and of such other matter gathered altogether in one body, whereof we haue spoken already;
but that there is yet in him another nature whose substance is inuisible, ouer and aboue this bodily nature which we see. For experience sheweth vs what difference there is betwixt one and the same body when it is dead. When there is no life in it, none of all those faculties and vertues whereof the former discourse intreated, appeare within it, as we see they doe so long as life dwelleth therein. And yet then the body is not deprived of those members which it had before death, but keepeth them still vntil such time as they corrupt and waste away of themselves, & finally faile all together for want of the soule and life that should preserve and keepe them sound. In the meane time wee see, that they are without force, as vnfittes for vse, as if they were not at all, because they want soule and life which giueth them

vigour and setteth them a working. It is very cleere then by death, that the body hath no life of it selfe, nor any of those faculties and vertues which life bringeth with it; but that it receiveth them from another nature then from it owne. And this nature is called Soule, having sundry offices in man, as we have already vnder stood, & will hereafter handle them more particularly and in order. But in the meane time wee must note, that although the soule be not bodily, neuerthelesse it useth a bodily nature and instruments which it receiveth from that, for the performance of those workes that are assigned vnto it: which the soule could not doe without such instruments as are necessary thereunto. For as wee heard in the former speach, that among the creatures of God some are spirituall, others corporall, so we are to know also, that among the spirituall creatures, there are two sortes of spirits, of which some, namely, the Angels, were created to live a spirituall life agreeable to their nature, approaching nearer to the nature and life that is in God then any other: not being vnited or conioyned to any bodies that belong vnto them, vnto which they should giue life, as if they were creatures, compounded of bodie and spirite. Therefore wee call them not by the name of soules, as we doe the spirits of men, which God hath created to dwell in bodies, to giue them life, and to be ioyned with them in one person made of two natures, to wit, of a spirit and of a body. These spirites, which are also called humane soules, can live wel enough, and preferue themselves in their substance, hauing life alwaies in the, even after they are separated from their bodies. But the like cannot be saide of the bodies, which can not live, nor be preferued in their substance without their soules and spirits. Therefore Iesus Christ sayde, Fear not them that kill the body, and cannot kill the soule: but rather feare him that can destroy both body and soule in Hell. Wherefore albeit wee cannot see the soule, neither when it entereth into the body, and is ioyned vnto it, nor when it dwelleth there, nor yet when it departeth: yet it followeth not thereupon that it is not at all, or that it commeth to nothing. For the effects thereof shew vs the contrary, so long as that life which it giueth to the body continueth therein. And albeit we see no more effects of it, when it is seuered by death, yet it followeth not thereupon that the same thing should befall it that doth to the body, and so corrupt therewith. For it is so farre from corrupting with the body, that it keepeth the same from corruption so long as it is therein. And being separated, no maruaile if it effect no more that which it did in the body by those instruments which it had, because it hath them no longer.

Mens soules haue alwaies life in them.

Math. 10. 28. Luk. 12. 4. 5.

Wherefore in this respect it is like to an excellent Workeman, who cannot labour in his occupation without such instruments as necessarily belong thereunto. Yet in the meane season the Workeman continueth alwaies in the same estate, and hath no lesse knowledge and arte in him without his instruments, then when he hath them, albeit he vse them not when they are away. And although he enioyeth both his instruments and his arte, yet can he not well vse them, nor performe those workes which he hath to make, if they bee not sound, but corrupted or spoyled, as wee see in an instrument of Musicke. For if the chanter or Musicion be very expert in his arte, and handle his instrument as he ought to doe, yet can he neuer deliuer those foundes, tunes and harmonie which otherwise hee would, if his instrument were good. And yet that shall not hinder the Musicion from being alwaies as skilfull and expert in his arte, as if his instrument were very good and sound. Likewise if a man dwell in a dark lodging, he cannot see so wel & clearly, as in an other that is very light some: and yet he shall not haue sundry eyes, but the selfe same in both places. So that it followeth, that his dimnesse of his sight in one lodging rather then in the other, proceedeth not of any defect in his eyes, but of the house and habitation where hee is. The like may be saide of the soule lodged in the body, whose action and works therein are much hindred if it be badly lodged, if any part of the lodging be not good, or if it want those instruments and tooles that are necessary for it. For although it hath the vertue of sight in it selfe, yet it cannot without eyes see those things, which by means of them it beholdeth. And although it hath in it selfe the vertue to cause the hands and feete to mooue, and to set them on work according to their office, yet it cannot doe those workes by a maymed and lame hand, which it will doe by him that hath both his hands, nor cause a lame creeple wanting a foote or legge, or hauing some defect in those parts, to walke as well as an other that hath all these sound and perfect. And a man may iudge of my speech, by that which hapneth not only to them that fall into an Apoplexie, but also to such as haue some quaueme about their hart, so that they faint and fowne, and are for the time as it were dead: and yet afterward pluck vp their spirits, and come againe to their former estate. But before they bee reuiued, they seeme as though they had no soule in their bodies, because it is not perceiued by the works thereof, as it is when the body is well affected. And this is chiefly to be seene in a strong Apoplexie, or falling sicknesse, in which the patient loseth all motion and sence. Whereupon it hath come to passe oftentimes, that many haue beene buried for dead in that case, who were not withstanding aliue, and some haue recovered and done well afterward, as we haue many examples both in common experience, and in histories olde and new. Now whilst the soule is thus letted from performing her actions by such inconueniences, who would not iudge, that she were cleane extinguished with the body? Neuerthelesse afterward when she can vse her instruments, she sheweth plainly that the fault commeth not of her, but of the instruments that faile her. Therefore when we speake of the soule and of the body, we must put the same difference betweene them that is betwixt a workman and his tooles, considering the nature of both, and what they can doe both ioyntly and seuerally. For an instrument hath neither knowledge nor force, nor vertue of it selfe, being able to do nothing alone, but onely so farre forth as it is set on worke by some workman. But there is another reason in the workman. For although he cannot vse his arte without those instruments that are necessary thereunto, yet he hath alwaies abiding within him that arte, power, force, and dexterity, whereby he worketh. So that when we speake of the soule, wee are to consider what she can doe of her selfe and of her owne nature without the body, and what she cannot doe without it. For we learne in the holy Scriptures, that when Angels appeared to men, because they are spirits, and haue no speech like to that of men, as beeing bodilesse and wanting instruments necessary for the framing thereof, therefore they tooke mens bodies to appeare and speake to men in and by them. No maruaile then if the soule, which is created to vse the members of the body as instruments, speaketh not without a tongue, as it doth with one, and with the other Organes of voyce and speech. Now forasmuch as wee know, that the soule giueth life, motion and sence to all the body, and that it hath sundry instruments in the body, in which, and by which it performeth those works for which they were created of God, we are now to consider what faculty, power and vertue it hath in euery part of the body. For albeit that we cannot asigne to the soule, especially to the spirit and vnderstanding which is the most excellent part therein, any certaine place of lodging, as if it were inclosed within any one part, or within all the parts of the body, neuerthelesse we may iudge of the nature thereof by those instruments wherby it worketh, and by their nature, and by the works it produceth. And in this consideration wee haue a goodly glasse, wherein we may contemplate God that is inuisible, making him visible and knowne vnto vs by his workes: euen as the soule is become as it were visible, and sheweth it selfe to vs by the body, in which it dwelleth, and by the workes which it doth therein. Therefore let vs propound vnto our selues this whole visible world as it were one great body, then all the parts as members thereof: next let vs consider how the soule of al this great body, namely the vertue and power of God worketh therein, and effecteth all the workes that are done therein, according to that order hee hath set therein, as the soule worketh in the body of man and in euery member thereof. Thus doing, as we know that there is a soule in the body, and another nature beside that which is bodily, and which worketh therein, and this wee perceiue by the effects thereof: so let vs marke withall by the works done in this visible world, that there is another nature that effecteth them, which beeing inuisible differeth from all this world we see, as that which is farre more excellent, which filleth the whole, and by vertue and power is in all the parts thereof, as a soule in a body. But in propounding this glasse before our eyes, we must take heede, that wee fall not into their doctage, who haue thought and affirmed that the world is the body of God, and that himselfe is the soule thereof. For thereupon it would follow, that God is mortall and corruptible in regard of his body, and that some part or other thereof would alwaies corrupt, as wee daily see corporall things doe. Againe, if it were so, God should not be infinite and incomprehensible as hee is: for the world doth not comprehend and containe him, but he all the world, whereof he is the Creator, and by whom the world is and consisteth. Seeing then the soule is the image of God in man, as the body of man is the image of this great world, in which God worketh as the soule doth in the body of man, let vs consider how God hath distributed the powers, vertues, and offices of the soule in the body, and in euery part thereof, as he manifesteth his glory and vertue in all this visible world, and in all the parts of it. For first, they agree herein, that as there is but one soule in one body, which is sufficient for all the parts and members thereof, so there is but one God in the world, sufficient for all the creatures. Next, if we cannot conceiue how the soule is lodged in the body, or how it giueth life vnto it, neither yet how it worketh and displaieth therein the vertues which it hath, but onely so farre forth as it testifieth the same by those diuers effects, which we see and perceiue in euery part and member thereof, no maruaile then if we cannot with our eyes discern or comprehend how God is throughout all, filling heaven and earth, how he displaieth his power and vertue, how he worketh in all his creatures, and how he guideth, gouerneth, and preserueth them by his heavenly providence. For if we cannot comprehend the creature, nor the nature thereof, how shall we comprehend the nature of the Creator? And if it be not in our power to know the workes of God wrought in vs, neither the workes of our owne soule, how shall we know his workes done in the whole world? And if we be not able to vnderstand or comprehend them, doth it follow therefore that he doth them not? yet there are many that conclude after that sort. For they beleue nothing but that which they are able to conceiue, know, and comprehend by their naturall reason. And so, because they cannot know how the soule being of a spirituall nature is ioyned with the body, which is cleane of another nature, nor conceiue how it is lodged and worketh therein, therefore they must conclude that they haue no soule, which worketh that in them that is there done. For they see not, neither can they shew how it worketh by those instruments, which it hath in the body, but onely so farre forth, as they beholde the worke. But we shall haue occasion else where to handle this more at large. For this time let vs goe forward with our speech of the powers and faculties of the soule, considering first of the braine, which is the principall instrument thereof, and the seate of the internall senses already mentioned by vs, of which we are to be instructed particularly.

The absurd collection of Atheists.

Of the braine, and of the nature thereof: of the sundrie kindes of knowledge that are in man: of the similitude that is betweene the actions and workes of the naturall vertues of the soule, and of the internall Sences. Chap. 23.

AR A M. The workmanship which God hath wrought in the whole course of nature as well in the nature of the heavens as of the elements, of liuing things, of plants, metals and other creatures, doth vndoubtedly containe in it great miracles, and very excellent and euident testimonies: which shew plainly vnto vs, that the nature of all things, yea of the whole world, commeth not by fortune and aduenture, but that they were created and ordayned by a more excellent nature then any can bee found in all the world. But there is not a more expresse and cleerer image of the diuine nature, then in that part of man, wherein are to be found those great and maruailous properties, which are commonly called Animales, as namely the Thought, Vnderstanding, and knowledge of numbers, and of Order, Reason, Iudgement, Memory, with the discerning of honest things from those that are dishonest, of good things from bad, together with the Election or Reijection of them. Therefore the contemplation of these vertues and powers is very necessary for vs, that by the knowledge of them wee may daylie learne to knowe GOD the better, by that resemblance and similitude of his wisdom, which he hath vouchsafed to transfer & to imprint in mans nature: and that we might be induced thereby to glorifie him: and that we should labour to the vttermost of our power, to haue this image shine in vs more and more, and daily to increase in likenesse vnto the patterne from whence it is taken.

Of the animal vertues.

Now let vs follow that diuision which wee haue already made of the sundry faculties, vertues, properties and offices which the soule hath in the body, namely, the Animall, Vitall, and Naturall: and that diuision also which we made of mans body, vnto which many attribute three seuerall parts, and call them bellies, the first and highest of which they place in the head, for the Animall faculties and vertues: the second, which is the middlemost belly, in the breast and stomacke for the Vitall vertues: and the last, from the Midriffe to the share bone, for the Naturall faculties. They vnderstand by the first the whole braine, which they diuide also into sundry partes, and call them likewise Bellies, and little Bellies. We haue already heard of the excellency of the head, of the place and situation thereof, of the goodly outward members wherewith it is beautified, of the bones whereof it is made, and of the couering wherewith they are couered, that the braine might haue his conuenient lodging.

and such a one as is requisite for the nature and office it hath: that it might bee well fortified and defended on every side to preserve & keepe it well, against all outward inconveniences that might come vnto it: & to the end also it might haue neere about it all those seruants and sences which it guideth and governeth, and all those instruments which it standeth most in neede of, both in regard of the workes it is charged with, as also for the purging thereof. For as much then as it is lodged in the head, we are to know, that as the head hath a certaine agreement with the heauens, and the eyes with the celestiall lights, as we haue already touched, so is it likewise with the braine. For it is of a more heavenly nature, and approacheth neerer to the spirituall and diuine nature then any other part of the whole body, as that where in a man may finde all those excellent vertues and Animall powers of which I made mention in the beginning of my speech, and which are no actions or workes of a brutish nature. Whereof also it followeth very well, that the Workemaster and author thereof, cannot bee of a brutish nature, without vnderstanding and knowledge of order, of things honest and dishonest, and of good and bad. Which teacheth vs moreover, that he greatly esteemeth of the preservation of nature and of humane societie, and detesteth whatsoever is contrary thereunto, seeing he hath imprinted in man such an image of his diuine nature, as he would not willingly haue defaced and blotted out. Wherefore, although wee cannot thoroughly know, either the nature of the braine, or the actions thereof, or of the soule which it serueth: yet that which may come to our knowledge will greatly helpe to confirme more and more this testimony of God and of his providence, which is already imprinted in our hearts by the light and law of nature. Therefore it were very good and profitable for vs, to consider diligently of that resemblance of God, which every one of vs beareth in a very small image, that we may giue him thanks, and referre to their proper end all those giftes and excellent parts, which he hath placed in our nature. We are to note then for the first point, that as GOD manifesteth more excellently his diuine nature, and the glorie of his maiestie in the heauens, and in the highest parts of this great visible world, then hee doth in other parts more base and terrestriall, as we may easily know by the contemplation of them: so dealeth hee with the head and braine of man, which is at it were the lodging of the internal sences already named, which are farre more excellent and noble then the outward sences. For if liuing creatures, and chiefly man, should onely and barely apprehend those things that are before them, without any imagination, thought, or consideration of them, thereby to know how to chuse or reiect them, as they may be either profitable or hurtfull, it would not bee greatly profitable, to haue them presented to the outward sences. For this cause God hath ioyned vnto them another facultie and vertue, which is more excellent and wonderfull then is the simple apprehending of them. This facultie and power is giuen for the knowledge of things, and that to the instruments in the braine, as it appeareth by experience in this, that according as the braine and the parts thereof are well or ill affected, it is perceived in the internal sences, of which they are the instruments, as wee will expresse more plainly in the sequelle of our speech. But concerning this present matter in the hand, we are to note, that there are three kindes of knowledge.

The first knoweth those bodies onely that are present before it: the second knoweth those also that are absent: and the third those things that haue no bodies. Wee see by experience, that although plants haue a certaine agreement with other liuing creatures, namely in this, that they inioy the same life with them, which we called before the Vegetative or Nourishing life, neuertheless, other liuing creatures haue this more then they, that they know, see, heare, taste, smell, and touch, which things are without them: whereas the whole life of plants hath nothing but that which is within them, hauing no sence or knowledge outwardly. Concerning that knowledge, which taketh notice onely of corporall things that are present before it, it is the same that belongeth properly to the external sences, of which we spake before, and which are giuen by GOD to liuing creatures for their preservation. For seeing they are bodily natures, and must liue amongst bodies, he hath endued them with a certaine knowledge of those bodies, to the end they may desire and follow after such things as are agreeable to their nature, and eschew that which is hurtfull. Now that which is hidden within any thing, is knowne by some outward meanes. And therefore the bodily sences were giuen vnto them, to the end that by them they might know whatsoever is externall, being annexed to the things that are perceived. And although GOD hath not giuen to all liuing creatures outward sences alike, yet they that are perfect haue all those five sences spoken of in our former discourses, by which they are able to perceiue and know all outward things things, so that nothing can be founde, which is not comprehended vnder the knowledge of the senses. Wherein God hath so provided, that according to mans iudgement we see that all perfect living creatures ought to haue iust so many and not one more or lesse. For if they had lesse, they should not be so perfect as they are: and if they had more, they would be superfluous and for no vse, at least wise so farre forth as our small capacitie could conceiue, leauing in the meane while to the incomprehensible wisdom, and infinite power of God, that which we are not able to comprehend. For we owe him this reuerence, seeing he alone knoweth all things that are necessary and expedient for all creatures. Now besides this outward knowledge of things present, we see plainly, that there is another knowledge within of things that are absent. For our own experience teacheth vs, that even then when our externall senses are retired and withdrawne from doing their duties, the imagination, thought, consideration and remembrance of those things we haue seene, heard, tasted, smelt, touched and perceived with corporall senses, remaine still in vs both waking and sleeping: as it appeareth by our dreames, in which the images & resemblance of those things which the bodily senses perceived waking are represented to our internall senses when we are asleepe. We see testimonies of some part of this knowledge even in brute beastes, which causeth them to haue respect to such things as they neede: but yet they haue it not as men haue, who haue far greater knowledge, and more internall senses then beastes, as being partakers of reason and vnderstanding. The third kinde of knowledge, which is of things that are not bodily, is the principall effect of the vnderstanding, which listeth vp all the senses of man to the contemplation of the diuinity, and of the spirituall and supernaturall things: which kinde of knowledge is proper to man and to no other living creature. Of this knowledge we will intreate more at large hereafter, when we shall speake of those principall and most noble senses of the soule, namely vnderstanding, and reason. In the meane time that wee may the better knowe the facultie, vertue and office of every one of those internall senses of which we will intreate, wee are to vnderstand, that the soule worketh by them in their places, almost after the same manner it doth in the diuers kinds of her naturall faculties and vertues, according to the nature of every one of them. For this power and vertue which we call naturall, and which before we said was the third faculty that continually worketh in man and neuer ceaseth, is diuided into three sorts. The first is the vertue of nourishing, the second of augmenting, the third of ingendring: and these haue sixe other vertues and faculties common to them altogether. The first draweth vnto it, the second holdeth fast, the third digesteth, the fourth distributeth, the fift assimilateth and incorporateth, that is, conuerteth into it owne substance that which is dispensed vnto it, and so turneth it into the substance of the body that receiueth it: the sixt driueth forth whatsoever is superfluous. For the nourishment which the bodie receiueth would doe it no good, vnlesse it had some vertue in it to draw the same vnto it selfe, as also members and instruments meete for this worke, as wee will declare more at large by the helpe of God, when we shall speake more particularly of this matter. Besides, it is not enough for the body to draw foode to it selfe, but it must also retaine the same. And because the things that are taken cannot nourish the body except they be turned into the nature thereof, therefore they must first bee digested and prepared by this meane, as we vse to prepare such meats as haue need of dressing before we eate the. But because they are not sufficiently prepared by this first dressing, they must be once againe dressed by the naturall heat that is in the body, without which neither the heate of the materiall fire, nor the heate of the Sunne will serue the turne, vnlesse this naturall heate also doe his duty. Now after the meate is thus digested and prepared, it must be distributed and parted to all the members, that every one may take such nourishment as is meete for it. And because the matter is diuers in the whole composition of the body, as namely bones, gristles, ligaments, sinewes, arteries, veines, flesh, and other kinds of matter whereof we haue spoken heretofore: therefore must the food also be so conuerted in every member, as that it is to bee altered into a substance altogether like to every seuerall part it hath to nourish. Now forasmuch as al that the body taketh in for nourishment, is not fitte for that purpose, after that nature hath taken that which may doe her good, she reiecteth the residue, which is not onely not profitable but also very hurtfull for her, vnlesse she did cast it forth, and so discharge and purge the body thereof. Now let vs see how the like is wrought in the braine betwene the internall senses and the Animall vertues. For first there must be some facultie and vertue that receiueth the images imprinted in the senses, the knowledge whereof is as single and plaine as may be, because it is onely of things that are bodily and present, as I haue already declared. This vertue is called Imagination, or the Imaginative vertue, which is in the soule as the eye in the body, by beholding to receiue the images that are offered vnto it by the outward senses: and therefore it knoweth also the things that are absent, and is amongst the internall senses as it were the mouth of the vessell of memory, which is the facultie and vertue that retaineth and keepeth whatsoeuer is committed to the custody thereof by the other senses, that it may be found and brought forth when neede requirerh. Therefore Memory is as it were their treasure to keepe that which they commit vnto it, and to bring it forth in due time and season. Now after that the Imagination hath receiued the images of the senses, singly and particularly as they are offered vnto it, then doth it as it were prepare and digest them, either by ioyning them together, or by separating them according as their natures require.

They that distinguish Imagination from Fantasie, attribute this office to Fantasie: others say it belongeth to the Common sense, vnder which they comprehend both the former faculties, because the office thereof is to receiue the images that are offered vnto it, and to discern the things as they are presented by al the externall senses, and to distinguish them as they doe. Afterward it is requisite, that all these things thus heaped together, should be distributed and compared one with another, to consider how they may bee conioyned or seuered, how one followeth another, or how farre asunder they are, that so a man may iudge what is to be retained and what to be refused. And this office belongeth to Reason, after which Iudgement followeth, whereby men chuse or refuse that which reason alloweth or disalloweth. For it belongeth to reason to discourse, and memory afterward, as I haue already touched, hath this office to retaine and keepe all. Thus you see the similitude & comparison that may be considered of betwene the actions and workes of the natural vertues of the soule, and those of the Animall vertues in the internall senses: which may greatly help vs to the better vnderstanding of that which we haue already touched before, concerning the spirituall foode of our soules, which properly belongeth to the internall senses. Now because all these senses, faculties and vertues haue their instruments in the braine, before we speake more at large and particularly of their office and nature, wee must see how these parts are placed in the head, and what vessels and members they haue in the braine: and this ACHITO B shall teach vs.

Of the composition of the Braine, with the members and parts thereof: of their offices, and of that knowledge which ought to content vs, touching the principall cause of the vertues and wonderfull powers of the soule. Chap. 24.

The nature of the reasonable part in the soule is hard to be known.

ACHITO B. The actions, faculties and vertues of the soule are so high and obscure, that their excellency far surmounteth the capacity of our vnderstanding. For we haue no other soule aboue this that effecteth these works, whereby we might see and know the nature hereof, as by this we come to the knowledge of corporall things, whose nature being of lesse excellency and more base, our soule which is of a more high & noble nature is able to know, comprehend and iudge of them. But because there is no nature in vs more high and excellent then our soule, none can know it as it is, but onely the creator that made it, especially that reasonable part of the soule, wherein the image of God is more liuely, and shineth more cleerely then in the rest. Therefore wee may in some sort know by this part, facultie and vertue which is the chiefest, what is the nature of the rest, that are inferiour vnto it. But because there is no part in vs aboue that, we cannot perceiue and know how it useth the internall senses, with their vessels & instruments, as by this we may iudge of the Vnall vertue, which it sheweth vnto vs in the heart, and of the Nutritive vertue which it discovereth vnto vs in the liuer, and in other parts and members serving to these faculties, as also to the vertue of generation. Therefore we must waite for a more ample knowledge of our selues, chiefly of our soules, and aboue all of that part which is most excellent in it, when we shall by the goodnesse and grace of G O D behold face to face the creatour that created it, and shall behold and know our selues in him, and contemplate him in all perfection and truth. But seeing we vnderstood by the former speech, that all the Animall faculties and vertues, and all the internall fences (in the knowledge whereof we desire to be instructed more at large) haue their seates and instruments in the braine, let vs now consider how these parts are placed within the head. And first of all we must call to minde what we heard before of the outward parts thereof. As for that which is within, there are hollow places, called Little Bellies, distinguished by distance of place, as it were diuers chambers in one building. Therefore there are certaine membranes or skinnies both to distinguish them and knitte them together, as also to preserue and keepe them from all hurt and daunger.

Of the little Bellies of the braine.

Now albeit these skinnies haue this office, yet it is much to bee maruailed at, how this whole frame can keepe it selfe and continue so firme, as it were the roofof a house or Church, considering that the matter there is great, spongie, and very tender. The first of these skinnies is a thicke covering, which is one of the chiefest skinnies that belong to our body. The substance thereof is thicke, and harder then any other skinne, and therefore it is called the Hard mother, because it bringeth forth and preserueth all the rest.

Of Dura mater, or the hard mother.

The vse and profit thereof is to wrap and fould in round about the whole braine, and to keepe it, that whilest it moueth, it should not be hurt with the bone of the head, which is commonly called the skull. For nature vseth to set a meane betweene two contraries, as wel to knit them together, as to preserue both the one & the other. Therefore because the bones of the skull are hard, and the braine is soft and tender, God hath placed this covering, which is of a middle substance betweene them both, and is so tyed to the one and the other, that it hangeth as it were betweene both, and toucheth neither of them, but there is space betweene them, to the end that motion of the braine might be free without any let or hindrance. The second vse therof is, to serue for a passage to the veines and arteries, for the nourishing of the braine and governing of the vitall spirits. Last of all, it serueth to distinguish the whole braine, first into two parts, namely into that before, and that behinde: then into the right side and the left. It is of this skin whereof some men thinke Salomon spake, when he made mention of a golden Ewer broken in the extremitie of olde age, & so we expounded it when we intreated of the marrow in the chine-bone. Besides this skinne, there is another named the godly mother, which is fine and very slender, wouen of many veines and arteries, seruing not onely for it owne life and nourishment, but also for that of the braine. Neither doth it only compasse and wrap in the braine round about, as the Hard mother doth, but entreteth also into the bowels and windings thereof, to tie and knit it together on all sides. As for the braine, which is the fountaine and beginning of the sinewes and of the voluntary motion, and the instrument of the chiefest facultie of the soule, namely, the Animall and reasonable facultie, it is greater in man then in any other creature, as that which filleth almost the whole skull. I say almost, because if it filled it fully and wholly, the motion thereof could not be perfect. His office and vse is, to worke and make fine the Animall spirit, which is necessary for the whole body, and to serue as an instrument to the facultie of reason, which is the chiefest facultie and vertue of the soule. The first part of the braine retaineth the name of the whole, being diuided into two parts, namely into the right part and the left. The hinder part is called the little braine, and that in comparison of the other parts. So that when a man considereth the whole braine, hee shall finde within the substance thereof foure Ventricles, or hollow places, which are ioyned together by certaine waies. Now although wee cannot see with our eyes, nor well vnderstande and conceiue howe the soule worketh by her instruments, neuerthelesse God giueth vs a certaine entrance into some knowledge thereof by the matter and forme which they haue. And therefore it seemeth, that these little bellies of the braine haue such waies from one to another, to this end, that by them, the spirits that are made and imprinted by the sensible and intelligible kindes and images, might passe and bee communicated one with another. Now because they must not onely be well wrought, but also thoroughly clesed of all excrements, God hath created those vessels and instruments, in which this worke is to bee begunne, greater then the others, which are to receiue the spirits alreadie wrought and almost perfected. Therefore the two first are the greatest, hauing the situation before, namely on each side one, and being in fashion like to two halfe moones. The third is vnderneath them right in the midst of the braine. The fourth and last is vpon the bending downe of the nape of the necke. As for the two first ventricles, they are so conioyned the one with the other, that they end in one common pipe or passage, like to two paire of smithes bellows. And it seemeth that God hath made them of that fashion as if he meant thereby to shew vs, that the spirit of the said ventricles hauing receiued his forme of the kindes and images propounded vnto it, is carried by this passage into the middle ventricle or bellie. I omit to speake at large of many vessels and instruments, which serue the braine for sundry purposes, amongst the which there is one, which both the Greeke & Latine Philisicians call by a name that signifieth a Presse, because the bloud is pressed into it for the nourishing of the braine: and another is called a Vault, both in respect of the fashion and of the vse. For it is like a Vault or arch rooffe set vpon three pillars, and is as it were the rooffe and covering of the middle ventricle, that there might be a more free and easie space for the motion of the Animall spirit that is made therein: and also that it might more easily sustaine and beare the great quantitie of braine, that leaneth vnto each side of it. I omitte also other instruments, which serue in like manner to strengthen and support the parts thereof. There is also one instrument made as it were of many pieces ioyned together like little wheelles, which is called Like-worme, because of the likelihood it hath with those great white wormes that are found in rotten wood. It seemeth that this peece was placed there, to bee as it were the porter, to shuts and open the passage of the spirit that goe into the hinder most ventricle, to the ende they should enter therein measurable, and so auoide the confusion of the memorie that is placed there: which otherwise would happen if they should enter in too sodainely and too much at once. There is likewise a pipe, to euacuate the grosse and thicke excrements of the braine, as well by the rooffe of the mouth, as by the nose: and therefore because it resemblith a little basin, or rather a funnell, it is called by those names.

Moreover, there is a pipe that passeth from the middle ventricle to the last, which is as it were the chariot of the spirit, to passe from one to the other. In all which things, and in many others particularly obserued by Philisitions and Anatomists, in this part of the braine, wee may note a wonderfull workmanship both for the variety of instruments, and for their fitte application to those duties that are assigned them. Wherefore we may well say, that it is in this part of man chiefly, wherein GOD doeth most excellently manifest his diuine nature, and the glory of his maiestie. And this we shall better perceiue, by considering particularly and in order vnto which of the internall senses al these parts of the braine are vessels and instruments, in which the faculties and vertues of the soule are contained and doe shewe themselves. But as was saide in the beginning of our speech, let vs not heere looke for a sound and perfect knowledge of that substantiall power, whereby the soule effecteth so many maruailous workes by the meanes of these senses. For so high a secret being laide vp and hidde in wisdom and truth it selfe, cannot fall within the small capacitie of mans sense and vnderstanding, vntill the light thereof bee purged from that corporall darkenesse wherewith it is couered and compassed about during this life.

Neuerthelesse by a diligent contemplation of that matter, which we haue noted worthie of admiration, we shall finde sufficient wherewith to content our mindes, by causing them to looke to themselves, in respect of that which it hath pleased GOD hereto reueale and manifest two manner of waies. First, because wee may in some sort take a viewe of nature, by searching out therein those things, of which she doeth heere set before vs very euident testimonies: even those things which may bee demonstrated (although grossely) according to the capacitie of our dull vnderstandings. The second way, which is the chiefest and most sure, is by that testimony which himselfe affordeth vs in his word. For let vs not thinke that the minde can pronounce any thing for certaine, but as it is directed by the testimony of GOD, seeing the senses which hee hath giuen vs, come short herein, and are not able to ascend vp so high. For the excellencie of this creature, and of the nature thereof is such and so great, that it cannot perfectly know and comprehend it selfe, especially where it is of greatest dignitie. So that if we desire to haue certaine knowledge, whither should we haue recourse in this defect of our senses, but vnto him that is able to certifie vs truly in this point? And who can tellie the truth of the worke, but the workemaster that made it, and therefore knoweth it better then any other, and all the perfection that is in it? Why then doe wee not yeele to GOD that honour in a thing not to bee comprehended by vs, which wee doe to men of whom wee are well perswaded in things which wee cannot know but by their testimonie? For how manie things doe wee beleue of which wee knowe not the causes, and for which wee haue no other reason shewed vs, but onely the testimonie and authoritie of men, men, whom we iudge worthy of credite? who notwithstanding may themselves be deceiued, and deceiue others. But G O D cannot be deceiued, nor deceiue those that giue credit to his testimony, which he hath not so hidden from men, but that it is manifested vnto them, yea he hath chosen some amongst them to testifie the same from him to others. And if it hath pleased him to haue such witnesses amongst them, a man may soone see that hee hath chosen them in whom he hath caused his image to shine most excellently, and whom he hath made more like to himselfe, as well by the reuelation of his holy Spirit, in all those excellent graces and vertues wherewith he hath indued them; as also by those holy and heavenly workes which he effecteth by them, whereby hee hath as it were marked them with his seale to giue them authority, and to cause them to be acknowledged of all for his faithfull witnesses and seruants. If then we desire to haue certaine and true witness in any such matter, where can we finde them sooner then amongst the Patriarkes, Prophets and Apostles, with all those Martyrs and other holy personages, whose doctrine and life testifie vnto vs how farre they differ from other men? But aboueall, how highly ought we to esteeme the testimonie of the very Sonne of G O D, who is to bee preferred before all others? Seeing therefore we haue so many faithfull witnesses, let vs keepe vs to their testimonie, waiting for that perfect light, and more cleere and ample knowledge which shall be reuealed vnto vs in that heavenly glory. In the meane time let vs consider how wee are able to comprehend the infinite nature of the Creatour of our soule, seeing we cannot conceiue the nature of the soule, which he hath created: and let vs reiect those dogs and hogs, those Atheists and Epicures, who iudge of God and of the soule of man so far forth onely as they are able to knowe and comprehend by their naturall sence; whereby they see no further into the soule of man then they doe into the soules of beasts, whom themselves resemble: But suppose they had no other testimonie of the celestiall and diuine nature of the soule, but that which it affoordeth vs daily by those faculties and vertues wherewith God hath endued it, and the effectes it sheweth vs, yet ought they to learne to iudge otherwise. Now to morrow it will be thy part A S E R, to begin the particular handling of these goodly internall sences, whose vessels and instruments wee haue considered of in this speech: as also thou art to teach vs who be the chiefe ministers of the soule for all her actions.

A S E R. The knowledge of many things is so naturall to men, that being borne with them, it is like to a light attending vpon the mind, as the sight doth vpon the eyes. For the knowledge of numbers, and of order; the Principles and beginning of Artes, the knowledge and distinction of things honest and dishonest, proceede from such a light. And when Saint Paul saith, that the Gentiles, and all that haue not receiued of God the Law of the two Tables as the people of Israel did, haue notwithstanding a Law written in their hearts that doth accuse or excuse them, no doubt but by this Law he vnderstandeth that naturall knowledge which men haue both of God, and of good, & euill, which issueth from a higher spring then from the outward sences, and which euery one hath for a schoolemistresse within him selfe, euen they also that would extinguish wholly this light if they could. For although God hath imprinted many similitudes and testimonies of himselfe in all creatures, whereby he manifesteth himselfe vnto vs, yet should we know nothing more then the brute beasts doe, if there were not a light in our minds that causeth vs to see & know the, & to conclude that which we doe: which light is not in beasts, albeit they haue outward sences as well as we.

we. But it is commonly said, that there is nothing in the vnderstanding, which hath not first beene in the outward senses: that is to say, that it can know nothing, which is not first discovered and manifested vnto it by them. But we must vnderstand that saying of such things as fall vnder their powers and faculties, which being knowne and noted by the senses, doe awaken and stirre vp the vnderstanding, which after by that vertue it hath in it selfe, proceedeth forward, namely, from signes and effects vnto causes, from accidents to substances, and from particular things to vniuersalities. Dan. 2. 28. 29

of Fantasie.

We must first remember the diuision which before we made of the animall facultie & power, and thereupon we note that the sensitive & motiue powers, whereby the soule, vsing the meanes of the sinewes and muscles, giueth voluntary sense and motion to all the body, haue no speciall place or seate in the braine, as the other internall senses haue, but are dispersed throughout the whole substance thereof. Concerning the chiefe power and faculty we were tolde before, how some distinguish betweene Imagination, fantasie, and the Common sense: and how others comprehend them all in one. But be it that wee ioyne or separate them, let vs now consider of the nature and places of each of them. The Common sense is so called, because it is the first of all the internall senses of which wee are to speake, as also the Prince and Lord of all the externall senses, who are his messengers and seruants to minister and make relation vnto him of things in common. For it receiueth al the images and shapes that are offered and brought vnto it by them, yea all the kindes and resemblances of materiall things, which they haue receiued onely from without, as a glasse doth: and all this for no other cause but that they should discerne and seuer euery thing according to it owne nature and propertie, and afterward communicate them to the internall senses. For although al the knowledge that is in the minde of man proceedeth not from the outward senses as we shewed in the beginning of our speech, neuerthelesse they are created of God, to the ende they should send to the vnderstanding the similitudes of things without, and be the messengers of the minde, and witnesses of experience: and also to the end they should awaken and stir vp the minde to beholde & marke the things that are without it, that by considering of them, it may iudge of, and correct the faults. We must then obserue, that the externall senses haue no iudgement of that which they outwardly receiue but by meanes of the common sense, vnto which they make relation, and then that iudgeth: so that they ende where that beginneth. In this manner therefore as the Common sense of all the internall senses is next vnto the externall, so is it the meanes whereby they communicate one with another. For afterward it carrieth to the other internall senses whatsoever hath beene communicated vnto it by the externall. Now after this sence hath done his duty, Imagination and Fantasie execute their offices, both which are taken by many for one and the same facultie and vertue of the soule, but yet distinguished from the Common sense: others ioyne them both with the Common sense, because these three senses, whether they be distinguished or taken all for one, haue their seates, vessels, and instruments in the former part of the braine. Therefore there will be no danger if we vse these two names Fantasie and Imagination indifferently. For Fantasie is deriued from a Greeke word that signifieth as much as Imagination: and it is translated by Cicero into a Latine word, which is as much as Vision. This facultie therefore and vertue of the soule is called Fantasie, because the visions, kindes, and images of such things as it receiveth, are diuersly framed therein, according to the formes & shapes that are brought to the Common sense. Therefore Daniel called the dreame of Nebuchadnezzar, the visions of the head, which he had vpon his bed, according to the thoughts wherupon he mused & fel on sleepe. For although this was a heauenly dreame, yet God vsed therein the internall senses, which he had giuen to Nebuchadnezzar, vnto which hee presented the image of those things hee would haue him to vnderstand and know, as afterward they were expounded vnto him by Daniel.

Moreouer this faculty of the fantasie is sudden, and so farre from slayednes, that euén in the time of sleepe it hardly taketh any rest, but is alwaies occupied in dreaming and dotting, yea euén about those things which neuer haue beene, shall be, or can be. For it staieth not in that which is shewed vnto it by the senses that serue it, but taketh what pleaseeth it, and addeth thereunto or diminisheth, changeth & rechangeth, mingletb and vnmingletb, so that it cutteth asunder and seweth vp againe as it listeth. So that there is nothing but the fantasie will imagine and counterfaite, if it haue any matter and foundation to worke vpon, without which it can build nothing, as we may iudge by that which hath bin already shewed, namely that man can neither thinke, imagine, or do any thing else, of which he hath not some beginning and ground in nature and in the works of GOD, from which after he hath his inventions. But although fantasie can doe nothing without this gap and entrance, yet it is a wonder to see the inventions it hath after some occasion is given it, and what new and monstrous things it forgeth and coyneth, by sundry imaginations arising of those images and similitudes, from whence it hath the first paterne. So that in truth, fantasie is a very dangerous thing. For if it be not guided and bridled by reason, it troubleth and mo-beth all the sence and vnderstanding, as a tempest doth the sea. For it is easily stirred vp not only by the externall sences, but also by the complexion and disposition of the body. Hereof it proceedeth that euen the spirits both good and bad haue great access vnto it, to stirre it either to good or euil, & that by meanes vnknown to vs. For as we haue many meanes to prouoke one anothers imagination and fantasie, which are not in beastes, neither can bee comprehended by the, so these spirituall natures (by reason of the agreement of their nature) haue one towards an other, which wee neither know nor can comprehend, whereby they haue access to mooue our fantasie diuers wayes. Wherefore as the Angells haue meanes to represent to our mindes the images of good, heavenly, and diuine things, both waking & sleeping, so can euill spirits greatly trouble them by diuers illusions: the prooffe whereof we haue in many, whom bad spirits finde apt and disposed thereunto, and namely in socrers, whose minde they trouble in such sort by sundry strange illusions, that they verily thinke that they haue seene, heard spoken, and done that which the diuell representeth to their fan-tasie, yea such things as neither men nor diuels themselves can possibly performe: and yet all that while they stir not out of their bed, or out of some one place. But the diuell, having once power ouer them, doth in such sort print in their fantasie the images of those things he representeth vnto them, and which he would haue them beleue to be true, that they can not thinke otherwise but it is so, that they haue done such things, and that they were awake when indeed they slapt. For as God appeareth to his seruants by heavenly visions, both when they sleepe and when they wake, and printeth in their mindes the images of those things which it pleaseth him to reueale vnto them: so the diuell, who endeoureth to counterfait all the workes of GOD to deceiue men, hath his diuellish illusions for his vi- sions, whereby hee moueth and troubleth the fantasie and mindes of those, ouer whome he reigneth through their infidelitie and wickednesse. Therefore it is very needefull, that men should recommend themselves to God, to the ende these euill spirits haue no such power ouer them, and that their iudgements may bee sound to discerne the images of those things which hee representeth to their mindes, from all Diabolicall illusions. And surely no maruaile if wicked spirits so oftentimes deceiue men, when as Iuglers haue so many waies to abuse them, shewing them such strange sights, that if they were not wrought by those kinde of men, a great many would take them for miracles. Yea although they bee done after this manner, yet wee wonder thereat, being hardly able by the sharpnesse of our wits to attaine to the knowledge thereof, so that many are perswaded that such things cannot bee done without the power of the deuill. But let vs returne to our matter. This imaginative power of the soule, hath moreouer such vertue, that oftentimes the imagination printeth in the body, the images of those things which it doeth vehemently thinke of and apprehend, the experience whereof is very euident, especially in the longings and imaginations of Women with childe. Many times also wee see some that can hardly goe ouer a bridge without falling, by reason of the apprehension of the danger, which they haue conceived in their fantasie and imagination. But which is yet more strange, it falleth out oftentimes, that the fantasies and imaginations of great bellied women are so vehement and violent, that vpon the bodies of the children they goe withall they print the images and shapes of those things vpon which they haue fixed their fancies, and vnto which by reason of their fancie, they are most affectionated. Wee see examples hereof a great many continually. Neither is it altogether without reaso which we vse comonly to say: that fancie breeds the fact which it imagineth. For, we see many fall into those mishaps and inconueniences, which they imprint in their fantasie and imagination. VVee may also obserue here, how wee are prouoked to yawne and gape when wee see others doe so, and driuen into a desire of many things of which wee should not haue dreamed, vlesse wee had bene incited thereunto by the example of others, or by some object presented to our senses, & prouoking vs therunto. Yea this imaginative vertue can do much in beastes, as among other things we may see it in this, that they desire rather to make water in a puddle, or in a tiuer, or in some other water, or vpon adunghil or in a stable, the elsewhere.

For the things that are offered to their senses soone moue their fantasie and imagination, which afterward stirreth them vp, either in respect of the agreement that is betwixt those things, namely, water, and vrine, or because of their custome to doe such a thing in such a place, which putteth them in minde and helpeth them to doe it more readily, by reason of the imaginative vertue that is in them.

Psal. 119. 37.

Now if imagination hath such vertue in beastes, we may iudge also what it is able to do in the minde of man, which is a great deale more quicke and ready. Therefore we ought to eschew all occasions of euill, that may be presented to our senses, to stirre vp our imagination and fantasie to wicked and dishonest things. For one onely wicked looke, or one dishonest speech, is sufficient to trouble our minds with diuers imaginations & fantasies. Which as it is well knowne to the diuell, so knoweth he also how to giue occasion, and to offer the meanes of stirring all the stuffe in our fantasies. But we keepe such bad watch in this respect that instead of eschewing occasions of euill, we seeke after them, and where we should shut the doore against euill, we set it wide open, that it may enter more easily into vs. Wherein we follow not the example of the Prophet, who prayed vnto the Lord, saying, Turne away mine eyes that they behold no vanitie: but we rather take a contrary course to whet our selues forward to all beastlinesse. Seeing therefore Imagination and Fantasie haue so little hold of themselves, we haue neede of an other facultie and vertue aboue that, to be able to iudge of things imagined and perceiued by sense (of which we haue hitherto spoken) and that is reason, the discourse whereof I referre to thee, AMANA, as also of memory, which is the fift and last internall sense of the soule.

Of Reason and Memory: and of their seate, nature and office, of the agreement which all the senses both externall and internall haue one with another, and of their vertue. Chap. 26.

Beasts search only after corporall things belonging to this life.

AMANA. They that haue curiously searched into the nature of beasts, haue found in them, especially in such as were most perfect, as many externall and internall senses as are in man: yea they perceiued, that their braine & all the parts thereof, did not differ much from that of men, whether we respect the substance or the fashion. But all these excellent gifts of nature reach no further in them, then to the vses of this present life, and the necessities thereof. For they haue no reason giuen them to enquire after that which is good, to the end their will might follow and embrace the same. Moreouer their Good, consisteth onely in corporall things belonging to the body, which they easily know and discerne as standing in neede of no other reason or vnderstanding to make enquiry after it, the of that bare knowledge & naturall inclination that is giuen them. But the Good that belongeth to man, is hidden in the soule and spirit. For this cause bee must of necessity enquire after it, that bee may come to the knowledge thereof, lest he chuse euill in stead of good, for want of knowledge of his proper and true Good, and so be deceived by the apperance of a false Good, which is not so in truth, but in opinion onely and by error: whereby the greatest part of men are commonly beguiled, preferring the supposed Goods of the body, before the true goods of the soule, and temporall things before eternall. Therefore as our eyes stand in neede of light to keepe vs, and to cause vs to see in darkenes, so our soule and spirite hath neede of reason to guide it in the midst of error and ignorance, that it may discerne trueth from lying, the true Good from the false, and that which is profitable from the contrary.

Of the seate of reason and of his office.

This facultie and vertue of the soule, so necessary in man, and which is able to iudge of things imagined and perceiued by the other senses, (of which we haue spoken before) to know whether they be good or bad, and what is to be embraced or eschewed, is called, the Iudging or discoursing facultie, namely, Reason, which is the principall part and vertue of the soule, and beareth rule among all the other senses. For this cause he hath his seate by good right assigned him in the midst of the braine, as in the highest & safest fortresse of the whole frame of man, to reigne amidst all the other senses, as Prince and Lord ouer them all. For it is hee that discourseth and iudgeth of truth from falshood, that knoweth the agreement and disagreement of things, that ioyneth together whatsoever is to bee ioyned, and separateth that which ought to bee separated, that distinguisheth things which follow, or are contrary each to other, by comparing one thing with another by considering all circumstances, circumstances, by referring every thing whither it ought to be referred. It is requisite therefore, that hee should keepe his owne place, and not be shuffled vp and confounded with Imagination and Fantasse, of which he is the iudge to approoue or condemne that which is good or euill, as also to correct, to stay, and to keepe them in awe. For if reason intermeddle and mingle it selfe with them, it will be so troubled, that it will not be able to iudge as it ought of those things, which they present and bring vnto it, but will be so carried away, as if it were deposed and thrust out of it owne place; and as if maids should rule their Mistresse, and take place before her. The like also hapneth vnto it, when it is carried away with the affections which it ought to rule, moderate, and gouerne. But if it be vp-right and sound, after it hath well considered and debated of the whole matter brought and laide before it by the former senses, it giueth sentence as iudge, and iudgeth finally without appeal. For there is no other iudgement after that. Hereof it is, that it hath a iudiciall seate in the middest, wherein being placed it beareth sutes and causes. Besides, it hath neere vnto it Memory, which is in place of a Notary and Secretary, and as it were a Register booke, in which is entred whatsoever is ordayned and decreed by reason. For as we haue neede of such a Iudge as reason is, to conclude and determine finally in the minde, whatsoever may be called into question and doubted of, so it is requisite, that the conclusion & definitiue sentence should be registred in Memory, as it were in a roll or booke of accompt, that it may alwayes be ready and found when neede requireth. For what good should we get by that, which imagination, fantasie, and reason conceiue and gather together, if it should all vanish away presently through forgetfulnesse, and no more memory thereof should remaine in man, then if nothing at all had bin done? The like would daily happen to vs, that befell Nebuchadnezzar, when God reuealed vnto him by dreame in the vision of an Image, what should become of his Monarchy and Empire and of those that followed him. For he remembered well, as himselfe testifieth, that he had dreamed a dream, whereupon his spirit was troubled, whilest he laboured to vnderstand it: but he was so far from knowing the signification of his dreame, that he remembered not what he had dreamed and seene therein. Where wee see that his imagination and fantasie were so moued by the image and vision represented vnto them in this dreame, that they imprinted in his memory how they had seen a vision, & that it was very strange and wonderfull. Yea reason it selfe iudged, that the vision and image was of another nature; then those that are commonly in the imagination or fantasie, or those which they coynethemselues in sleeping and dreaming, & that it had some diuine signification. And this did reason imprint in the Kings memory, who remembred al these things generally, but when he began to enquire of the matter more specially and particularly, he could not call to minde the kinde and manner of his dreame, but confessed that the thing was gone from him. Afterward, hauing heard and vnderstood Daniel, he knew that he spake a truth, & then remembered what he had dreamed and was gone from him, because it was not well imprinted in his memory, but had passed ouer lightly by it. Here then wee see how necessary this secretary and register, whom we call Memory, is for the vnderstanding and spirit, not onely to marke lightly such things as passe by it, but also to note and ingraue them, as it were in tables or pillars of stone or brasie. Therefore hath God assigned his seate and lodging in the hindermost part of the braine, to the end, that after such things as are to be committed vnto it, haue passed by all the other senses, they should be committed to it to keepe, as to their secretary. And for this cause that part of the braine is lesse moist, and most solide and firme, for two manifest and apparant reasons. First, because it is the fountaine of the marrow in the back bone, of which those sinewes are deriued that giue the strongest motions to all the members of the body. Therefore also it was requisite, that they should be of a more firme and solide matter then the rest that are taken from the substance of other parts of the braine: which are not to sustaine so great stresse. Secondly, forasmuch as the memory is as it were the Register & Chancery Court of all the other senses, the images of all things brought and committed vnto it by them, are to be imprinted therein, as the image and signe of a ring or seale is imprinted and set in the waxe that is sealed. Therefore it is needefull that the matter of the instrument of Memory should be so well tempered, that it be neither too soft nor too hard. For if it be too soft, the images will be soone ingrauen, but they will not stay there any long time, as they that will be quickly blotted out. Contrariwise, if it be ouer hard, it will be a harder matter to imprint them therein. But when it is well tempered, it receiueth the images easily, and keepeth them well. For the Memory hath two duties as well as the hand, namely, to receiue

& to hold fast. Therefore they that are of a moist brain receive more easily into their memories that which is offered vnto the, & they that have a dry brain, retain & keep better in memory.

But following that which we haue hitherto spoken of all the internall senses, wee are now to obserue and note this, that the knowledge of things which we haue by the outward senses, is as if wee beheld the shadowes of them: and that knowledge which we haue by the common sense, by Imagination and Fantasie, is as if we did looke vpon the images, which represent vnto vs those things whereof they are images more liuely and cleerely then their shadowes can doe. And the knowledge we haue by vnderstanding, of which facultie wee will intreate hereafter, is as if we viewed, not onely the shadowes or images of things, but also their very bodies, which is more. And that knowledge which we haue by reason is as if, besides all this, we saw their effects and vertues: Therefore there is as much difference betweene the knowledge that a man may haue by euery one of these faculties and powers, as there is betwixt the shadowe, and image, and body, and effects or vertues of one and the same thing, to the end that the nature thereof may be thoroughly knowne. For all these senses and vertues of mans mind agree so well together, that as the outward senses serue the common sense, so the common sense serueth Imagination, and imagination fantasie, and fantasie vnderstanding and consideration, and consideration recordation, & recordation conference, & conference reason, & lastly memory serueth them all, as they also serue memory.

Therefore it is not without great wisdom & prouidence of God, that the seate and shop thereof is in the hindermost part of the head, because it must looke to the things that are past. So that we haue in that part as it were a spirituall eye, which is much more excellent and profitable, then if we had bodily eyes there, as we haue before, or else a face before and another behind, as the Poets fained that Ianus had. Thus we may learne by our speech what reason is, and the discourse thereof, and how it causeth the nature of man to approach in some sort to that nature which is diuine and heavenly, making man far to excell all other natures in the world. For it goeth from things knowne, to them that are vnkowne, and descendeth from generals to specials, and from them to particulars, and mounteth aloft againe by the same steps from one to another, and compareth one with another. For after that imagination hath received the images and impressions of things offered vnto it by the outward senses, the consideration of Reason followeth, which enquireth of all that may be in the mind, of the plenty or want that is there, and causeth it to returne to it selfe: as if it did behold and consider it selfe, to take knowledge what it hath, or what it hath not, how much it hath, & of what qualitie and nature it is. After this, reason draweth out and concludeth invisible things of visible, of corporall things it concludeth things without bodies, and secret things of plaine and euident matters, and generals of particulars: then it referreth all this to the vnderstanding which is the chiefe vertue and power of the soule, and that which comprehendeth all the faculties thereof, as we will discourse in place conuenient, yea that which finally resteth in the contemplation of the spirit, which is the end of all enquiry of truth, and as it were a settled and assured view of all those things that haue bene culled out by reason, and received and approved by iudgement.

course of rea-
son in man.

Hereof it is that we say, there is a double discourse of Reason in man, whereof the one consisteth in speculation, hauing Truth for the scope and end thereof, and goeth no farther after it hath found the truth. The other consisteth in practise, and hath Good for his end, which after it hath found, it stayeth not there, but goeth on to Will, which is an other power of the soule of great vertue, as we will declare hereafter, and is given of God to man, that he should loue, desire, and follow that which is good, and hate, eschew, and turne from euill. But these things shall be handled more at large in the sequelle of our speeches.

Of vnderstanding and contemplation.
A double discourse of rea-
son in man.

Now to resume and finish this present matter, as we learne that man by the discourse of reason that is in him, lifreth vp himselfe aboue the outward senses, yea aboue Imagination and fantasie, and knoweth well that hee is inclosed within the body as in a prison, which neuerthelesse cannot altogether hinder him from vnderstanding and contéplating the things he seeth not: so also he useth the helpe of Memory to keepe and retaine in his mind whatsoever he hath knowne by any of the senses, either externall or internall. Therefore is the Memorie compared to a picture. For as a Picture by the sight of the eyes giueth the knowledge of that which is painted therein, so is it with Memory, by the sight of the mind endued with vnderstanding and knowledge: for it doth not onely looke vpon things simply as beastes doe, but considereth of them, and diligently enquireth into them, and hauing found them, it placeth them in the Memory, & there keepeth them. And the better to haue

have them in Memory, it often thinketh and meditateth of those things, it turneth and collecteth them to and fro, that they may be the better imprinted therein. For this cause some Philosophers attribute vnto man beside Memory, both recordation & remembrance, which is one recordation vpon another, wherby we call to mind that which was slipped out of it. For it cometh to passe oftentimes, that that which before we haue seen, heard, and known, and euen kept a while in our memory, is escaped vs and so forgotten, that we thinke of it no more then if we had neuer vnderstood or known it, neither should we euer remember it, vnlesse some body did put vs in mind of it, or some euident token made vs to think of it. Some things also there are, which albeit they are not cleane gone from vs, but are somewhat better registred in our memory, yet we cannot readily remember them and bring them forth, without great and long inquiry. Therefore must the minde turne over all the leaues of this Booke or Register of Memory, or at leastwise a great part thereof to finde them out, as if a Chancellour or Secretary should search all his Papers and Registers, and all his Rolles of Chancery, vntill hee had found that which he sought for. And we see among our selues, what notes and obseruations we vse, that they might be as it were a memoriall booke vnto our memories. You see then why some haue attributed to man both recordation & remembrance, thereby to put a difference betweene them and bare memory without any other consideration, which they say is in beastes, who forgetting presently what they perceived by their senses, when they see those things againe, that in some sort putteth them in minde thereof, then they call them to minde as if they had knowne them before. But now that we vnderstand the nature, office, order, and seates of the internall senses of the soule, that all may be more easily perceived, I thinke we ought to shew by some familiar examples, how a man may know, that these internall senses are so distinguished, disposed, and ordayned, and that they haue their seats and instruments in the braine in such sort as wee haue already spoken. Let vs then heare AR A M discourse to this purpose.

What remembrance is.

The minde compared to the keeper of Rolles.

That the internall senses are so distinguished, that some of them may be troubled and hindered, and the rest be safe and whole, according as their places and instruments assigned vnto them in the body are sound or perished: and of those that are possessed with Diuells. Chap. 27.

AR A M. Howsoever it pleased God to enrich man with heavenly gifts & graces aboue all visible creatures, yet foreseeing the future pride of mankind, he alwaies & in all things gaue him great matter of humilitie and modestie, to the end that they which know how to profit thereby, should neuer forget the graces received from the goodnes of their Creator, & so neuer become vngateful towards him. And truly we ought to be very careful to keep our selues from pride and vaine boasting of the senses of our minde and spirit, which God hath given vs, how ingenious, excellent, and diuine soeuer they bee: yea, rather humbling our selues before his Maiesty, we are to yeeld him continuall thankses, and pray that it would please him to keepe them alwaies sound and safe, and to augment his gifts and graces in our minds. For he sheweth vs by experience euery day, that hee can trouble our mindes with a small matter, yea the mindes of those that are most witty, prudent, wise, and skilfull, and the most diuine spirits that can be found amongst men. How many doe wee see daily, yea many times of those that are admired of all for their singular wit, great prudence, knowledge, wisdom, vertue, credite, and authority, that loose the vse of their senses and vnderstanding, insomuch that they doe not onely growe foolish, as if they were become little children againe, but also haue lesse direction and gouernement in them, then the poore beastes haue? And how many doe wee see, that become frensie and mad, behating themselves as it were brute and sauage beastes, and continue in that estate vnto the death? The consideration of these things will cause vs to vnderstand better that which we haue heard of the distinction, disposition, order, and seates of the internall senses of the soule, and of their vessels and instruments. We haue then daily great testimonies & very euident signes hereof in frantike and bedlem persons, in such as are oppressed with melancholy, in furious folkes, and in all those that are beside themselves. For there are sundry sorts of them, some being troubled but in one part of the minde onely, hauing the other parts sound: some more troubled then the former, and othersome that haue nothing sound and vntouched. Heereof it is that wee see some, whose imagination and fantasie onely are out of frame, insomuch that they iudge a thing to be that which it is not. Therefore they conceiue strange opinions, which they imprint so deepe in their braine, that they are not easily root-ted out againe. Some imagine and beleue that they haue hornes: others, that they haue a serpent, or some other beast in their bodies: others, that they are become water pottes or glasses, and thereupon are afraide lest some body should iustle against them, and breake them in peeces. There haue beene some that were so verily perswaded in their fancie, that they were dead, that they could neuer after be brought to eate or drinke any thing, but dyed in that opinion. And yet all these did vnderstand very well and conceiue what was said vnto them, and remembred it as well afterward. Whereby it appeareth, that they haue reason and memorie more sound then imagination and fancie, as Galen and other Phisicians mention many examples of such, and our selues doe often see some like to those of whome I speake now. There are others also, that haue their imagination, fancie, yea and their memorie also sound, but their reason is so troubled, that they cannot vnderstand nor conceiue that which is tolde them, nor make any discourse themselves, neither examine or conclude any thing by reason. Galen alleadgeth an example of one, who after hee had cast downe out of a window certaine glasses and violles, with other vessells of brittle matter, threw downe a little childe, which was slaine. This man knew well enough that he helde in his hand glasses and other vessells of such matter, and that the childe hee threw downe was a childe, and he remembred well what he had seene, heard, and done: but he had not his wittes so aduised nor his reason so stayed, as to discourse, consider, and iudge thus with himselfe, that he could not cast those vessells downe but he must breake them, considering the matter whereof they were made, nor the childe, but he must kill it. I omit many other examples I could alledge to this purpose, which many skilfull Phisicians speake of in their bookes, because I meane not to touch this matter but as it were by the way.

Concerning them that lose their memory, and yet keepe the other parts sound, we haue many examples of them. For there haue beene plagues sometimes, whereby many haue lost their memories in such sorte, that they cleane forgot whatsoever they knew before, yea their owne names, their parents and their friends. And the disease called the Letbargie bringeth with it forgetfulnesse and want of memorie, as the name it selfe giueth vs to vnderstand in the Greeke tongue, from whence it is taken. Therefore we see how the internall senses of the soule may be perished seuerally one without another: whereupon we may well conclude, that as they may be all sound together, so they may all be perished at one and the same time.
Example hereof is daily seene in many that are frensie and madde, hauing all their senses troubled, which sometimes they had sound and perfect. Yea there are some that behaue themselves like dogges and wolues as Phisicians report, because they thinke they are transformed into those kinde of beasts, by reason of the violence of Melancholy, and of that malady, which is thereupon named by the Gracians Cynanthropie and Lycanthropie. It pleased God to punish Nebuchadnezer with this kinde of chastisement, to beate downe his glory and pride, when his wittes were taken from him, in so much that hee did not thinke himselfe to be a man any more but a beast, & so indeede liued in the fields like to a wildbeast. Now therefore wee may know by the sequelle of our speach, and by the examples which wee haue alleadged, how the internall senses are distinguished one from another, in such sort that every one hath his office apart, as the members that are in mans body. And if any desire to know mote particularly in what part and place of the braine every particular sense hath his lodging and seate for to exercise his office in, we may iudge hereof somewhat by experience, which teacheth vs, that they who haue receiued some blow, or are vexed by sicknesse about the former ventricles of the braine, haue their common sense, their imagination and fantasie perished, when the instruments about those parts either suffer or haue suffered violence. If the same happen to the middle ventricle, the like is seene in the defect of reason: if to the hindermost ventricle, the memory faileth, as it hath befallen many vpon the receipt of a blow in that place: yea, which is more then that, experience doeth not only shew this when blowes and diseases light vpon the head and braine, but it appeareth also in the composition and making of all that part of the body. For according as the head shall be either well or ill framed and proportioned either before, in the midst, or in the hinder part thereof, or in all three together, so shall a man finde greater excellency, moderation, or defect, in the internall senses, which exercise their offices in the head, as well particularly as generally.
Therefore it is not without reason said in our common speech of him that hath a good spirit, sense, and iudgement, that his head is well made: and contrariwise, that his head is ill made that wanteth these things. For whatsoever the inhabitant or workeman is that laboureth

reth, the lodging in which he dwelleth, or the tooles and instruments which hee vseth, are of great moment to further or hinder him in his worke.

But now that we are in hand with frenetike persons, and haue saide before, that good and ill spirites haue great meanes, and such as wee cannot comprehend, whereby they mooue the imagination and fantasie of men; it shall not be altogether fruitlesse, if we speake somewhat of them that are possessed with spirites. For there are some who thinke not, that the Diuelles in their very substance enter into the bodies or soules, hearts or minds of men. I speake not heere of such as thinke there is neither God, nor Angelles, nor Diuelles, but even of them that beleue all these things: who neuerthelesse thinke, that euill spirits trouble the heartes and mindes of men only by prouocations, temptations, and illusions. Others there are, that referre all the madnesse of Lunatike folkes, to naturall causes, as if they proceeded either from melancholike or cholerike humours, or some such like causes, as frenesie, madnesse, and fury, or some such diseases whereby men are carried beside themselves. True it is, and cannot be denied, that many are thought to be possessed with Diuelles, when in deede they are nothing so. For there are some counterfeite cranks as many haue bene taken with the manner, who vpon some occasion haue by meere knauery fained themselves such. And some also there are that be but melancholy madde, and carried away by some disease of the braine: but because their melancholy and fury is very violent and strange, ignorant people suppose they are possessed with some spirit. Notwithstanding wee may not doubt, but that euill spirits, desirous to hurt men both in their goods, bodies, and soules, vse all the means and occasions they can possibly inuent and find out, to execute their malice, when it pleaseth God to giue them leaue. For they can drive forward and mooue the harts and minds of men, and set them in such a fury, that euen their reason and iudgement will be wholly confounded, and as it were cleane extinguished. Hereupon it cometh: that many being carried headlong with such madnesse, teare, and kill themselves, or their owne wiues, children, or others, whereof we may dayly see many examples. Neuerthelesse we say not, that the naturall light which God hath giuen them is wholly put out in them, much lesse in those that are not so farre gone: but the Diuell doth stirre them forward with such violence, that they are as it were taken perforce from themselves, when they are forsaken of God. Which examples ought to admonish vs to call vpon God incessantly, that hee would gouerne vs by his Sonne Iesus Christ, who is come to destroy the workes of the Diuell, that so the light of reason and of iudgement may not be darkened or put out in vs, and that our heartes bee not so possessed and pushed on by Sathan, that wee rush our selues through a diuellish fury against the will of God. And this did our Saviour teach vs to demaunde of him when he saide, Pray that yee enter not into temptation: and when hee taught vs to say, Leade vs not into temptation, but deliuer vs from euill. For if euill spirits durst set vpon those that were sound both in body and soule, after that manner which I haue spoken of, according to that power that was giuen them, we may not think that they spare such as are sicke: especially those that are already troubled in braine and beside themselves. For the Diuell, as our mortall enemy, continually watcheth for those occasions that are fittest, and most for his aduantage to hurt vs withall. Therefore hee intrudeth himselfe amidst our diseases and miseries, chiefly when there is weakenesse of braine ioyned therewith, vsing against vs those weapons, which he findeth in our owne nature, as also those which his owne malice and rage ministreth vnto him, whereof wee haue a very profitable example in the history of Iob. Hee declareth plainly by his speach, that if the feare of God had not kept him back, he had rather haue strangled himselfe, then liued in that miserable estate wherein he was. And no doubt, if God had not helde a strong hande ouer his seruant Iob, and bridled the rage and euill will of Sathan that persecuted him, the Diuell had had great power ouer this good man, to haue perswaded him to make away himselfe desperately, as Achitophel and Iudas did. Now if the Diuell preuailed so farre with Iob, by that leaue which God gaue him to afflict and trouble him, wee may well thinke what hee can doe with the wicked and reprobate, whome G O D wholly abandoneth and giueth ouer vnto him. Wee haue a very plaine example in Saul, of whome it is written, that the spirit of the Lord went from him, and that hee was giuen ouer of the Lord to an euill spirit, which troubled and vexed him, and that in the end he fell into such desperation, that he utterly forsooke God and slew himselfe. We may know also by that which the holy Euangelists haue written of such as were possessed, and were healed by Iesus Christ and by his Apostles, what power euill spirits haue ouer them, whilest God suffered them to execute their their rage and furie. A man may easily iudge, that such persons are not only out of their wits through sicknesse, but that euil spirits possesse them. For he so troubleth their mind and spirit, that they know no more what they doe, then the veriest bedlems that can be. And although he horribly vexeth their bodies, yet they feele not his torments, or if they do feele them, yet they cannot abstaine from vexing themselves. So that it is easily knowne, that the diuell is in them, and that it proceedeth not only of a simple frensie, or melancholy humor, seeing some of them haue done such things as could not possibly be performed by the power of man, whereof some of those are witnesses, whom the holy Scripture rehearseth vnto vs. Wherefore it is out of all question, that euill spirits haue wrought both in them and by them. Therefore we haue good occasion offered vnto vs by all that hath bene hitherto spoken, to humble our selues before God, and to pray vnto him continually, as we saide in the beginning of our speech. For being as we are, we ought still to praise God, who distributeth his graces as it pleaseth him, and that by a most exquisite kind of Iustice. And when we see those that are infirme and beside themselves, some for a certaine time, and by fits, other continually and after diuers manners, let vs not mocke or despise them, but rather haue pitty and compassion ouer them, pray to God in their behalfe, and succour them as much as we can, acknowledging the grace of God towards vs in keeping vs from such inconueniences, and beseeching him to preserue and keepe vs continually. For whatsoeuer befallerh others, should as it were hang before our eyes, as often as it pleaseth him to beat them with such scourges, which we our selues haue no lesse deserued then they that are beaten, yea oftentimes a great deale more. The Lord striketh whom it pleaseth him, that by them others might take instruction. Therefore if we cannot profit by such teaching, nor learne at other mens cost to feare & honor him, to call vpon him and to giue him thanks, it is to bee feared that he will send vs as much, that so we may learne at our owne charges. Yea and then also he is very gracious vnto vs, if he suffer vs to haue our vnderstandings, to knowe how to profite by his rods and chastisements, and giue vs not wholly ouer into the handes of Sathan our aduersary. But enough of this matter. And now that we haue seene the nature and office of the internall senses of the soule, with their seates and instruments, the sequele of our speech requireth (as I thinke) that we should intreate of vnderstanding and wil, which are two faculties and vertues in the highest and most principall part and power of the soule of man, and in regard of which it is properly called by the name of a reasonable soule & life: as we shall presently learne of ACHITO B.

*Of the reasonable soule and life, and of vertue: of the vnderstanding and Will,
that are in the soule, and of their dignitie and excellencie. Chap. 28.*

Psal. 148. 8.

A*CHITO B.* Although beasts without any iudgment & reason follow after that which they conceiue to be agreeable to their nature, and eschew the contrary, according as their naturall inclination driueth them thereunto: yet they passe not those bounds of nature which God hath set the, nor violateth the lawes thereof. Whereby we see, that through a secret sence of nature, they draw alwaies towards God their Creator, in that their nature bendeth still towards that which God hath appointed to be the chiefe Good, vnto which they can attaine. And no doubt but God hath given them such inclinations to be as it were rules to direct the to that which is their proper and natural Good, which consisteth onely in corporal things belonging to their bodies. Now if he be thus carefull for beasts, we may not thinke that hee hath depriued man of such a benefite, but that hee hath also given him his inclination to leade him to his proper Good, and to the truth which in respect thereof is necessary for him. For what likelihood is there, that such a workeman as God is, would create Man, the most excellent creature vnder heauen, in worse estate not onely then beasts, but also then all other bodily creatures, which are nothing in comparison of the excellency which is in him? who notwithstanding following their naturall disposition, Praise G O D, and fulfill his words, as the Psalmist sayeth.

As therefore God hath ordayned and prepared a far greater Good for men then for beasts, and hath laide vp the same in his soule and spirit, so hath he given them the meanes to enquire and finde it out. But the difficulty that is in finding it out, proceedeth through their owne owne fault. For the darkenesse of ignorance and error, which sinne hath brought into their mindes, is that which hindereth them, and which had not taken hold of them, if mankinde had continued in the perfection of his first nature. Neuertheles, what defect soeuer there be, yet we see, that in the mind of man there shineth alwaies this natural light that is given vnto him aboue that which beasts haue, I meane Reason, which serueth to guide the soule and spirit amidst the darknes of error & ignorance, to the end they may be able to discern truth fro falsehood, & the true Good from the false, as we see the light serueth the eyes to keepe vs, & to cause vs to see in darkenes. Therefore we said before, that there was a double discourse of reason in man; whereof the one is Theoricall and Speculatiue, which hath Truth for his end, and hauing found it goeth no farther. The other is Practicall, hauing Good for his ende, which being found it stayeth not there, but passeth forward to the Will, which God hath ioyned vnto it, to the end it should loue, desire and follow after the Good, and contrariwise hate eschew and turne away from euill. Therefore when the question ariseth of contemplation, reason hath truth for her vtmost bounds, and when she is come into action, she draweth towards Good, and hauing conferred together, that which is true and good, shee pronounceth iudgement. So that reason considereth of things with great deliberation, and being sometimes in doubt which way to take, shee stayeth and returneth as it were to her selfe, and maketh many discourses before shee iudge and conclude. But sinne hath so troubled our spirit, that these naturall rules, which should euermore cause vs to incline to that which is right and good, are greatly depraued and corrupted. Neuerthelesse there remaineth in vs a small remnant of that great Good, which testifieth sufficiently vnto vs what losse and damage wee receiued by our fall. Therefore both the internall and externall senses serue vs not onely for the good of the body, and for this life as they do to beasts: but also for the good of the soule, & helpe vs to lift vp the minde higher, to seeke for a better life, & for a greater Good, then can be found among all the creatures, and in which alone the mind findeth true felicity, agreeable to such a nature as it selfe is. Hereof it cometh, that it cannot content it selfe with that wherewith beasts are contented, nor stay there where they stay. For after the spirit is somewhat settled vpon that knowledge, which it hath by imagination and fantasie, he lifteth vp himselfe higher by the meanes of reason, namely to the vnderstanding of spirituall and diuine things. For hee knoweth well, that because he is as it were shut vp in an obscure prison, and compassed about with darkenesse, hee is hindered from attaining of the vnderstanding and knowledge of many things whereof he is ignorant, and can neither see nor know that which he would so neerely, cleerely, and perfectly as if he were at greater libertie, nor vse that naturall vigour that he hath, being in this prison of the body. In this sort doth man consider of himselfe and of his nature, and from that knowledge which he hath of the highest and most excellent things in nature, there springeth in him a loue towards them; insomuch that the spirit ascendeth vp and attaineth vnto God, who is the author and Creator of all. For this cause there ariseth contention betwixt reason and fantasie. For imagination and fantasie, being neerer to the corporall senses draw the soule to those things that are bodily: but reason and the spirit pricke it forward, and cause it to lift vp it selfe to more excellent things. For the spirit (which the Philosophers expresse by Vnderstanding) mounteth vp vnto those things that cannot be knowne nor comprehended of imagination and fantasie, nor of any other sense. Moreouer it keepeth fantasie bridleed and bringeth it into the right way, which otherwise wandreth farre wide, and entreth into many turnings and windings. Neither doth the spirit wholly yeeld vnto euery present profit, or decline the contrary, but calleth things past to remembrance, coniectureth and foreseeeth things to come, and searcheth out what is true and what false to give iudgement thereafter, and then to follow after or to eschew that which ought to bee followed or fled from. Thus you see what the reasonable soule bringeth to men, which is not in beastes, nor in their soule. Besides, from this vigour and nature of the spirit, speech proceedeth, which being his messenger, is wanting vnto beasts, because they are voide of reason and vnderstanding, in regard whereof speech is given, as we haue already heard. Therefore we vnderstand by the reasonable soule and life, such a soule and life as hath counsell, iudgement and reason, and which was created to this end, that knowing God her Creator, & louing him in respect thereof, she might honour & serue him, and finally by degrees attaine to immortal life and happinesse, which is appointed for her ende. For as nothing is more excellent then reason, wherof God hath made man partaker, so ther is nothing more becomming reaso thē to know loue & honor God, seeing there is nothing greater, more excellent, or that may be compared vnto him. Therefore as man differeth from brute beasts in respect of reason, wherewith God hath indued him, so he differeth from them in that he is capable of religion, created & born thereto, which consisteth in the things already touched. But beastes are not capable of any kind of religion, being altogether void thereof: as on the other side, there is no man but he hath some sence of it. Wherby we may gather a good argument, that beastes are not onely void of reason, but also that their soules are mortall, & the soules of men immortal. For the fountaine and fruit of the religion and seruice of God, consisteth not in this mortall life, and therefore it must needs be in some other that followeth. And for this cause reason, which is so great and excellent a gift of God in man, is not bestowed vpon vs for thinges of so small price & so transitory as these are which we vse and inioy in this life, and in which it is wholly busied: much lesse for those whereby the life of beastes is preserued, but in regard of these things the which I haue now declared. Therefore as God hath not giuen such a life to stones as he hath giuen to trees and plants, nor yet sence, imagination and fantasie to trees and plants, as he hath done to beastes: so he hath not graunted reason to beastes, as hee hath to men, and that not without iust cause. For as it is enough for stones in regard of the perfection of their nature, to be heauie and such as they are, & sufficient likewise for trees and plants to haue a Vegetatiue soule, seeing they want not that which beastes haue more then they: so beastes stand not in neede of that which men haue aboue them. For it sufficeth for the preseruatiue & defence of their life and being, that they haue some kind of cogitatio ioynd with imagination and fantasie, although they want reason, which is not necessary for them as it is for men, for the causes already specified: and chiefly because they were not created by means of the knowledge of God & of true religion to come to a better life, then their brutish life is. Therefore as man is created, to the end that the light of the knowledge of God might shine in him, and that God might communicate with him his wisdom and goodnes, so he would that the soule of man should be an euident testimony of himselfe. For this cause it was said in his creation, that God made man after his owne image and likenesse, as we haue already heard. Seeing then there are in the reasonable soule so cleere and excellent testimonies of God, and that by it especially the difference appeareth between man & beastes, as also in the diuers governments of their liues, it behoueth vs to consider thereof very diligently. And albeit this glasse of God can not be so euidently seen, as those that are made of Steele, or of glasse & lead by the hand of man, to represent the image of our bodies, neuertheles the actions & works of the soule do plainly shew, that there is such a power & vertue in vs, which God hath giuen vs more to vse for our benefit, then to know it, and that for the causes already touched by vs. For the true & perfect knowledge thereof belongeth to God onely, who being aboue it, hath created and giuen it, and will cause vs to know it better whē we shall be in that eternall light, in which we shall know those things that are now hidden from vs. In the meane time let vs in this life consider of and distinguish the actions & works of the soule, whereby we are seuered from beastes, and which being very euident testimonies of God in vs, gouerne the life of man, and bring forth all honest sciences and artes. We haue spoken already of the powers and vertues of the soule which by the vse of corporall instruments labour and manifest themselues: but it appeareth euidently, that there is in man another higher power, because we haue many actions and doe many workes, which beastes cannot performe nor imitate. For man hath the knowledge of numbers and can reckon, hee vnderstandeth not onely particular things, but also generall and vniuersall things, hee discourseth, that is, gathereth and concludeth one thing of another, and that very farre, hee inuenteth artes and disposeth them, he iudgeth of his owne reasons and discourses, and marking his owne faults, he correcteth them, he changeth his intents & purposes, he discerneth vertues from vices, & honest things from those that are dishonest: finally he deliberateth by a long discourse of reason. As for beastes they haue not these things common with vs, as they haue the vse of the senses, as of seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, and other such like things, wherein they oftentimes excell vs in many respects. For many of them haue these senses more sharpe then we haue. And although they haue some imagination, fantasie and apprehension of things offered to their bodily senses, yet that holdeth but for the present, and in the place or field where the things are offered vnto them. The like may be sayd of those discourses of reason, which many think are in the perfectest of them. For they haue some kind of discourse in that they can passe from one thing to another. But all their iudgements are but of particular things, neither do they ascend higher. In like maner, they know not things absent, nor passe from thē to others, whether it be from things absent to thē that are present, or from present things to those that are absent. For they take or leaue incontinently those present and particular things which they know, & make a stop there without any further discourse. So that this intellectuall and reasonable power is proper to man onely, and is the highest and most soueraigne vertue of the soule of man. And although the internal senses are seruiceable vnto it, as they are serued of the externall senses, neuertheless it hath proper actions, vertues and motions, which it can and doeth exercise without the helpe of bodily instruments, when it is separated from the body. And euen while it is in the body, it is sometime rauished, as if it were altogether out of it, as it hath often fallen out to holy men, who haue beene rauished in spirit in the contemplation of celestially and diuine things, and that by the reuelation of the spirit of God: insomuch that Saint Paul testifieth of himselfe, that He was taken vp into the third heauen and into Paradise, not knowing whether hee were in the bodie or out of the bodie, but God he knew. We will consider therefore in this chiefe and most soueraigne part of the soule, two faculties and vertues, namely the Vnderstanding and the Will. For it being so that man is created to attaine to that soueraigne and eternall Good, which GOD hath propounded vnto him, therefore GOD hath giuen him the power and vertue to wish for that Good, to the ende hee might desire to apply and ioyn him selfe vnto it.

This power and vertue is called Will. But the soule cannot haue this appetite and desire, if first it vnderstand or know not that Good which it ought to desire and follow after. For this cause hath God giuen vnto it another power and vertue, which wee call Vnderstanding. And forasmuch as our spirit stayeth not alwaies in one thought, but discourseth and goeth from one matter to another, it had neede of a receptacle and storehouse, wherein it may lay vp the first thoughts when others come, as if it placed them in a treasure, that they should not be lost, but might be founde out, and called forth when neede should require. But we learned by our former speech, that this office appertaineth to memory, which is as it were the Rolles of a Chancery Court, in which the seales of images framed by the thought, are imprinted; and vpon which the vnderstanding doeth looke as often as it pleaseth. And euen as it serueth to the other internall senses, vnto which it succeedeth in order, so also it serueth the Vnderstanding and Will.

Concerning the Vnderstanding, if we consider it generally, it comprehendeth the whole minde: but beeing taken more specially, we meane a certaine particular office thereof. For it vnderstandeth the things that come from without, as we conceiue them: then it layeth vp that which it hath vnderstood in some little cofer by it selfe for a time, out of which it may take them againe when neede requireth. This repetition and taking againe, which is as it were an inquirie and searching out, is called Consideration: and from thence it commeth to recordation and remembrance, and so conferreth together the things it hath vnderstood, and compareth them one with another: which beeing done, a discourse thereof is had with others, after which discourse it determineth and iudgeth what is true and what false, what good and what euill. Then doth the Will choose that which is good, and refuseth the euill. And as we come from the vnderstanding to the will by these degrees, so wee must ascend vp by the same steps, euen from the last to the first, namely from Will to Vnderstanding. For Will doth not follow after or refuse any thing, which the iudgement hath not first determined to be good or euill: and the iudgement decreeth nothing before it hath taken aduice of reason, and reason aduiseeth not before she haue conferred the things one with another, & thoroughly examined them. Neither can this conferring be without consideration; nor consideration without requiring that of Memory which was committed vnto it to keepe, and the memory will keepe nothing safe, but that which it hath first knowne and vnderstood. So that the reasonable soule hath all these things, namely Vnderstanding, Will, and Memorie. And vnder this facultie of vnderstanding, there is simple and particular intelligence, after which Consideration followeth, next Recordation, then Conferring, and discoursing after that, next Iudgement, and last of al Contemplation, which is as it were the rest of the soule and spirit. Now these things being so excellent and wonderfull, and somewhat obscure withall, deserue to be discoursed of more at large, and to be vttered more clearly. And therefore before we goe to any other matter, we shall doe well to consider of the diuersitie that is found in the operations and discourses of the Vnderstanding, according to that gift of light, which is in it and what is the end of all discourses. Prepare therefore thy selfe ASER to intreate of this matter.

Of the varietie and contrarietie that is found in the opinions, deliberations, counsailes, discourses and iudgements of men, with the cause thereof: and of the good order and end of all discourses. Chap. 29.

ASER. All things whatsoeuer can be rehearsed, are either of this mutable and temporary nature, or of the other, which is immutable, perpetuall, and aboue that nature. If the question be of the first, either the variety and change is such, that no certaine rule or determination can be given, or else there is a perpetuall tenor and constancy in them according to their inbred inclination, through a stedfast and continuall order of nature, which is alike in all, according to their nature and kindes. If the variety and change bee very vncertain, there can no certain science & knowledge be had of them, nor any determination set down so general, but that there will be alwayes some exception. For touching the first sort, we can haue no sure knowledge of things that are infinit, and that haue infinit alterations. And because particularities, and particular things are infinit in regard of our capacity, there can no entire & certaine knowledge be had of them all in speciall. As for generals, howbeit they also are variable, yet some rules may wel be giuen of them, of which the art followeth afterward: and yet no such certaine rules, but often it falleth out otherwise, as we may see in many artes, & in sundry experiences. For although it be ordinary for women to loue their children, yet there are some that murder them cruelly. So that howsoeuer it be very common to loue them, yet it falleth not out so alwayes. Therefore we may wel say of a woman, if she be a Mother, it is very like that shee loueth her childe, because it is naturall. But wee cannot conclude certainly, that it was alwayes so, seeing we often see the contrarie. There are also oftentimes many signes, which haue such apparant significations, that they seeme to signifie thinges vnto vs certainly enough, wherein neuerthelesse wee are deceiued, as it falleth out often in our suspicions and opinions, which are not grounded vpon certaine and firme arguments, and most euident reasons. Wherefore the knowledge that we may haue of such things cannot properly be called Science, but onely coniecture, opinion, probabilitie or likelihood, because there is great shew of truth, but yet not very certaine.

The author of Wisdom

Now albeit the nature of things bee mutable, yet if they alwayes keepe one and the same tenour and constancy, which continueth alike alwayes to it selfe, a man may haue a certaine knowledge of them, and that is called science: example whereof wee haue in celestiall bodies and in naturall things, which alwayes keepe one and the selfe same order and nature, both in the elements, and in liuing creatures, in plants also and such like things. For as for the heauens, although they bee mutable creatures, yet they haue also certaine courses and motions, which follow their accustomed order without ceasing. In like manner we see that all these things mentioned euen now, are distinguished in their kindes, and haue their naturall meanes whereby they are maintained and preserued. For it is naturall in man to begette man, and by this meanes mankinde is preserued. The same may bee sayde of other liuing creatures, of plants also and of such other things which neuer faile in keeping their order. Wee haue this light in vs by nature. Wherefore when I see a child or a man I may alwayes say certainly, that no painter hath painted and fashioned him in that sort, and that it is none of his worke: but that hee was begotten and bred of man and a woman that were his parents. For God doth not create men and women, as hee created Adam and Eve in the beginning, and as wee shewed in our first discourse; but by the common order which hee established at that time, and in regard of which hee instituted the holy estate of Marriage, as we will intreate hereafter. But if the question be concerning immutable, perpetuall and supernaturall things, we haue neede of another light, that is greater and more agreeable to their nature, which is giuen to men by diuine inspiration. This light or knowledge is called Sapience or Wisdom. For this cause Saint Paul writing to the Ephesians saith, I cease not to giue thanks for you, making mention of you in my prayers, that the God of our Lord Iesus Christ the Father of glory, might giue vnto you the spirit of wisdom and reuelation through the knowledge of him: that the eyes of your vnderstanding may be lightened, that ye may know what the hope is of his calling, and what the riches of his glorious inheritance is in the Saints. We see here how the Apostle ioyneth together wisdom, reuelation, and illumination of the vnderstanding, the the author of which he maketh the spirit of God, by whose reuelation and lightening wee obtaine true wisedome, of which the wisedome of the world is not capable. And therefore afterward he calleth this wisedome, the knowledge that passeth all knowledge. For although by our natural light we haue some obscure knowledge of God, as we haue already touched it, yet it cannot so farre lighten vs, nor cause vs to ascend so high, except God giue vs this also, of which I speake euen now. Therefore how great soeuer the natural light be which we haue, yet if we follow it any thing far, we are presently compassed with darkenesse, which proceedeth not of the things we are to know, but from our owne mindes, which being pressed with the heauy burden of our body, are hindred and made more slow: or else it is because our mindes are troubled, as if some cloud troubled the sight of our eyes. So that the more light is in our minde, the greater knowledge we haue there, and the lesse doubting. If there be no light at all, or so little that it be no better then none at all, then ignorance spreadeth it selfe as it were darknes in an obscure and troubled night, inso much that there is neither science, nor opinion, nor likelihood, nor doubting. Hereof it is that we commonly say, ignorant persons cast no perils. Thus then as euery one hath more light in the minde, hee beholdeth obscure things more clearely, because his vnderstanding is better, either by the benefit of nature, or by study & exercise, or by a speciall gift of God. Others see nothing at all or very little, no not into those things that are very cleere and manifest, so that they are like to men compassed and couered with darknes at Midday. This befalleth them either through the ignorance that is in their vnderstanding, or by reason of their blockish slouthfulness that neglecteth exercise, or by the iust iudgement of God, who because of their sins hath blinded their mindes, giuen them ouer to Satan, to blind the, who vseth to shut vp the eyes of worldly, carnal & vnfaihtful men, whom he hath in his power. So that if there be any error in the mindes of men, if they approoue and follow after lying in stead of truth, & euil in place of goodnes, this cometh not from the naturall or supernaturall light that God hath giuen them, nor of the knowledge they haue thereby, how great or smal soeuer it be, but of the darknes that is mingled amidst this light, which sin hath made more darke & wholly ouerwhelmed, & the Diuell daily increaseth to the vttermost of his power, because he would gladly haue all light in vs, as well natural as supernatural, cleane extinguished & put out. For as brightnes breedeth not clouds & obscurity, so science & knowledge doth not bring forth ignorance & error. For contraries are not made one of another. Wherefore that cometh to passe in the lightning of our vnderstandings, which we see to happen in the change of light in regard of our eyes. For according to that which is put betwixt, so doth the quality & vertue of the light change in respect of our sight. If it be a very thicke body, which the light can not pearce through, then is it wholly taken from vs, & as it is more or lesse thicke, or thinne and transparent, so doe our eyes receiue more or lesse light. In like manner the lightning of our vnderstanding is wonderfull variable, because of the great diuersitie of things that are set before it in this life, to hinder it sundry wayes, in some more, in some lesse, according to those objects that are offered to euery one, or as men procure to themselves. From hence it is that there are so many diuers opinions, sentences and iudgements amongst men, in all deliberations and in all matters, especially in the controuersie of discerning truth from falsehood, good from bad, & what is to be followed, what is to be fled. Now concerning those things, which chiefly cause this great diuersity, we haue first to consider of the composition, complexion and disposition of mans body, whether it be sound, or whether it be sicke. Also the Age, strength, or weaknesse, the perfection or imperfection thereof, common custome, the present disposition of vading qualities engendred by nourishment, time and place, with those actions and things that may outwardly happen to the bodie. For wee see by experience, that the vnderstanding and spirite with all the parts and offices of the soule receiue great helpe or hinderance, according as the bodie, and all the members thereof are well or ill disposed, and that the manners followe the complexion and disposition of the bodie. For God hath so tempered the nature thereof with that of the soule to make them agree well together, that the one taketh much of the other, either to good or badde purpose, according as they are either well or ill affected. Concerning the soule, wee haue to consider therein all the affections, besides, the nature of the vnderstanding, whether it be slowe and heauie, or quicke and light, and of a readie conceipt and discourse, and whether it be sharpe or dull. Againe, consideration must be had of the teaching and instruction which it hath had, what opinions are already rooted in it, and what perswasions haue forestalled it, as also howe farre the be-behaviour, custome & authority of others can prevail with it. For all these things greatly trouble the minds of men, and procure not only diuersitie, but also contrariety of opinions, sentences and willes of men, which causeth them to change and rechange so often, insomuch that they doe not only differ & are contrary one to another, but euery one also to himselfe. For we haue daily tryall in our selues, that we change our opinions from houre to houre, & minute to minute, insomuch that whatsoeuer we haue now approued, determined and set downe for a certaine decree, we condemne and reiect it by and by after, and vtterly overthrow it: & contrariwise we approue & ratifie that which we had a little before condemned and refused. Whereupon we haue to note, according to that we heard before in the discourse of reason, which is the proper effect of the vnderstanding, that there are two kinde of it. For there are discourses, wherein reason goeth on by degrees in continual order, one discourse alwaies following another, by considering and examining whatsoeuer appertaineth to the matter in hand, that so a certaine and sound iudgement therof may be rendred afterward. Againe, there is another kinde of discoursing, wherein reason doth not onely run amaine, but withall skippeth hither and thither, as though it tooke here a little & there a little, tasting onely of things very slightly & by the way, as Bees that flie from one floure to another, and leaue others betweene vntouched. Which course whilest reason taketh, it omitteth some step or other which it ought to trace: and that either through ignorance of the right path it ought to follow, or because it thinketh it needlesse to stay about that which it passeth by, or because it delighteth not, or is not disposed so to doe.

of all discourses.

Moreover, we must know, that there is great diuersitie of discourses, according to the varietie of mens vnderstandings. For sharp wits sound to the bottome, that matter which is propounded vnto them: wise and subtil heads, euery by small coniectures farre fetched, conceiue that which they seeke after & attaine thereunto. There are some also of such great spirits, that conceiue many things at once, and as it were in the twinckling of an eye, & at one looke behold all that is pertinent to the matter. Whereby it appeareth, that they haue ready imagination and fantasie, their memory like to an open treasure, a quicke consideration, and a perfect and sound remembrance. For if the imagination and fantasie be slow, or the memorie shut vp, or if consideration cease, or recordation be weake, the discourse wil be backward, and fall out but badly, as it is with children, and those that are very aged, with sicke folkes, and those that haue their mindes troubled. Now the ende of all discoursing in the minde, tendeth either to the inuention or conclusion of the thing that a man seeketh for. And if he attaine not to his ende, it is either because he taketh not the way which he ought to take, as they that know not what way to follow, which cometh to passe by diuerse means: or because his vnderstanding is not good, but full of darkenisse: through some perturbation that troubleth it for a time, as when the affections are much mooued: or by reason of the varietie of cogitations, which trouble and hinder one another.

There are some also which go on without any regard had to that thing they seeke after, as it falleth out with thē that are too much moued, & that haue a very hasty imagination & fantasie. For these men goe beyonde the place, where they might finde the thing which they seeke for: and so leauing the chiefe matter behinde, they fall into vnneccessarie & bye matter, into foolish trifling and strange thinges, without all compasse of reason, and such as belong nothing to the purpose. VVherefore, so soone as the discourse is begunne, fantasie is presently to be bridled and kept in, and the inquisition also of memory, to the end the vnderstanding may commodiously take holde of that which it is to follow, & that no such hasty & light commotion carry it awy, and so cause it to lose all. VVherein we may say, that it falleth out with the vnderstanding, as it doeth with a hound that is in chafe. For if he cannot by sent finde out the game he seeketh, or if after hee hath found it and is in chafe hee fall to hunt riot, or if hee giue in, either for want of courage, or because hee is spent, or because the course is too long, hee shall neuer take the pray for which hee was brought to field, but lose it without recovery: So in these discourses of the mind, whereof we speake, there are others also beside them that are already mentioned, who because they are of a slow spirit, and the matters they search for are farre off and hard to finde, haue not vigour nor force sufficient to attaine vnto them. The selfe same thing also happeneth to some, not so much for want of strength & quicknesse of spirit, as because they are commonly idle and slouthfull, as it is with thē that wil not be attentiuē, & cannot away to occupy their minds whē they should take some paines to learn. There are many of these, whose being more careful for their bodies thē for their soules, & that they may more freely attend to the body and the desires thereof, are soone perswaded to giue over all care to seeke for, and to provide things necessary for the soule. And if the body be neuer so little out of square, yea the very feare lest they should procure it any griefe, causeth them wholly to abtaine from labouring the minde in the searching out of wisdom and truth, so that they voluntary become ignorant. There are others that haue running heads, who will neuer continue and stay in one thing: and some also that when they should hearken to that which they are about, haue their wits a wool gathering, and as we vse commonly to say, are building of castles in Spaine. But about all wee must herein acknowledge that God distributeth his giftes and graces to men, and bestoweth wit and vnderstanding as it pleaseth him. Now that we haue intreated sufficiently of the vnderstanding, and of the discourses of reason therein, let vs speake of Iudgement which followeth it, and of his office. This then shal be the matter subiect of thy speech, AMANA.

Of Iudgement, and of his office, after the discourse of reason: and how Beleefe, Opinion, or doubting follow it: of the difference that is betwene them. Chap. 30.

AMANA. If I iudge aright of the doctrine contained in our former discourses, which handled the nature, powers, faculties and vertues of the soule, I finde that the spirit is as it were the chiefe part therein, in which is the Minde, the Vnderstanding, and Memory. The Minde is as it were a white paper, wherein as a man groweth in yeeres & iudgement, so he writeth his cogitations & thoughts, which he hath by learning & by the instruction of wisdom. Vnderstanding, is framed by the knowledge of reason, and last of all Memory followeth. For there is great difference betwene that which the senses and the vnderstanding are able to do in the time of infancy, and that which is done by them in other ages, wherein there is greater vse of the. And although the seeds of al the operations of the soule, are included within it even from the beginning of the creation thereof, neuerthelesse God hath created it of that nature, that as he hath ioyned it to the body, which hath his degrees of growth in euery part thereof, so the soule hath some agreement therewith in this respect, touching the manifestation of her powers and vertues. If then any man be endued with an excellent spirit, that is quicke and ready to conceiue, and with a memory apt to retaine and hold fast, it is a great meane for him whereby to attaine to the knowledge of the truth. But for the perfection of these two great gifts of nature, it is necessary he should haue a good and sound iudgement proceeding from a sound disputing and discoursing of reason lightened by the spirit of God, and by it purged of error, illusion, and of all vaine opinions, which the nature of man hath of his owne inheritance, and which hindereth him from iudging aright of the truth.

Now the office of Iudgement is to like or dislike the discourses of reason, and the conclusions which are made thereby. For it belongeth to iudgement, to iudge whether reason discourse and conclude well as it ought to doe. And therefore it is in the spirit and in the minde, as a rule, or as the skoles in a paire of balance: and whilest reason is a working, it is quiet. But when shee hath concluded and done, iudgement afterwarde examineth and considereth whether there bee any fault in the discoursing, or in the conclusion, or in both, or whether all bee well referred, before it either approoue or mislike any thing. And if it finde any thing that breedeth feare lest it bee deceived, then it beginneth againe to aduise of the matter. Now the greatest cause it hath to feare lest it bee deceived, ariseth of probable reasons, which albeit they bee like to bee true, yet indeede are not true. And because there are some, which haue such great shew of truth, that it is a very hard matter to bee able to discern them from true reasons, and not take them to bee such indeede, therefore the Iudgement may bee often deceived by this meane. For it will not easily slippe aside, but abide constant in that wherein it is once settled, if it bee not ledde and induced to allowe and disallowe of a thing, either by vertue of true and certaine reasons that may moue it, or of such reasons as are so very likely, and carry so greates a shewe of truth, that they cannot bee knowne and discerned for others. Therefore wee may well say, that a good, vpriight and sound iudgement is an excellent gifte of God: neither is there any thinge more necessary to all arts and disciplines, yea in the whole course of mans life, and chiefly for the principall end of our being, which is to know and to serue God. For as Good is a thing agreeable to the

A sound iudgement is an excellent gift of God.

Will,

Will, so is Trueth agreeable to the Minde: whereupon it followeth likewise, that as Enill is contrary and an enemy to the will, so is lying in this respect of the minde. Wherefore if iudgement iudgeth that the conclusion made by reason is true and followeth well, it ioyneth it selfe thereunto, receiuing and imbracing it as agreeable to it selfe. This approbation is called Consent. But if it iudge the conclusion to be false, it turneth it aside & reiecteth it, and this refusal may be called dissent, because it is contrary to consent, when there is no agreement of sentences, but disagreement and contrariety. As touching consent, we may diuide it into two kindes. For one kind therof is firme and stedfast, and another weake and vnstayed. If the consent be firme, certaine, and thoroughly resolued, it is called Beleefe. But there is difference betwixt that beleef or faith, which concerneth humane matters, and that which is of diuine things. For then doe we giue credite to humane things, when we take them to be so certain, that wee doubt nothing thereof, as namely when wee are so perswaded either by very euident reasons which remooue all doubting from vs, or els, by testimonies which wee take to be most certaine. Wherefore we may say, that there is great agreement betwixt this kinde of beleefe and betweene Science, because there is a certaine resolution both in the one and in the other. For Science is a kind of knowledge in which the demonstration made vnto vs, compelleth vs to approoue that which is spoken, because we see the reasons so certaine, that wee cannot gainsay them nor thinke otherwise. The like is done in beleefe, which is a kinde of knowledge, that causeth vs without doubting to giue credite vnto that which is tolde vs, because we are overcome by witnesses and authoritie which we approue. For if we doubted any thing, our consent would be yet weak, & so it could not properly be called beleef, but rather Coniecture or Opinion. For considering that in this there is some kinde of consent, which inclineth to one part rather then to another, therefore it tendeth to disliking, which is wholly against consent. For this cause we call Opinion, a knowledge that moueth vs to incline rather on the one side, then on the other, in regard of the appearance and shew of reason that it hath: so that wee are not fully resolued therein. Now albeit this consent, which is called opinion or coniecture, bee not altogether so firme, as that which we call beleefe: neuerthelesse it diffreth from Doubting, which is as it were a neuter iudgement, hanging between consent & his contrary, & inclinining neither to the one side nor to the other. As for that beleefe which is of diuine things, there is such a firme consent required therein, as that all doubting must be vtterly excluded. For faith is not perfect, if it does not allow for certaine, whatsoeuer God hath reuealed vnto men by his word, which is a certaine testimony of his will. And although he hath giuen vnto vs the same meanes to instruct vs by in these things, that he hath done in humane things, yet he goeth further. For he doth not onely teach vs by experience, by reasons and demonstrations, which appeare manifestly to our senses both externall and internall, and of which our minde can iudge as well as of humane things, but he requireth chiefly of vs, that we should beleefe his testimony, and those witnesses which he sendeth vnto vs, and that we should content our selues with his authoritie. And because heavenly things surpasse the capacity of our vnderstanding, God maketh them capable by the light of faith, which is a supernaturall and diuine light, whereby we see that in God, which we cannot behold in all the creatures, and which our humane reason cannot naturally comprehend.

Now as much as this light is more certaine then all other naturall light, either externall of the eyes of the body, or internall in respect of the eyes of the soule and minde, so much more certain is our sight and knowledge of that, which we see and know by meanes of that light. For this cause when our vnderstandings are lightened with this light, we beleefe more firmly that which it manifesteth vnto vs, I say not onely then that whereunto we may be perswaded by all the humane reasons which can be alleaged: but also then that which we see with our owne eyes, and heare with our eares, and touch with our hands. For these externall senses, and those internall senses also whose messengers the other are, are not so certaine witnesses to our spirit, as the senses of faith, which are more then humane. For they are beauenly. Wherefore she hath eyes whereby she seeth diuinely and not humanely, which can neuer be deceived as the eyes of the body may. The like we may say of her eares and of her hands. For there is no sense so certaine as all hers are, because she receiueth them diuinely by the spirit. Therefore as she hath not in her any imagination or fantasie that can deceiue her, so she can neuer faile, either in her discourses or in her iudgements whereupon she resolueth: because she is alwaies guided in them by the holy spirit, whom she followeth for her rule in all things, and who assureth her by his testimony, as if she bare the markes and seales imprinted in in her selfe, and in their mindes and hearts in whome shee dwelleth. Hereof it is that Saint Paul so often saith, that God hath sealed vs by his holy Spirit, speaking as it were of a seale imprinted in our hearts and mindes, and as of an earnest and gage which God hath giuen vs, for the best and most certaine assurance that can be. No maruell therefore if the children of God endued with the true faith become so resolute, so firme and constant, that no authoritie, power, wisdom, force, eloquence, no humane reasons, nor any thing that men or diuels can imagine, thinke, say, or doe, is able to make them to change their mindes; whereof we haue most euident examples, especially in the person of all the Martyres, who could neuer by any violence in the world be overcome, but their faith hath euermore gotten the victory and triumphed over all their enemies. And by this we may assuredly know, that it is better grounded then vpon all the reasons and perswasions of men that may be. Therefore it is not without cause that Saint Paul calleth it the gift of God, neither is it without great reason commended so much in the Epistle to the Hebrewes. For being come to that point, that it hath such an illumination, as to accompt all that God reuealeth in his word to bee more certain then any thing that we see with our eyes, or touch with our hands, & hereof to haue a true sence and feeling of the testimony of the holy spirit, then doth it exclude all doubting, which is contrary therunto, and differeth much from that which wee holde onely in opinion, wherein there is as yet no great assurance. So that we may conclude hereupon, that according as faith is more or lesse in vs, we shall neuer conclude ill, nor at any time giue ouer our conclusions. For faith neuer concludeth any thing which God hath not before spoken, whose word and authoritie is vnto it, as indeede it ought to be, in steade of all reason. For seeing it is that wisdom and truth which can neuer faile or lie, it needeth not to doubt in any respect to conclude alwaies therewith, neither hath it cause at anytime afterward to forsake or change the conclusion it hath set downe. Wherefore when our faith is shaken and beginneth to alter, it is a signe and testimony, that it holdeth more of the nature of opinion then of beleefe, and that it hath not yet a iudgement throughly resolved in the conclusion which it hath taken. So that heere we may learne what difference there is betwixt beleefe, opinion, doubting, and infidelitie or incredulitie. For seeing incredulitie is contrary to beleefe, it goeth farther then doubting, which concludeth nothing on either side, as both beleefe and opinion doe, but incredulitie concludeth contrary to them both. For it giueth no consent, as beleefe and opinion doe, but taketh the cleane contrary: and therefore it may well be called different or disagreement, as being opposite to that consent that is in beleefe.

Now to end this speech, and to take away all doubting that may arise of this word Beleefe or Faith, I will only adde this, that we are to know that it is diuersly taken in the holy scriptures. For the name which it hath in the Hebrew tongue, is taken from the word, whereby they expresse veritie or truth, which they also take for constancie and assurance. The word which the Euangelists and Apostles vse according to the Græcians in whose language they wrote, signifieth properly Perswasion. And the name vsed by the Latines, from whom we haue taken our Faith, signifieth that constancie and trueth, which men keepe in their words and promises: whereupon they call it the Fountaine of Iustice. Therefore faithfull signifieth as much as true, constant, and firme in that which a man hath spoken and promised, namely, when one hath kept his faith. Hereof it is also that God is so often in the holy Scriptures called Faithfull, in respect of vs, because he neuer falsifieth his faith, but is alwaies firme and constant in all his words and workes. But when the Scripture speaketh of Faith in regard of men towards God, it doth not onely comprehend a beleefe, whereby wee beleue that to be true which wee heare, and which is spoken vnto vs, as when one telleth vs some historie, but it is also a trust, which assureth vs, that God will performe that vnto vs which he hath promised vs. Therefore true faith includeth in it a certaine and vndoubted confidence of heavenly things, and an assured perswasion of the accomplishment of Gods promises towards vs. Now to prosecute our purpose, seeing we haue learned, that the knowledge of the truth, which is the principall object of reason and vnderstanding, is very hard for men to attaine vnto, let vs consider of the meanes whereby we may be certaine and sure of those things which we are to beleue. This discourse ARAM, belongeth vnto thee.

It is good for a mā to know his owne ig-
nerance.

ARAM. For a man to know himselfe to be ignorant, is a goodly science and so necessary for men, that without it they cannot bee truly skilfull. For the ignorant person that knoweth not himselfe to be such a one, but supposeth he knoweth that which he doth not in deede, is as vnteachable a beast as can be: because he wil neuer seeke for a master to be instructed by, but if any offer themselves he wil reiect them, and rather himselfe take vpo him to teach them.

Therefore Socrates was greatly commended by the ancients, because he said, that he knew but one onely thing, namely, that he was ignorant and knew nothing. True is, that if wee speake of things which may be knowne by the corporall and spirituall senses of men, euen as nature hath giuen them vnto vs, and of things belonging to naturall and morall Philosophy, there are many men to be found whole knowledge therein is so great, that other men in respect of them may seeme to be but poore beasts. But when wee must ascend vp to the knowledge of things revealed vnto vs in Iesus Christ, and in the Gospell, no sense or vnderstanding of man is able to comprehend any thing therein, if the Spirit of God doe not teach him, and dwell in him, to seale and to confirme in his soule the doctrine of those heavenly mysteries, wherein the skilfullest men are no better taught of themselves, then those that are most ignorant. For that abideth alwaies true which S. Paul wrote to the Corinthians, that the naturall man perceiueth not the things of the spirit of God: for they are foolishnes vnto him, neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned.

Four means to know certainly those things that are to be be-lieued.
Of general experience.

Now I finde foure meanes, whereby men may be made certaine of those things vnto which they ought to giue credite, whereof three of them are naturall and according to naturall Philosophy, the fourth goeth further, and is proper to diuinitie. The first is generall experience: the second, the knowledge of principles: the third, naturall iudgement: of these three we will first speake, and then come to the fourth. Generall experience is that iudgement which all men of sound mindes do giue all after one sort, of those things whereof they haue certaine experience by their corporall senses: as to bee seene in naturall things. For who knoweth not that the fire is hotte? And who would not take him for a senselesse man that should affirme the contrary? Yea, who could affirme it, beeing conuincd of the truth thereof by his owne senses? Likewise who seeth not the difference that is betweene death and life, and what are the effects both of the one and the other? For euery one knoweth these things by a generall experience common to all. Wherefore this knowledge is certaine and where it is so, there needeth no other prooffe or demonstration fetched farther then from such experience. For God hath so created the nature of things, that men must needs confesse it to bee so, as generall experience doth declare it to be. And he that will not beleene it, let him take triall thereof himselfe, and he shal know whether it be so or no. So that who soeuer would stand against this common and generall experience, he should make open war against God and nature, in denying al order which he hath set down therein. Concerning the knowledge of principles, we must first know that there is vnderstood by principles, that naturall knowledge that is borne with vs, which is the seede of all Arts, and a beame of the light of God in vs, to the end that by this meanes all Artes necessary for life, should be inuented and put in vse. As for example, euery one knoweth naturallly, that the whole of any thing is more then the halfe, or then a part of it only, and that three are more then two. To be brieft the knowledge of numbers, of measures, and of other such like things is naturall vnto vs, and is not found in the nature of beasts: and therefore they haue neither the inuention nor vse of any Arte, as wee haue already heard. But let vs proceede farther and consider, whether there be no naturall knowledge in men, whereby they vnderstand that there is a diuine nature, wise, iust, true, good, that loueth goodnesse, and hateth and punisheth euill, with which nature the soule of man hath some agreement, and is as it were an image thereof: for which which cause he ought to be made conformable to God, by following after wisdom, truth, iustice, goodnesse, and all vertue, and by shunning the contray vices. In this respect, he that followeth this rule obeyeth God, doing that which is pleasant and right in his eyes: and he that leaueth this rule, disobeyeth and displeaseth him, committing wicked and dishonest things, whereby he becometh woorthy of punishment. In a word, we may referre to those naturall principles, whatsoeuer God hath imprinted in mens hartes and mindes of the law of nature, which serueth all men for naturall diuinitie, the Bookes of which they carry printed in their soules. And yet out of all question, this diuinitie will scarce serue vs but to condemnation, if we goe no farther, because the booke thereof is so blotted in vs, that there is not so much as one small peece or leafe thereof whole and sound, and which is not verie much blurred and torne. Neuerthelesse that which remaineth is a sufficient processe against vs before God, and able to conuince and condemne vs at his iudgement. Of this wee our selues may iudge, in that we see, that there is no nation or people that liue with no religion at all, but they haue one eyther true or false, whereby they labour to appease the wrath of God, and to be vnder his fauour and protection, according to that measure of knowledge, which they haue of him. Whereby they plainly declare, that there is a certaine law within them taken from the Booke of this natural diuinity, which condemneth thē in their hartes, and vrgeth & constraineth them to do that which they do, euen as we feele our selues pressed & cōdemned by the written law which God hath giuen vnto vs. Wherefore if we knew how to profit by them both, they would both serue vs in stead of a Schoolemaster to direct & lead vs vnto Iesus Christ. For both of thē, if we vnderstand them well, testifie sufficiently vnto vs, that we stand in neede of a Mediator, by whom we may haue access to God & be reconciled vnto him, seeing we feele our cōdemnation within our selues & in our own consciences. As for the third meane to make a mā certain of that which he is to account for true, which we said was naturall Iudgement, it is the vnderstanding of that order that ought to be in things, & of the consequence of them, whereby to iudge in some sort of the agreement or disagreement they haue one with another, in so much that euery one hath within himselfe as it were a naturall logicke, whereby he is able to iudge at leastwise of common things. It remaineth now that we learne the fourth meane, which passeth al the former, & that is diuine reuelation, wherof we haue made mention, & those certaine and infallible testimonies, which we learne of the holy Scriptures, I meane the Bookes of the Prophets & Apostles, with the confirmation & vnderstanding of them by the holy Spirit. For it were not enough for vs to haue the word of God deliuered vnto vs by them, except the holy Ghost had his working both in them & in vs. Wherefore although naturally we more easily & firmly beleue that which our minde is able to see, know & comprehend by the naturall light thereof, then that which goeth beyond it, yet forasmuch as God hath made vs capable of vnderstanding and reason, we ought to giue no lesse credite to al that he hath reuealed vnto vs by his word, yea much more to this, howsoeuer by that light of nature which remaineth in vs we neither see nor know how true and firme it is, and that for the causes before vttered. Hereof it is that in the Epistle to the Hebrewes, faith is called the substance and ground of things hoped for, and such an evident demonstration of things not seene, that it conuinceth men & causeth them to perceiue and know the truth of them very cleerely. Whereupon wee haue to note, that this naturall light, and that which we call supernaturall, are not (to speake properly) two diuers and different lights, but one and the same, as we should well haue knowne, if our nature had continued in perfection, and in that image of God in which it was created and framed, farre differing from all other creatures. For although there is in them some image of God, yet they haue not vnderstanding to knowe it as it is, neither to knowe God their creatour, who hath imprinted it in them. But it is farre otherwise in man. For God will bee knowne of him, and therefore hee hath so imprinted his image in his nature, that he will haue him to see and know it. For this cause hee hath giuen him a minde and vnderstanding able to receiue this knowledge. For the greatest likenesse and resemblance that a man can haue with God, consisteth in the agreement with him in wisdom and iustice, which cannot bee but in a nature that is capable and partaker of reason and vnderstanding. Nowe because God is good, yea a common and generall Good, hee will not withholde this good in himselfe without communicating it, but maketh all his creatures partakers thereof, especially man, with whome it hath pleased him to communicate this Good of wisdom and iustice, which is the greatest and most excellent good that is in him. Therefore did God together with his image imprint his knowledge

Of the image of God in mā

knowledge in the nature of man. For man could not otherwise know this image and similitude, neither what it is to be like or vnlike to God, if he had no more knowledge of God, who, and what manner a one he is, then other creatures that want this knowledge, because they are not capable of vnderstanding and reason, nor of this image of wisdom and iustice which is in God, and by which man is made like vnto him. Wherefore the first degree of this image and similitude that is in man, appeareth in that power and facultie of vnderstanding which God hath given him, and in that wisdom whereof hee hath made him partaker, and which hath some agreement with the wisdom of God. So that before man sinned, the image of God was such in him, that there was a perfect agreement of all the powers and vertues of the soule betweene God and him. For the diuine light did so shine in his minde, that he had certaine and firme knowledge of GOD, neither was there any resistance against him either in his heart or in his will, but a sound and perpetuall concord and consent. So that there was alwayes betweene the minde and the will an vprightnesse and iustice agreeable with God, neither was the freedom of the wil hindered or drinen forward to euill, because man had not yet made himselfe the subiect and slaue of sinne. As long therefore as man kept this image of God within him, the Lord dwelt therein as in his owne lodging: and by that meanes would haue given to men such perpetuall life and ioy, as should neuer haue bin broken off or extinguished either by sorrow or by death, if hee had suffred himselfe to be alwaies guided by God, and neuer turned aside nor seuered himselfe from him. Therefore Saint Paul speaking of this first image and of the renewing thereof in man, saith, Put on the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness. Seeing then it is thus, there is no doubt but that, if man had continued in his integritie, the light which is now supernaturall in him, would haue bin naturall in all that knowledge of God, which is necessary for him to that end whereunto he was created. For hee had neuer bin overwhelmed with darkenesse, which dimmed and hindred this heavenly light that shined in him, and made him the habitation and temple of God, but had seene cleerely the image of the Father, of the Son, and of the holy Ghost shining in his soule, in which it was imprinted, the draughts and beames whereof are yet euident inough in him, I meane to them that consider of them as it appertayneth, following the light of the word of God. But forasmuch as the darkenesse which sinne hath brought with it, keepeth man from hauing any sound and perfect knowledge of God, or of heavenly things as he had in his first estate, it is necessarie therefore that he should restore and kindle againe in him, this diuine and perfect life which he hath lost by the benefit of regeneration and spirituall renouation, as if hee created him anew, giuing him a minde to vnderstand his word, and a will to follow and to embrace it, This is that, which I thought we were to note and learne concerning the meanes that bring vs certaine knowledge of such things as we ought to iudge & accompt for true. Let vs now consider, how the spirit of man being enriched in measure with heavenly gifts and graces, doth finally attaine to the end of all inquisition and searching out of truth, which is contemplation, that followeth iudgement, as iudgement followeth reason and the discourse thereof. Therefore doe thou, ACHITO B. take vpon thee to discourse of this matter subiect, and so end all speeches of this daies worke concerning vnderstanding, that afterward we may looke particularly into the will, which is the second part and vertue of the highest and most soueraigne power of the soule.

How the vertues and powers of the soule shew themselves by little and little, and by degrees of contemplation, and of the good that is in it: of that true and diuine contemplation which we looke for after this life. Chap. 32.

ACHITO B. I was much troubled oftentimes about the vnderstanding of these two words, Soule & Spirit, in seeking to find what difference or agreement they haue one with another: seeing that many times I saw one of them taken for the other, & also opposed as repugnant one to another. In the end I learned of skilful men, that we might vse the word Soule to signifie man as he is borne, hauing onely the gifts of a humane soule, namely, the humane senses; and those other powers and vertues both animall and naturall, of which wee haue already spoken. And as for the Spirit, that wee must vnderstand thereby, whatsoever heavenly grace and knowledge of the truth is giuen to man by the Spirit of GOD dwelling in him, which guideth and leadeth him to the contemplation of the diuine nature, wherein wherein consisteth his good and felicity. Moreover we may see in sundry places of the Scriptures according to the Hebrew phrase, the word Soule, taken not onely for the life of man, and for all things belonging thereto, but also for the whole nature of man: and thus also is the word Flesh taken. Therefore when the flesh is opposed and set against the spirit in man, we vnderstand thereby, not the body onely, but also the soule of man, I meane such a one as it was at the beginning, when being left vnto it selfe it followed the corruption of it owne nature. And likewise by the Spirit, we meane that which is regenerated in every part of man, whereby he being withdrawne from the peruerse desires and corrupt affections of his nature, is lift vp to the contemplation of celestiall and eternall things.

But our God vseth in such sort to apply himselfe to the nature and ability of his creatures, that by little and little, and by degrees he dispenseth vnto them those things, which he will bestow vpon them, alwaies keeping that order, which he hath vsed and followed in the creation of the world. For, as Moses testifieth, he first created it of nothing. Then having created the matter of all natures, he brought it into a worke, and gaue vnto it a forme, and so polishing it by degrees and day by day, at length he set it in that perfection, which he minded to bestow vpon it. We see likewise, that in the continuation of his workes, he beginneth alwaies at the basest and least thing, and so goeth on encreasing, augmenting, and ascending vp vntill he hath placed them in their perfection, whereof we haue daily experience, principally in plants and living creatures. For the generation of plants cometh of their seedes, from which they take their beginning. And when the seed, which is the least part of the whole plant, is put into the ground, it taketh roor therein and then commeth forth, encreasing daily vntill it come to those bounds, that are allotted vnto it by the Creator, which it cannot passe: because it cannot attaine to greater perfection being of that kinde, but then daily falleth to decay, vntill it be wholly consumed and returned to the Elements from whence it was taken. The like is done in the generation of all living creatures, and namely in that of man. For what is his beginning? and what is his conception, natiuitie, childhood, adolescencie, youth, mans estate, and then old age? We see how small his beginning is, and how he groweth step by step, and from age to age vntill he commeth to the flower of his age, and to his full strength, as plants doe: and from thence the neerer he draweth to old age, the more he fadeth and decayeth vntill he come to death, whereby the body returneth to the Elements out of which it is taken. For as God hath given him a beginning, so hath he appointed him limits, vnto which he may ascend vp vntill he come to his highest, and then he is to descend, as the ordinance of God shall leade him. As for the soule, the same cannot befall it in regard of bignesse, seeing it is not corporall as the body is, neither yet in respect of death, seeing it is immortall. For it cannot be resolued as the body may, to returne into the Elements, out of which it is not taken, but it abideth alwaies in that substance and nature which first it had, because it is of a celestiall and diuine nature. But if the question be of the faculties, powers, and vertues thereof, the seedes of which it hath in it selfe, we see by experience how they shew themselves more and more perfect, and how the vse of them is greater in one age then in another. For as long as the infant is in his mothers wombe, no man can perceiue that as yet he vseth any other vertue and facultie of the soule that is in him, then that which heretofore we called the vegetative or nourishing facultie, by which he is nourished as plants are. After, when he is borne, he continueth a long time like to other living creatures, as though he had onely a vegetative and sensitive soule as they haue. Then by little and little as he groweth from one age to another, those vertues of the soule whereby he differeth from beasts, appeare every day more and more. And yet he hath no other soule in substance, nor any other senses and mind throughout his whole life, then he had when it first moued: as also he hath no other body. But a man may easily iudge, that this commeth not of the nature of the soule, but of the instruments it hath in the body, which in the infancie of man, hinder it from doing that which it doth by them in other ages. Besides, wee may truly say, that God hath created it of that nature, that as he hath ioined it vnto the body, which hath his degrees of growth, so the soule hath some agreement therewith in this respect, touching the manifestation of her naturall powers and vertues. Neither is it any strange thing if God deale so with it in this matter. In the meane time we see, that although the soule of man seemeth in nothing or very little to differ from that of plants, as long as it is in the mothers wombe, nor from the soule of beasts during the time of his infancie: neuerthelesse afterward it sheweth very well wherein it differeth from them, and that it hath certaine vertues, which are not in any other soule. For if this were not so both in respect of the age & growth of the body, as also in regard of that property which is in the nature thereof, it would bee alwaies like to that which it is in the beginning, as we see it is with plants and beasts, in whose soule we can perceiue no more change in the ende and when they growe vp, then in their beginning and first birth. According then to that I haue now sayde, wee see by experience, that in the gifts and graces, wherewith GOD daily adorneth and enricheth his children, he doth not communicate all at once vnto them, but by little and little and by degrees, as hee iudgeth it expedient, and as they are capable of reason and vnderstanding. Therefore it is written of Iohn Baptist, that the child grewe, and waxed strong in spirit: which is as much to say, as that according as he grew in age, God increased the graces of his holy spirit vpon him wherewith he had indued him euen from his mothers wombe.

And when we haue profited wel in his schoole, so that we are assured of, and instructed in those things, which we ought to follow according to the word of GOD, we easily attaine to that Good, which is the end of all inquiry of the truth, namely to contemplation, which followeth iudgement, as iudgement followeth reason and the discourse thereof. For reason discoursing, is as it were the inquisition of the truth that is sought for, and iudgement is as the election that maketh choice of the truth, & of that which it taketh to be most certaine: and Contemplation is as it were a quiet and settled beholding of all those things which were gathered together by reason, and receiued with approbation by iudgement. For there is no more place for disputation, seeing all things are certaine and cleere. Now all pleasure and delight proceedeth from the conuenience & agreement, that is betwixt the thing that pleaseth, and him whom it doth please. And because there is nothing more agreeable to the nature of the spirit and minde of man then truth, bereof it commeth, that notwithstanding all corruption that is in him, there is no man but naturally desireth knowledge and skil, accounting scienceto be excellent and worthy of great praise, and ignorance to be ful of shame, yea, he iudgeth it a very ill thing to be deceived. Wherefore we may not doubt, but that as knowledge is more true and certaine, so doth the spirit receiue greater pleasure: and when it hath found the truth, it delighteth greatly therein. And if for the causes before touched by vs, it cannot finde the truth so certainly as it desireth, yet it taketh singular pleasure in approaching so neere vnto it as it can. For this cause the more certaine the truth is which it knoweth, it is the more agreeable and pleasant vnto it, especially when it knoweth the true spring & first causes therof. Therefore as the minds of men delight more in those things: that resemble them most, of so much the more noble & excellent nature they are, yea more heavenly and diuine, and so will take pleasure in such things as are more excellent and celestiall. Contrariwise, the more earthly, vile, and abiect they shall be, the more will they delight in mortall, base and contemptible things, and despise such as are of greatest value. For this cause many Philosophers haue esteemed more of the study of Philosophy, and the knowledge therof, then of kingdomes and great riches, being prouoked and pricked thereunto, by an vnspcakable pleasure which their spirit took in the knowledge of those things that were reuealed vnto them therein. On the other side, wee see that ambitious men delight more in honours and worldly greatnesse, then they would doe, at leastwise in their owne opinion, in all the skill of the Philosophers. A couetous man pleaseth himselfe a great deale more in telling and beholding his crownes, then in any other thing whatsoever. It is no maruell therefore if ambitious, couetous, and voluptuous men, and such like doe commonly deride those that take delight in learning, and chiefly in the doctrine and contemplation of these celestiall and eternall things, which they set before their eyes, or if they preferre greatly their owne estate and condition, before others that take pleasure in such things. For they are pearles cast before swine, which are not valued as they are worth but onely of such as know them and their value.

Now if heathen Philosophers haue oftentimes willingly abandoned all their goods, that they might wholly addict themselves to the study of their humane Philosophy, and to the contemplation of such things as they could know thereby, notwithstanding that it was alwaies accompanied with some doubting, and that they could neuer attaine to a certaine knowledge either of the beginning or end of things: what ought Christians to do whē the question is of Diuine Philosophie and Wisdome, the treasures of which are opened and offered vnto them in the word of God? For it is without all comparison farre more certaine then any science, and containeth in it other truths, and matters that are a great deale more profound, excellent, and more worthy of contemplation. And they to whom God hath beene beene so gracious, as to giue some taste and experience of these things, are able to iudge well of them, yea farre better then any others. For it is certaine that euen for a little true knowledge of God, & of the truth of those things which he hath reuealed vnto vs in his doctrine, we receiue singular delight, with great ioy, and sweet consolation. So that every man may perceiue, how much greater the pleasure wil be when the knowledge shal be greater. If then this smal taste, which we may haue in this world of these delicacies & spiritual delights, bringeth vnto vs such singular ioy, we may easily iudge how great it will bee in that most happy contemplation, which we shall haue in heauen with God, when we shall behold him face to face, and know him as we are knowne, whereas here wee see him but as it were in a glasse, & through a cloude. For that is the contemplation of al contemplations, seeing it is the beholding of God, with whom nothing may be compared. Then there shall be no cloude of ignorance, when wee shal haue, not a likely or probable, but a most certaine and true knowledge. For the truth shall be shewed vnto vs most certaine in GOD who is the Authour and Father thereof, in whom we shal thoroughly and perfectly see and know the causes of al things. For our spirits shall be held no longer in such an obscure and darke prison, as here they are constrained to suffer in our mortall bodies. Therefore there shall be no more diuersities, disagreements, or contrarieties of opinions and iudgements, that some should condemne that which others approue, but all shall be of the same iudgement. But seeing wee are fallen into the matter of contemplation, it shall not be vnprofitable, if vpon occasion of that diuision, which is commonly made of the actiue and contemplatiue life, we note, that although the spirit desireth aboue all things the pleasure that is in contemplation, as the proper foode and delight thereof, yet we must alwayes consider, that we are not onely borne for our selues, but also for others, and to this end, that we should all in common serue one another, both generally and specially. For God doth not only command the performance of that seruice, which he requireth of vs towards his owne person according to that which is contained in the first Table of the Lawe, but hee commandeth vs also in the second Table to doe that which he requireth of vs towards other men. Therefore he will not haue vs dwell alwaies in contemplation, but we must put to our hand, and discharge vs of our duty towards euery one, according as he teacheth vs by his word. We are then to learne, that so long as we liue in this world we must not separate the actiue life from the contemplatiue, but alwaies ioine them both together, vntill we come to that blessed life, which shall be altogether contemplatiue, when we shall be deliuered from all the miseries and necessities, and from all the troubles and lets in which we are wrapped & detained in this mortall life. God grant vs his grace to vse all our senses so well, both externall and internall, and all the powers, faculties and vertues of our soule and spirit, of which we haue hitherto spoken, that wee may cause them all to serue to his glory, and that we may attaine to that blessed contemplation, which is prepared for all his elect in his celestiall pallace: and that to this end he would dispose in vs our will, and all the affections of our soule, of the nature of which we will beginne to morrow to discourse. And first, AS ER, I thinke thou art to entreat of those appetites that are naturally in man, seeing Desire is the proper subiect of the Will as thou shalt instruct vs more at large.

Of the Appetites that are in all liuing creatures, and namely in man, and of their kindes: and particularly of the Naturall and Sensitiue Appetite. Chap. 33.

SER. As God and all that is in the world, is propounded to the minde of man, that he might know him so farre forth as is needfull for him, so is he also propounded to the will, that he might will, desire, and follow him as farre as his nature is capable thereof. Wherefore if man had not sinned, but had continued in his first estate wherein God created him, this great and eternall Goodnesse had shined in our soules that diuine word together with his holy spirit: which word being the eternall Sonne of rupt nature.

God, would haue alwaies taught and shewed vs the Father, of whom he was begotten before all time, and would haue lightened our minds with the light of all wisdom that we might haue beheld and seene him: and the holy spirit would haue ioyned our hearts and wils vnto the Father and to the Sonne, through a mutual loue replenished with all ioy and gladnes, and through certaine motions agreeable to the diuine nature. By which means there should haue bin in our hearts a great fire of loue towards God, and next to him we should haue loved other good things, according to that order which is shewed vnto vs in his heavenly wisdom and doctrine, and should haue desired them for the loue of him. But now in the estate of naturall corruption in which we are, all this goodly agreement, harmony and concord which ought to be betweene God and man, is wholly peruered and overthrowne. For in place of the true knowledge of God, there is nothing but ignorance and doubting in our mindes: and as for the Will, it searcheth after and desireth other things whereunto it applieth it selfe, and seeketh not after God. Neither doth it keepe any order in those things which it hath for objects, and which it setteth down in stead of the things commanded in his word. So that while it thinketh to attaine to that good whereunto naturally it aspireth, it obtaineth nothing to it selfe but a very great euill.

Of the desires that are in creatures.

Now when we espake before of the braine, and of the internall senses of the soule, and of the principall part and vertue thereof, we made some mention of the will, which ought to be directed and led by vnderstanding and reason. It remaineth now that wee looke more narrowly into the nature thereof, and of the affections of the soule, of the vitall vertue, of the heart, and of other members, which are the seats and instruments thereof, even as when we entreated of the animal vertues of the soule, we considered of their seats & instruments. First then we must marke what hath bene hitherto spoken, namely, that God hath giuen to all his creatures a naturall inclination, that leadeth every one of them to that which is naturall and agreeable to it selfe. Beasts haue an appetite to follow that good that is fit for them, and therefore also hath God giuen them the knowledge of that good, and senses meete for that purpose, to the ende they might shew vnto them, what is good for their preservation to follow it, and to shun the contrary. VVe haue learned also how God hath giuen both the one and the other to man, and vnto what degree concerning both of them, he hath lifted him aboue all liuing creatures. For as he hath created him to enioy a farre greater and more excellent Good then he hath beasts, and hath giuen vnto him a will to wish and desire it, so he hath endued him with a deeper knowledge whereby to know that Good: because he could not wish for it and desire it, except he did know it, and hee could not know it, if he had not a minde capable thereof, and endued with greater knowledge then that is, which he hath giuen to beasts. For this cause as they haue a kind of knowledge agreeable to their nature, and to the quality of that Good, which being fit for them is the greatest they can attaine vnto: so also hath man a knowledge according to his nature, and to the ende for the which he was created. So that the knowledge that God hath giue him, serueth to stir vp his appetite and desire of that Good which he knoweth: and his appetite also serueth his knowledge, so farre forth as man being moued and pricked forward to loue God, reioy-ceth and reposeth himselfe in him, hauing knowne him to be his soueraigne Good.

Three kindes
of appetites.

Of the Natural appetite.

Of hunger
and thirst.

But to the end we may the better vnderstand this whole matter, we must note, that there are three kindes of appetites among the creatures, which are commonly called, the one naturall, the other sensitiue, and the third voluntary. As for the naturall, we may diuide it into two sorts. For there is one generall to all creatures, whether liuing or without life, which is nothing else but a naturall inclination without any action, proceeding from any soule or life: as when we say, that heavy things desire to goe downward, and light things vpward, as we see it in the nature of the Elements, which are without soule and life. But beside this naturall appetite common to all creatures, there is an other that hath action ioyned with the inclination, which neuertheless proceedeth not of any sense. This appetite is proper to the vegetative and nourishing soule and life, whereof plants are partakers. For we see by experience, that they haue a naturall appetite to draw vnto them, and to retaine that which is meete for their nature and foode, and to expell the contrary. For if a plant waxe drie, it desireth to be watered, and draweth and keepeth humor and moisture necessary for it selfe. VVe see the like in mens bodies. For when the members want nourishment, they sucke the veines, and the veines drawe vnto them blood. And as the members desire their food, so they desire to be vnburthened when they haue too much. The appetite which wee call hunger and thirst, may bee referred to this kinde of naturall appetite, if this bee excepted

Of the naturall and sensitie Appetites. 439

ted, that we cannot say it is without sense and feeling. For beside the desire of eating and drinking, there is withall a sense of this attraction, whereby the members suck the veines, and the veines the bloud: and this sense is not without griefe and displeasure. So that every living creature is stirred vp to seeke for his foode, and to take his refection. Whereupon wee may diuide this naturall appetite also into two kindes, whereof the one shall be proper to plants that haue no sense, and the other belong to living Creatures that haue this feeling, of which I made mention euen now, and which differeth from that sense that is proper to the outward senses already spoken of. The reason whereof is, because it is properly such a kinde of feeling, as those creatures haue, which keepe a meane betweene plants and living creatures, being partakers of both their natures, and yet are neither simply plants, nor perfect living creatures, as it hath beene already shewed. As therefore wee heard in our former discourse, speaking of the growing vp of mans body, and of the manifestation by little and little of the powers of the soule, namely, that as long as the childe is in the mothers wombe, he is like to plants; so also hee hath then great agreement with these middle sorts of creatures in regard of this kind of appetite, and of the manner of nourishing whereby it is fedde. For the seede, whereof he is begotten and conceived, is nourished and groweth vp as plants doe, vntill such time as the Infant that is fashioned, haue sense and feeling, much like to that sense of the foresaid creatures, which are partakers of the nature both of plants and of living creatures. For as yet hee hath no vse of his externall senses, vntill such time as hee bee borne. Now the seate of this kinde of naturall appetite, is chiefly in the liuer and in the stomacke, and generally in all the members that serue for nourishment. For these members haue that appetite that is ioyned with this kinde of sense, of which I spake euen now. And as for the appetite of the other members, which serue not for the nourishing of the whole body, but onely for themselves, it is more like to that appetite that is in plants. For they feele neither hunger nor thirst as other members doe. And thus much for the naturall appetite and the kinds thereof. Concerning this sensitie appetite, it is that which accompanieth the sense, and belongeth onely to living creatures. There are two sorts of this. For either it is made with touching, or without touching. Pleasure and griefe belong properly to the first kinde, and the instruments and seates thereof are in the sinewes, or els in that small sinewy skinne, which giueth the sense. For those things delight the sinewes which agree with their nature, and looke what is contrary vnto them, the same affecteth them with griefe, which tendeth to their destruction, as delight procureth their preservation. So that heate, colde, drinesse, and moisture, reioyce, helpe and comfort the sinewes, or else grieue, hurt, and indamage them, according as they are either well or ill applied vnto them. Therefore the sinewes were created, to the end they might be instruments of sense and motion, and that they should receiue pleasure and paine. Now all these sorts of appetites, are not in the wil & power of man, neither proceede they from his imagination. For whether he will or no, he shall be subiect to hunger & thirst, and shall in the same maner feele and perceiue things as they are applyed vnto him, if he be so disposed in body as he ought to be. True it is, he may well abstaine from eating & drinking, & from touching whatsoeuer he pleaseth, but this abstinence in the meane time wil not take from him that appetite which he hath, but will increase it the more. For it cannot hinder, but that all the members will stil desire their nourishment, and the body wil alwaies haue this sense and feeling. And as for the sense of touching, it wil alwaies feele that which it toucheth, and euen such as it is when it shall be touched. But there are appetites of another kinde, which are bred without any touch at all, and follow the thought and imagination of a man. These are properly called affections, and haue their seate in the heart. Therefore they must be distinguished from others that hauing sense of delectation and of griefe, are placed in the stomacke, or in the sinewes, or in the rest of the body. Now by the affections we meane properly those motions of the heart, which follow knowledge, and either seeke after or reiect, that which is offered vnto them: so that according to the order of nature, knowledge goeth before these motions. Hereof it is, that we commonly say, that a man must know before he loue, that no man desireth that which he knoweth not. But before we enter into a deeper and more particular consideration of the affections of the soule and of the heart, we must note this, that all knowledge is given of God to this end, to desire that Good which it knoweth, and in desiring to follow the same, vntill it hath ioyned and knit it vnto it selfe, as neere as is possible. For in this manner Good will bee good vnto it, and not otherwise. To this ende sensuall knowledge is given for sensuall goods, and spirituall knowledge for those goods that are spirituall. And as the knowledge both of the one and the other is given to desire it, so also it is given that it might, turne aside and flee from euill, which is contrary to good, to the end that the Will might not ioyne it selfe thereunto, by which meanes euill would indeede become euill vnto it, and could not otherwise be auoided. For as good could not be good vnto vs, but onely so farre forth as wee did apply it and ioyne our selues thereunto, so fareth it also with euill. And because God hath not created beastes to enioy any other good then corporall goods, and such as belong to their brutish life, which goeth not beyond this temporall life, therefore he hath not giuen them the knowledge or appetite of any other good. So that as they haue no other knowledge but that which is sensuall, so they haue no other appetite but sensuall, which is guided onely by naturall inclination, wherein they haue nature onely for their Mistresse, which pricketh forward both their outward and inward senses without any direction at all of Vnderstanding and of reason. Therefore this sensuall appetite common to all liuing creatures, cannot properly be called Will. For as wee cannot call by the name of Vnderstanding and Reason, that naturall inclination which is given to beastes for their direction, seeing men onely are endued with Vnderstanding and Reason, so is it with Will, the name whereof agreeth not to that sensuall appetite, except we would call it sensuall Will, in respect of the resemblance of Will, which it hath, wherein it differeth much from the Will in man: as the sequelle of our speech requireth that wee should now learne, to the ende wee may know the third kind of appetite which we set down in the beginning of this discourse, namely the voluntarie appetite, which is proper and peculiar to man, and the subiect of his Will. Thou shalt tell vs therefore, AMANA, what Will is properly, what her actions are, what libertie and freedome shee hath, and what power Reason may haue ouer her.

Math. 5.

From whence

all creatures ought to be deriud.

A*MANA*. The loue of GOD towards men hath alwaies beene and is such, that albeit he hath iust occasion to hate vs as sinners, yet that hindereth him not fro louing vs alwaies as men. For hee considereth man otherwise in the nature and substance with which he created him, and as he is his worke, then in that order and confusion, which after entred vnto his nature by the worke of Sathan in him. For this cause wee see that hee causeth his Sonne to shine as well vpon the euill as vpon the good, sendeth raine to the one as well as to the other, powreth many benefits vpon all in generall. But besides this loue, whereof every one receiueth fruit, there is another more special towards his elect, whom hee loueth not onely as hee loued vs all in Adam, the stocke of mankind, and as his creatures created after his Image, but loueth them also as regenerated and newe creatures in Iesus Christ his Sonne, the latter and iust Adam, GOD and man, and the stocke of Spirituall men framed againe by him to the image and similitude of God. Therefore wee must vnderstand, that GOD hath and doth loue men in regard of the good hee hath put into them, (which is wrought chiefly through the benefit of spirituall regeneration) the remnant of which Good hee still loueth. And in louing that, hee loueth himselfe, because he is the soueraigne and onely good, which is worthy to be loued in respect of it selfe. Whereby we may see, what is the true fountaine of all loue, and of all the desires, appetites and wils of all creatures. For they must all be drawne out of one & the same spring and fountaine, namely, the loue and will of God, and that good which he loueth and willeth. And the greater the Good is, the more it ought to be loued, so that every Will should desire to ioyne it selfe theunto, to follow after it, & to haue the fruition thereof. And because there can be no Good greater then God, therefore no other can be loued but that. So that whilest he loueth himselfe, he loueth all the good that may be, because there is none but in him & from him. Therefore this followeth necessarily, that as all good things proceed from him, so they must be all referred to him, & returne thither as to the Wel-head, even as al waters returne into the Sea from whence they came first of all. Having then learned of our former discourse, that God hath giuen to man vnderstanding to know good, & wil to desire and & follow it, it is his duty alwaies to referre al the good things he hath, vnto him that is soueraigne and eternall Good, and to account nothing good, as in truth it cannot be, but him that ought to be so accounted, and to looke at him as the last and most blessed end.

We vnderstand then properly by VWill, that facultie and vertue of the soule, whereby we desire that which is good, and eschew euill by the direction and guiding of reason. Therefore there are two actions of will, wherof the first is that inclination to good by which it imbraceth the same, and the second is the turning aside from euill. And when it is idle and inclineth to neither side, it is depriued of both these actions. Now although we said before, that reason held the souerainty amongst the powers, vertues and offices of the soule, yet wee must know, that reason reigneth not ouer will as Lady and Princesse, but onely as Mistresse to teach and shew it, what it ought to follow & what to flie from. For the will hath no light of it selfe, but is lightned by the minde, that is to say, by reason and iudgement, which are ioyned with it, not to gouerne and turne it from one side to another by commandement and authority, either by force or violence, as a Prince or Magistrate, but as a counsellor or director, to admonish and to conduct it. And so the will desireth or refuseth nothing, which reason hath not first shewed that it is to bee desired or disdained. Therefore the act of VWill proceedeth indeede from VWill, but it is iudged of and counsell'd by reason: so that it is as it were begotten by reason, and brought forth by VWill. But that wee deceiue not our selues in these names of reason and Will, wee are to knowe, that both of them are taken diuersly, as the names of Minde and Vnderstanding are. For sometime they are taken for that vertue of vnderstanding which is in the soule, & somtime for the action thereof and the thing which it doth vnderstand: as when we say that wee haue the vnderstanding of something. So reason is sometime taken for the minde that giueth direction and counsaile, and for the will which obeyeth it, and restraineth the affections: and in this sence, it comprehendeth both the Vnderstanding and the will. But sometime it is taken onely for that part, which vnderstandeth and hath knowledge to conduct and guide, as now wee must so take it, in making it the Mistresse and counsaillor of the will. Besides, reason is also taken oftentimes for the arguments and discourses of reason, as when we say of a man, Hee hath good reason in that: or else, He hath proued his saying by good & pregnant reasons, that is to say, by good arguments. And if we take reason so, it signifieth not onely that power & vertue of discoursing which is in the soule and in the mind, but also the act and effect thereof. The like may be said of this word Will. For it is commonly taken not so much for that power & vertue which the soule hath to VWill, as for the Will it selfe, which is the action and effect thereof: as when one speaking of tyrants saith, that their VWill is all their reason. For then wee meane, that they take not reason for their counsailler, neither follow the aduice thereof, but onely their VWill, and that which pleaseth them. So then we vse this word VWill for that which proceedeth from it: and so likewise it is often taken in the holy Scriptures, when they speake of the VWill of God, whereby we doe not vnderstand that power of VWill that is in him, but that which he willet & commandeth vs. And therefore we craue that his Will may be done, and not that which we will. But speaking now of the Will of man, wee take it not in this sence. But we vse it for the power and vertue of Willing that is in the soule, which power is aboue the sensitiue appetite, whereof we haue already spoken. For wee see by experience that there are certaine degrees of appetites, & that the appetite of the senses is subiect to the Will, as I hope we shall intreat more at large in the sequele of our speech. Wherefore the Will is the highest and most soueraigne vertue of desiring, far aboue all other appetites, and that which worketh with libertie, after the mind hath shewed vnto it what it ought to follow, and what to eschew, what to make choise of, and what to refuse. The actions thereof are to VWill, and not to VWill: and the meane or middle thing which shee hath betwene them twayne, is to suspend her action, vntill shee decline eyther on the one side or on the other. And as concerning the naturall disposition of the Will: it is to wil that good which is truly good, or that which seemeth to bee so: and to shunne euill, eyther that which is euill indeede, or that which it thinketh to bee so. Nowe if shee choose and follow euill for good, it followeth not therefore, but that shee would alwayes follow the good, as that which properly appertayneth vnto her, and reiect euill as her enemy. But the reason why shee maketh choise of euill for good, is because shee is deceiued, taking one for another, which commeth to passe through the ignorance and corruption that is in the nature of man. For albeit shee can will and not will that thing which is propounded vnto her, yet shee cannot simply will and not will one and the same thing all at one time, nor yet make choise of clean contraries. For she can desire nothing but only vnder some shew of good, nor refuse any thing but vnder some shew of euill. Wherefore it may well be that it will not desire that which shall be shewed vnder some appearance of good, but it cannot hate or reiect it. Will.

Whereupon it followeth, that our Will is at libertie and free, and cannot be constrained: yea God the Creatour and Lord thereof would haue it so, otherwise it should not bee a Will. It is very true, that it followeth reason alwayes, because the Will hath no light of it selfe, but onely so farre forth as it receiueth the same from reason, which guideth and directeth it. And therefore it neuer applyeth it selfe to any thing whatsoever, but hath reason alwayes for a guide, whom it followeth. Neuerthelesse it is not so subiect therevnto, as that it may compel it to follow all the reasons that are propounded vnto it by reason, or tie it to any of them, but that alwayes she hath her libertie to make choise of which reason shee please, out of all those that are set before her. And so it is alwayes a Will, although it change sometime, beeing perswaded by reasons to will when it was vnwilling, or disswaded from Will to be vnwilling. But in the meane time she willeth whatsoever shee will, and that as long as it pleaseth her to remaine in one opinion. For not onely no creature whatsoever is able to take from her that which GOD her Creatour hath given her, but shee cannot depriue her selfe thereof, no more then shee may not bee that which shee is. For as God will haue this image shine in the minde of man by vnderstanding and wisdom, of which hee hath made it partaker, so hee will haue his image also to shine in the Will by that freedome and libertie which hee hath given vnto it. As therefore hee cannot bee constrained, but worketh and doeth what pleaseth him with all libertie, as beeing a Soueraigne that hath no superiour; so hee hath appointed, that the Will which he hath given to men and Angelles, should bee alwaies franke and free, and not bee subiect to violence or constraint: to the ende hee might haue them children, not slaues, because hee requireth of them a voluntarie obedience, and such a seruice as is not forced or constrained, but agreeable to his owne nature. For as he doth nothing himselfe by constraint, so hee will not constrain those by whome hee will bee obeyed: neyther delighteth hee in any seruice that is not voluntary and proceeding from a good heart, and from a sincere and pure affection towards him. Therefore seeing God hath so loued vs, and done vs so great honour, as to create vs after his owne image, and likenesse, wee are vile and ingratefull wretches, if we doe not acknowledge the same, and cause our Will to bee seruiceable to him that hath bestowed it freely vpon vs: as wee ought also to performe the like seruice vnto him with our minde and reason, wherewith he hath endued vs for the ruling and direction of the Will. But when our Will taketh any other obiekt beside obedience to God, it proceedeth from the same cause that blindeth our minde and reason, namely, sinne, which reigneth in vs through the corruption of our nature, as we have already touched it. Neuertheles that which I said is alwaies true, that the Will hath Good in such sort for her obiekt, that she cannot truly loue & without dissembling will that which is euill, if it hath no shewe or reason of some good. But notwithstanding shee hath free liberty, yet is shee so ordeyned of God, that shee cannot will that which is euill, but onely that which is good, whether it be good in truth, or in opinion onely. For if shee were not created and ordained of GOD to desire and followe after good, there would bee no cause why shee should loue or desire vertue more then vice, or loue GOD rather then hate him. But wee must consider diuers degrees in the actions of Will, and in the freedome thereof. For some there are whose heart and Will, agree so together, that there is no dissimulation, neither any commandement of the Will either towards it selfe or towards any other, but it heartily desireth or refuseth that, which it seeketh after or escheweth. As we may say of an ambitious man, that hee doeth truly and with all his heart desire honour and glory, as also a covetous man doth riches. But there are other actions of the will, wherein shee commandeth her selfe, or else the inferiour powers that are subiect vnto her: as wee see in a man infected with the drop sicke, who beeing very dry and thirstie, desireth greatly to drinke. But this appetite that commeth from the senses of the body, is restrained by the wil that hath power over it, which knowing what hurt would issue thereof to the sicke party, commandeth this appetite, and appointeth that hee shall not drinke. The reason why shee will haue it so, is, to the ende that the patient might auoide greater euill then then that which he requireth, knowing well, that to drinke would hurt him more then helpe him, because the thirstinesse would not be taken from him, but increased. Wherefore although the sensuall appetite putteth the patient in minde to desire drinke, yet Will following the Iudgement of Reason, opposeth it selfe against this appetite, and commandeth it selfe to abstaine, and also the outward members, as namely the mouth not to drinke, and the handes not to giue it any drinke. Now if it so fall out, that the will giue place to the appetite, it is alwaies with her consent, and that because she agreeth rather vnto the sensuall appetite then vnto Reason. Which agreement proceedeth of her impaciency and incontiniencie, because she hath not patience to stay for the better, but rusheth vpon that pleasure, which at that present seemeth best vnto her and neere at hand. Therefore it is alwaies requisite that the grace of God should gouerne our minde and will, to perswade them euer more to counsell and to embrace the best: otherwise we shall make choice of the worst, and of euill rather then of good. Which we shall easily vnderstand, if we consider what good things the wisest and most vertuous men, guided onely by the light of nature, are able to propound to themselves, and to follow: and what difference in that point there is betwixt them, and those God doth guide and gouerne by his spirit. The discourse then of this matter belongeth to thee, A R A M.

A R A M. Among the heathen Philosophers there haue alwaies beene some great personages endued with excellent doctrine, who seemed to haue beene ledde with a burning affection towards good and vertuous things: this no man can deny. But if we compare them that haue had none but naturall light, with them who beleeuing the word of life, haue receiued that light, which the spirit of GOD hath kindled in their hearts & minds, we shall finde very great difference betwixt them. For they that follow the light of nature, take not an infinite, spirituall and eternall good, which is God, for the obiekt of that good which they desire, but a finite, carnall & temporary good; and that also no farther then their reason and sense iudge it good for mankind, or for the society of men or for themselves, and those whom they loue. The like respect they haue in eschewing euill, which they iudge contrary to such a good. And yet there are very few that goe so far, who giue not themselves to vertue, rather for their owne profit and glory, then for the loue they beare to vertue, or to the benefite of the common society of men. And surely, I thinke that if glory had not more moued so many excellent men, as haue bin heretofore among the Grecians, Latines, and other heathen people and nations, then their loue to vertue, and to things profitable for the common wealth, they would not willingly haue incurred so great dangers to effect so many valiant deeds as Histories specifie of them: neither would they haue set vertue at so high a price, if no glory or profit should haue redounded to them in following her, or at least wise in seeming to seeke after her. If any haue bin found to haue done otherwise, as we reade of some, it is to be attributed to a speciall grace that God hath bestowed vpon them in their ignorance, more then to others. But yet all this would be nothing, or very little, seeing the good which the will propoundeth to it selfe, and pursueth in this sort, is not the true and so-ueraigne good, which of it selfe is able to make men blessed.

We are then to know, that the wisest and most vertuous men, guided onely by the light of naturall reason, doe not propound to themselves, nor seeke after any other good then that, which consisteth in ciuill honestie, in worldly honour and glory, in this bodily life, and in the commodities thereof, and in those delights and pleasures, which their humane sense and reason desire, according as some delight either in the knowledge of thinges, or in ciuill and morall vertues, or in honours, or in riches and in such like things. Yea the best that euer were among the Heathen, and the wisest of this world that are like vnto them, neuer went farther, neyther indeede coulde. For seeing they know not GOD truly, they can neither loue him nor seek after him, eyther because they are not throughly perswaded that there is a God, or if they be sure of that, yet they stand doubtful what he is, whether he haue care of men or no, and whether he heare and helpe them when they call vpon him. And if they be in aduersitie, then they loue him much lesse. For if they thinke that their miseries come from their owne nature, or at all aduenture, they suppose they are not bound vnto him, neither ought to loue him, seeing he hath provided no better for their affaires. And if they thinke, that himselfe doth send them because of their sins, they are so farre from louing him, that contrariwise they hate him, and storme against him: as it is most manifest by infinite blasphemies contained in the books of Heathen Poets, Historiographers, and Philosophers, as well against God, as against his providence, iudgements and all his workes, when they fell not out to their liking. Now if their Vnderstanding was so blinded in the knowledge of God, their Will was much turned out of the way. For it is alwaies like to a ship caried hither & thither by diuers tempests, which seeketh still some ha- uen to arriue at, but can find none. So the Will seeking after the good which it desireth, run- neth and skippeth from one to another without order, & can find no rest, except that hea- uenly light shine into the minde, which may teach it the true good & frame it to the seeking and embracing thereof. Therefore when this light is in the Spirit of man, it first presenteth to the wil that infinite good, namely God, in whom alone she may satisfie herselfe, & then all other good things that depend of that, all which she desireth, every one in his order. Thus shal God haue the first place, and the next his creatures, all which we ought to loue so farre forth as he hath created them, and so consequently are good. And if wee place God in the highest degree of loue, as the soueraigne good, with whose loue we ought to be as it were wholly swallowed vp, we will loue nothing but in him & by him, and for his sake: and con- sequently we will desire nothing but according to his Will, because we can will or desire no- thing but that which we shall loue, & we shal loue nothing, but that which we ought to loue, neither with any other affection nor to any other end. Which is the proper effect of the spi- rit of God in them that are regenerated and guided by him. And thus when the darknesse of our mind is driven out by light from heaven, which is brought vnto it by Iesus Christ, and the Will inflamed by the holy Ghost, then doe our hearts reioyce in the goodnes of God and our conscience resteth therein; then do we loue him, and begin to obey him not desiring a- ny other thing. Therefore we beseech him to guide & gouerne vs, to reforme vs daily more and more after his owne image and similitude, to the end we may be made conformable to him both in minde & will, and become true Temples for him to dwell in. And whatsoeuer he sendeth vs, whether it be prosperitie or aduersity, we take and receiue all as from his hand giuing him thanks in prosperity, & not abusing or extolling our felues against him: and cal- ling vpon him in aduersitie without murmuring or despising his Maiesty, which wee adore alwaies, whether we vnderstand & comprehend his iudgements, or no. Likewise we are led by him to loue all good things, according to that order which is shewed vnto vs by his hea- uenly wisdom, namely, other men made after the image of God as we are, & those vertues, life and things that are agreeable vnto him, desiring them for the loue of God, and knowing that we serue him in the lawfull vse of all these things, yeelding praises & thanks vnto him, as to the author & creator of the. Neuerthelesse it commeth to passe that we see oftentimes a very great confusion in the maners and works, even of the holiest and best men that may be: but that is when God withdraweth from them his spirit and grace, although it be neuer so little a while, or when he doth manifest & shew forth his vertue and power in them. For without God we can doe nothing, and through him nothing is impossible vnto vs. It is ve- ry certaine, that there remaineth alwaies naturall infirmity & corruption in man, and that the mind, reason and memory may be troubled by the affections of the heart, which resem- bleth a fry furnace, & is like to a thick smoke ascending out of a great fire which would dim the eies & make them as it were blind. And when the light of the minde is thus darkened, reason cannot discourse so wel, nor iudgement iudge so vprightly, nor memory retain so firme- ly, or bring forth so readily that which it hath kept, as if none of the were thus hindred with darkenes, which compasseth about the light that ought to guid them. Now if there be such a let & impediment in regard of the mind, the Will is much more troubled by this fire of af- fections that heateth and kindleth it, whereby it is made a great deale more vntoward to follow the counsel & aduise of reason, then reason is wel affected to admonish and counsel it in that which is to be followed, or to be fled. And when these two principall parts & powers of the soule are thus troubled and moued, it is no maruel if man forget God & himselfe, and if with all his soule and body he turne aside from that which he ought to follow after. As contrariwise there is no doubt, but that as long as the celestiall and eternall father disperfeth

his diuine light into our mindes by his sonne, who is his eternall word and wisdom, preparing them by his holy Spirit to receiue the same, and by this meanes also kindleth the heart and Will with the heat thereof, disposing and framing them to follow this light, no doubt I say, but there will ensue a good agreement and great conformity of the minde and heart, of the Reason and Will, and of all the affections, yea of all the senses and members of man. But let vs returne to the sequel of our speech, which hath an especiall respect vnto the Will, we haue then to consider more narrowly of the power and freedome of the Will, both in her internall and externall actions. For the first, if the question be of deliberating about any thing, it is in the choise of the Will to propound the same to the minde, to aduise and consult thereupon, or otherwise not to propound the same vnto it. After whilest the matter is in deliberation, she may command either to prosecute the same, or to deferre it to some other time, or to giue it ouer quite, and to turne the minde to some other thing; as it were a Prince among his Councell. And if the consultation be finished, and sentence given by iudgement, yet may the Will stay it selfe from desiring and following after that which is counselled, and iudged to be good by reason. So that the whole consultation lieth in the liberty and choise of Will. For men are not drawne by an immutable violence of nature as beasts are, but reason enquireth what way is to be taken or left, and wayeth and examineth what good or euill is in euery thing. Therefore Will may go about againe with that which was once deliberated of, to the end the first conclusion be not approued & staied in, but that greater inquiry may be made, to find out, if it may be, some better or more profitable thing. And thus, when many things are shewed and set before her, she may choole what pleaseth her, although it be not that which was best approued by iudgement, and which reason vpon very euident arguments counselled her to follow. For if there be another side that hath some shew of good, albeit neuer so small, shee turneth to that if she please: so that vpon only coniecture, or opinion of good, shee will lay hold vpon that, & reiect the other side in which peraduenture the true good is to be found. The chiefe cause whereof is in the corruption of our nature, and in those impediments of good discouraging, & of vpriight iudging whereof we haue already heard, and which hinder reason and iudgement diuers and sundry waies. And this also taketh place in respect of will, which likewise hath great occasions offered to beguile & deceiue it selfe, because all the affaires of men are intermingled with good and euill things. Therefore it is very hard to be able to discerne and separate them well one from another. For men being compounded of diuers natures, namely of a body and of a soule, they propound also a diuersity of good and euill things vnto themselves: and because they know corporall and terrestriall things better then spirituall and eternall things, therefore they preferre them oftentimes before the other. Which is the cause why there are so many that loue this life a great deale better, & those outward good things belonging thereunto, then they doe eternall life, and those goods, which are able to leade men thither, and giue them full fruition thereof when they come thither. Therefore in so great diuersity of good and euill things, it is no maruel if there came nothing into deliberation, wherein reason findeth not some good or euill, which in the end it counselleth vs to follow or to auoid, according to the circumstances of times, places, persons, qualities and other such like things. It commeth to passe also oftentimes, that Will refuseth all counsel & exhortation to do that only which shee pleaseth, thereby to shew that shee is Lady and Mistresse and subiect to none. And being mounted vp to that pride, shee accounteth this Lordship which shee taketh to her selfe to be a great good, and so maketh knowne her power and magnificence, as it were a tyrannicall Prince, making choise in the meane time of a false kinde of good, which is no way good, but a very great euill. And thus much concerning the liberty of the Will in her internall actions: which freedome also appeareth plainly enough in the outward actions. For after shee hath liked of a thing, shee may put it in execution, or stay execution: yea after shee hath begun, shee may giue it cleane ouer, or doe not so much, or so speedily as shee might. And although it falleth out oftentimes, that men are so hindered fro executing their Will, yea are forced and compelled to doe the cleane contrary, yet their Will, if we consider the matter well, is neither hindered, forced or constrained. For that keepeth it not from willing still that which it pleaseth: but the violence offered outwardly staieth the effectes and execution thereof. Hereof it is that we commonly say, that a mans Will is taken for his deede, although it be not put in execution. Now to conclude our speech, wee know that the Will hath hinderances to let her from choosing those good things which shee ought to follow, and refusing those euilles shee ought to eschewe and auoide.

For Reason being appointed as Mistresse, to guide and direct Will by her iudgement, the selfe same things that moue Reason and Iudgement, doe moue Will also, as if the one touched the other, or as if there were a certaine knitting and ioyning of them together, not vnlike to the linkes of a chaine, of which if yee moue or touch one, the like is done to the others that are neere vnto it by reason of the coniunction they haue one with another. We ought also to know, that although the Will often choose euill in stead of good, yet it ceaseth not therefore euer to desire good naturally, which is most fit & agreeable to the nature thereof: but it is deceiued in that it hath no skill to discerne betweene true and false goods, and to distinguish the greater from the lesse. And as we haue heard, that euill spirits may trouble and moue the fantasie and minde, so no doubt they can doe the like towards the heart and will, to inducethem to euill, and to driue them to doe greater things then weake nature would doe of it selfe, if it were not holpen by them, euen to cause them to commit such crimes as nature abhorreth. Therefore wee must without ceasing watch and pray that we enter not into temptation, and if we be tempted, that wee faile not, neither be overcome. And this we may assuredly beleue we shall obtaine, if through regeneration by the Spirit of God our minde be taught, and our will guyded by his light. Now then hauing spoken enough of Vnderstanding and of VWill, which are the principall powers of the soule, let vs come to the affections thereof: and first it shall be good for vs to consider of the distinction that ought to be made betwixt all these faculties of the soule, and betweene their seates and instruments, which they haue in the body. But wee shall learne these things of thee, ACHITOB.

ACHITOB. The heauens and the earth and all the elements, the stones, plants, beastes and all the other creatures that want reason and vnderstanding, obey God in their kind, but yet they know him not: and the obedience which they yeeld vnto him proceedeth not of any knowledge they haue of his will, or of iudgement in them to discerne good from euill, but onely so farre forth as they are drawne by their naturall inclination in those things that concerne their nature. But Angels and men, in whom God would haue his Image to shine in euery part of them, and after all sorts, were created by him of that nature, that he would be knowne of them, and that they should follow his Will, not without Vnderstanding and iudgement thereof, nor without agreement of their wils with his. Therefore hee hath given them a nature that is partaker of Vnderstanding, and prescribed vnto them rules of iudgement and of certaine knowledge, which are vnto them as it were lawes ordained by a soueraigne Prince for the ruling of his subiects. And to the end that these lawes should not be in vaine, he hath placed in man a Will to execute them, & an affection of ioy, that is brought to him by means of the good which he receiueth or expecteth, when he obeyeth these lawes that command nothing but iust things. So that he would haue the nature of man to leade a ioyfull life, and by this meanes be preserved, that hee might solace himselfe in the knowledge of God his Creator, and in obeying him, settle & rest himselfe in him. As contrariwise, it pleased him to place there an affection of sadness, to take vengeance of rebellion against his lawes, and of the transgression of them, to the end there might be a flame of anger and griefe to destroy that nature, when it doth not conforme it selfe to the rule of his diuine wisdom and will. Hereby we know by experience what difference is betweene a ioyfull life, and that which is sad and full of griefe, and how ioy preferueth and maintaineth the one, and sorrow consumeth and extinguisheth the other.

But to the end we may fully vnderstand these things, and bee able to iudge aright of the diuers powers, vertues and offices of the soule, we must diligently consider, that as GOD hath distinguished the Vnderstanding from the Will and affections, and the Animal vertue and life from the Vital, so also hee hath given them diuers Seates and Instruments in the bodie. There is likewise great difference betwixt Vnderstanding and Knowledge, and the Will and Affections, as we see it by experience in common life. For it falleth out often, that after we know a man, we either loue him or hate him. And if at the first we loued him well, yet after he is known vnto vs, we may fall to hate him: or if we first hated him, afterward vpon better knowledge we may receiue him into our loue. Now although these affections of loue and of hatred be thus mutable in vs, yet the selfe same knowledge remaineth alwayes with vs. For if we did not still know him, we could neither loue nor hate him: because as a man cannot loue without knowing the thing loued, so hee cannot hate that which is vnknowne. Therefore it is no difficult matter to iudge, that the Vnderstanding differeth from the Will and affections, and that they are distinct offices, and seuerall properties and vertues of the soule: which haue also their diuers Seates and instruments. For the internall senses are ioyned with that power which the soule hath to know: and the heart with the power of the Will and Affections. Heereof it is, that wee see many endued with great knowledge of honest and vertuous thinges, but they haue no good affection to follow after them and to put them in practise: so that their heart agreeth not with their braine, nor their will and affections with their vnderstanding and reason. Contrariwise, there are others that haue not so great knowledge of goodnesse and of their dutie, and yet they haue a good affection and will to doe well, but for want of vnderstanding what is right and iust, they obserue and keepe it not according to that measure of desire which is in them. Where wee see againe how and in what sort there is no good agreement betweene the braine and the heart, and betweene those powers and vertues of the soule, which wee haue already named. So that wee may compare the former sort of men to one that hath eyes to guide him, but no legges or feete to goe vpon, or if hee haue any, yet hee will not set them on worke. As for the other sort, they are like to blinde men that long to goe and to walke, and haue legges to carry them, but they cannot goe whither they would, because they haue neyther eyes nor sight to direct them, nor guides to leade them. Now by the consideration of these two sortes of men, wee may conclude and iudge with our selues, what they are, that want all these things mentioned by vs, because they haue neither founde knowledge of the truth and of that which is good, nor Will and desire to haue any, nor any affection to followe that which is good: whome I would compare to them that are blinde, and withall haue both hands and feete lame at one time. But this matter may yet bee vnderstoode better, if wee make this our speech to agree with that which Saint Paul writeth to the Romanes, where he sayeth, That the wrath of God is revealed from heauen against all vngodlinesse, and vnrightheousnesse of men, which withhold the truth in vnrightheousnesse. For wee may vnderstand by truth, those true and naturall impressions of the knowledge of God, and of his Lawe, and of the good and honest things which are in men as beames of the Diuine wisdom, shining in that part of the soule whereby hee knoweth. But because the Will and the affections of the heart agree not with this knowledge, and there are no diuine motions, nor celestially flames to stir vp and to kindle the heart with the loue of GOD, and to procure it to follow after that knowledge, therefore men are detained in vnrightheousnesse, and yeelde not vnto God that honour and obedience that they owe vnto him. VVherein they shew themselves vnthankfull and vnrightheous. And therefore the Apostle expounding himselfe sayeth by and by after, That when they knewe God, they glorified him not as God, neither were thankfull, but became vaine in their imagination, and their heart void of vnderstanding was full of darkenesse. VVhereby hee declareth, that their ingratitude and naughty heart was the cause why they abused that vnderstanding and knowledge which they had receiued of God, and afterward also hee deprived them of these excellent gifts of his grace, which hee attributeth to the heart for certaine reasons which we are to note. For we may see in many places of the Scripture, and in their writings and exhortations that follow the doctrine and stile thereof, that the heart is often taken for the seat of the minde, of the vnderstanding and of reason, as well as for the affections of the soule. Neuertherlesse the Philosophers and they that follow them in such discourses, attribute these soueraigne powers of the soule onely to the braine, which they make the seate of them, as we haue sufficiently shewed heretofore: and as for the affections of the soule, they assigne the seate of them to the heart. Now one body hath not two, but one soule. Therefore although it haue many faculties, powers, vertues, and offices, yet they are all comprehended vnder those two and depend of them, euen as in one body there are many members appointed to diuers operations. Now because reason ought to be the Gouvernesse and mistresse of the affections, it is necessary they should agree together. For as reason guideth before, the affections will followe after. Therefore wee may al-

verse 21.

alwayes iudge of reason by the affections which it ought to gouerne, as of the gouernment of a good Prince by the estate of his subiects, and of a good father of a family by those of his household. Moreover, seeing the affections proceede from the heart, there is a seat of that loue which we ought to beare as well towards God, as towards men, which comprehendeth the whole law of God and all iustice. For he that loueth God, is not onely afraide to offend and displease him, but desireth also to serue and please him: and he that loueth his neighbour, doeth not onely abstaine from procuring him any dishonour or losse, and labourerth also to advance his honour and profit. Therefore if the minde be lightened and inflamed with diuine light, and the reason also that ruleth therein, then the heart will waxe hote, and burne with the loue of God and of his neighbour. Which if it fall out so, the heart will not be slacke in shewing forth those heavenly motions that are within it, and giuing matter to the soule to glorifie God, and to the tongue and mouth, which will speake out of the abundance thereof. Likewise there will be an accord and consent betweene it, and the voice and tongue, which then will vtter nothing but the truth. And this is the cause of that which we are taught before, namely, that God by his providence and wise counsaile hath ioyned neere vnto the heart the chiefe instrument of the voice, which is the lunge: as the other instruments that are higher, are lodged neere to the braine, and chiefly the tongue, as the Oratours and Embassadors of Kings are placed next vnto them. Wherefore if mans nature had not bene corrupted through sinne, but had continued perfect and sound, there would alwayes haue bin a goodly concord and consent betweene the heart and the brain, the voice and the tongue, the reason and the affections. Next, we must note, that seeing the heart is the first member of the whole body that receiueth life, and then giueth the same to others, as also the last that leaueth life, and seeing it is the shop of all the vitall spirits, without which neither the braine nor the rest of the members can haue life, or performe their duties; it is not without cause, that this member is taken to be as it were the seate not onely of the affections, but also of reason. Therefore it is taken in the Scripture one while for the minde, as when Moses saith to the people of Israel, Yet the Lord hath not giuen you a heart to know: and another while it is taken for the affections, as when our Sauiour Christ saith, Thou shalt loue the Lord thy God with all thy soule, and with all thy minde. For we see heere how he putteth a difference betweene the heart and the minde. Sometime they are put indifferently one for another, or one for both, especially the heart, as when the Lord saide to Salomon, Behold I haue giuen thee a wise and an vnderstanding heart, the heart is taken for the senses and minde, as it appeareth very evidently. For the same cause Saint Paul continuing his speach of Gods punishment aboue mentioned, against the vngodlines and vnrighteousnesse of men, he addeth to that before recited, this saying: Wherefore also God gaue them vp to their hearts lusts, vnto vncleannesse, to defile their owne bodies betweene themselves, which turned the truth of God vnto a lie. In which place wee see how the Apostle maketh the heart to be the Seate of the appetites and of the affections, and how he calleth the vnruely and disordered affections of the heart by the name of lustes; for so he expoundeth himselfe by and by after, calling them Vile affections, vnto which God gaue them vp. Whereupon we wil note this, that the naturall affections of the heart, which pricke it forward to the desire of pleasure, and which minister pleasure vnto it, should bee no sinne at all vnto men, but a benefit giuen them of God in the perfection of their nature, were it not that by reason of the corruption which hath taken holde of it, such desires and affections can not containe themselves within the limites of their sound nature, but there is alwayes some excesse euen in the perfectest, and that being sinne, is properly called euill concupiscence, because it continually prouoketh vs to euill, and causeth vs to goe beyond the bounds which God had set to our affections. Whereof it is come to passe, that that which should be a benefit vnto men in naturall pleasures, is become hurtfull to them. Now forasmuch as the order of our discourses hath brought vs to the tractate of affections which haue their seat in the heart, before we goe any further, we must say somewhat of the nature of this part of the body, as we haue done of the braine, to the end we may the better know the seat and instruments of the vitall power and vertue of the soule, and of the will and affections, as those which belong to the animall power and vertue, haue bin declared vnto vs. Let vs then heare ASER handle this matter.

ASE R. It is not without good & iust cause, that God hath ordained that reason should lodge in the highest part of the frame of man, and that the will and affections should lodge lower, namely in the heart. For by this order hee would admonish and tell vs, what part and power of the soule ought to beare greatest sway therein, and that vnderstanding and wisdom, which teach vs the true rules according to which we must square our whole life, ought to reigne and haue the first place, seeing the principall cause wherefore God hath created vs, is to know him, to the end that knowing him we should loue and honour him as we ought: and as for the affections, they are to be guided and gouerned by wisdom & vnderstanding. Wherefore if this order appointed by God be confounded and turned topsie turuy in vs, he causeth vs to feeble and know it well enough. For although sinne bee the cause, yet the impression of that diuine image, which God hath set in the nature of man, cannot be so wholly defaced in vs, but there will alwaies remaine very euident and wonderfull testimonies thereof. And therefore presently after we haue ouerthrowne this order, and that the will listeth her selfe vp against reason, euen then doth reason condemne that fault of hers, and compelleth the heart to take vengeance thereof, and to punish in it selfe her disobedience and rebellion, with great torments and griefes: insomuch that either it must consume away and perish, or else returne to his due order and place; and the wil must know, that she hath a mistres, not onely to teach her, but also to correct her when she shall doe amisse, and peruert her order.

But let vs speake of that, which more particularly concerneth so wonderfull a part of the body, namely, the heart. First wee must remember how we diuided before the internal parts of the frame and building of man into three bellies and lodgings, of which the first, I meane the braine, was shewed vnto vs with all his parts. Now we will come to the second, which is in the middest betweene the other two, namely, in the breast, which containeth the vessels and instruments of the vitall facultie and vertue, and those are the heart, the arteries, the lungs, the rough artery, with the appurtenances thereof. Hereof it is that the name of the heart is oftentimes taken in the holy Scriptures for the middest, or for the inward and secret part of a thing, as when it speaketh of the heart of the earth and of the sea, and of the heauens. Now, as we haue heard how reason hath his throne and iudiciall seate in the braine, what ministers and what secretary he hath neere about him, and in what chambers & lodgings they are placed, and also what ministers and officers are ioyned with him for the execution of his iudgements and decrees, namely, the will and the affections: so also we must consider what manner of lodgings and habitations are assigned to these latter sort in the heart. And although these officers and ministers are not alwaies obedient to reason, but rise vp against it oftentimes, and doe cleane contrary to that which it iudgeth and appointeth to be done, yet by that order which God sette downe, they were to obey, and agree well amongst the selues, as he sheweth it by the disposition of their lodgings. We haue heard before that the heart and the lungs are lodged within the breast, as in a strong hold, and are compassed round about therewith for their safeguard and defence. But we must note, that there is a partition called Diaphragma by the Græcians, which separateth the instruments of the vitall parts, from the nourishing parts that are in the third belly and lodging of the body, of which we will speake hereafter in his order. This partition is aboue in respect of the naturall instruments appointed for nourishment, and beneath in regard of the spiritual instruments that serue the vitall parts. And because it is a great round muscle of the breast about the end of the neather part thereof, it hath two vses, of which the first and greatest is to be an instrument of breathing: the second is to helpe, to purge and expell the excrements of the body. Next to that there is a tunicle or skin which is very thin & slender, much like to a Spiders web, and is spread ouer the whole capacity of the breast, out of which two others proceed that diuide it throughout, to the end there might be two distinct places of receipt, that if a man had some great wound in one part thereof, whereby the office of respiration and breathing which it hath, should vtterly perish, yet the other part that is vnhurt, might at leastwise retain the one halfe. These skinnes serue also to couer and binde together all the vesselles and instruments contained within the breast: and the former of them, which hemmeth in the ribbes, serueth chiefly to defend the lungs on that side where it is ioyned to the bones of the ribbes, to the ende they should not touch the bare bones, when they execute their office, namely, when wee breathe. Concerning the heart, it hath for his next dwelling house a membrane or skinne called by the Græcians Pericardion, which signifieth as much as if in our language we should say in a worde, a compasse heart. And therefore this skinne is made of the same fashion the heart is, namely, very large and ample beneath, but afterward it narroweth by little and little, so that it endeth pointwise, being in proportion like to a pine apple or to a pyramide, which is the figure of a flame of fire. Wherby it seemeth that God hath made the heart of this fashion to admonish vs, that it is the place of that naturall fire which is in the body, and appointed to giue it so much naturall heate as is necessary for the life thereof. This skinne which is also called the little closet of the heart, is of such capacity, that it is seuered from the same on euery side as much as is requisite, that his motion might no wayes be impeached. Some thinke, that there is some water within this vessel, or some moisture like to a dew to water the heart, that it should not drie vp through the great heat that commeth of continuall motion, in which it is without ceasing. Now because this humour cannot be seene but onely in dead bodies, there be that thinke it is made there onely after death, through the exhalation and gathering together of the spirites, which are there dissolued. And indeede it seemeth to be a hard matter to know this by Anatomy, because it is not commonly practised but vpon dead bodies. And although a man would try the experiment vpon quicke and liuing bodies, yet they would bee alwaies dead before he should come to that part, or at leastwise there would be such a change and alteration, that it would be very hard for a man to giue a right iudgement. Neuerthelesse this might be knowne by cutting vp that part in some beast or other. For there is alwaies some moisture found there euen before it be stark dead, although indeed it cannot liue long after that part is opened. But let vs returne to that which we begun to speak of the heart, which being the roote and fountaine of naturall heate, disperseth it abroad by the arteries into the whole body, and giueth life to euery part thereof. For albeit the instruments of respiration serue the voice, yet they were created principally for the hearts sake, that the naturall heat which is in it, might be refreshed, increased and fed by them. For this cause hath the Diuine providence made the lungs to be as it were the forge and shop of respiration, to this ende, that the ayre without might be sent euen to the heart, for the causes and ends before spoken of. For the aire that is to be brought to the heart, is first prepared in the lungs, to the end it might moderate the heat of the heart & spirites, and not enter in thither, either too hot, or too cold, or in too great abundance, whereby it might be damnified or quite choaked vp. Therefore hath God made the flesh and substance of the lungs very light, soft and spungie, more then any other part of the body, so that it holdeth much of the nature of the aire, and that for two notable causes. For first, seeing the lungs haue not their motion of themselves, neither are fastened to the body to receiue the motion from it, it was needfull to haue them of such matter, that they might be easily mooued and follow the motion of the breast. Next, they will receiue the aire more easily without any violence, if at any time it enter in vehemently and in great quantitie. To conclude this point, they are so seated in regard of the heart, that they wrap it and cloth it both on the right side and on the left, and serue to defend it against all the neighbour bones neere about it.

But here we are to note the agreement and mutuall relation, which the heart hath with the heauens, in that as the first motion of the whole world beginneth by the heauens, of which all the other motions that are in nature doe depend, so the heart is that member in mans body, which first receiueh life and motion, and which is the well spring and fountaine thereof: whereupon also it is the first that liueth, and the last that dieth. And because God hath created it to put into it the vitall facultie and vertue from whence the life of liuing creatures proceedeth, hee hath also appointed the arteries, who receiuing their originall from the heart, are afterward distributed and spread throughout all the members of the body, as the sinewes and veines are, to giue vnto them aire and vitall spirites necessary for life, euen as the blood is likewise distributed by means of the veines that come from the liuer, to nourish them withall, and as sence and motion are caried by the sinewes that are deriued from the braine and marrowe of the backe bone, as wee haue already shewed. Therefore ore as the aire hath his motion, and the windes their course, even such as GOD hath appointed them in the whole body of this great world: so we see that the aire and vitall spirits are in mans body, which is the little world, as windes that haue their course and passages therein, to be carried vnto all the members, and to bee distributed and communicated vnto them by meanes of the arteries. Hereof it is that they heaue and beate in those places where arteries are appointed to be, so that by their peace and quietnesse, Physicians iudge of the vertue and strength of the heart, and consequently of the whole body, of health & sickness, of life and death, and of the whole position thereof. Therefore the heart hath a double motion to serue for this vse, which I speake, because it hath yet a third motion, and that of another nature, of which we will speake hereafter. But as for this first double motion which is here mentioned, it is so called because the one is made when the heart giueth out, and the other when it shrinketh in. For when it extendeth it selfe forth, then it is refreshed and cooled thereby, and when it gathereth inward and restraineth it selfe, then doth it expell and driue out those fuliginous and smokie excrements, which otherwise would stifle it. This twofold motion is naturall, proceeding from the proper nature of the heart, and not voluntary as that of the muscles, which is gouerned by the motion of the braine and sinewes that come from it. For the heart hath his filaments or small threedes, apt and conuenient for that purpose. Now this motion serueth not onely for the vses already spoken of, but also for the nourishing of the vitall spirit, I meane, to draw the blood wherewith it is nourished, and also to prepare foode for the lungs, thereby to returne such mutuall helpe vnto them as it receiue from them. For as the lungs serue to send breath vnto it, thereby to cool it and to further it in the execution of that office which it hath, so the heart serueth to nourish and feede the lungs. Whereby we haue a goodly aduertisement concerning that naturall agreement that ought to be in vs, and of that reciprocall helpe which wee owe one to another, and how wee ought to acknowledge the good turnes that are done vnto vs, and doe the like againe to them, according to that ability which every one shall haue so to doe. For if we deale not in that sort, it will be all one with vs in humane society, as if one should separate in our body the heart from the lungs, that the one might not doe his duty towards the other: which questionlesse would cause the death and overthrowe of the whole body.

Moreover, we must note, that betweene these two motions of the heart now spoken of, there is some small space, in which there is a little rest, and then doth the heart restrain it selfe and drawe from all sides round about the aire which is drawne in by the lungs, which it enioyeth and bath vfe of. And for this cause the Heart, whose flesh is hard and can hardly suffer, hath three kinds of filaments called Fibres, which serue for all these motions. Thus you see the heart that is Lord of mans life, how hee hangeth as it were in his coffer, and withdraweth himselfe into his chamber or closet, being in a manner separated from the rest of the body to which he giueth life, but onely that he is ioyned thereunto by veines, arteries, and sinewes, which he vseth as pipes, some to receiue the benefits that come vnto him from others, and some to distribute his good things by. Wherin we haue a faire resemblance of that mutuall communicating which ought to be among men. For although the heart be as the fountaine of life, which it imparteth to all the rest of the members and parts of the body, yet can it not liue alone, without those necessarie helps of the other members vnto which it is seruiceable. Now we are to consider the substance, situation, and counterpoize thereof, with the nature and vse of the vitall spirit: which shall be the matter subiect of thy discourse, A M A M A.

A M A N A. All men, how ignorant and brutish soeuer they be, cary about with them in their harts a great testimony, that they haue both a God and a Iudge, who approoueth that which is good, and punisheth the euill. For although they neuer heard one word of his word, yet they cannot be ignorant of this, which they sensibly feele and know by experience in themselves, that nothing but euill can befall them for euill; howsoeuer it bee long a comming, and that they cannot feele the euill which their sinne hath brought vpon them, but they will repent them for committing it, and wish it had neuer bin done. This is naturall diuinitie, which no body can be ignorant of. Wherunto S. Iohn leading vs, saith very well, 1 Iohn 3. 20. our heart condemne vs, God is greater then our heart, & knoweth all things. And we see that repentance ordinarily followeth sin, and that a sinner cannot but feele some heauinesse & griefe. Yea nature it selfe teacheth vs, when we are displeased for some thing wherof we repent vs, to strike our breast, because the heart is within it, as also to hang downe our eyes for shame. But the vexation, sadnesse & sorrow, which after the fault committed, a man is stricken with, because of the hurt that taketh holde of him, and the punishment he expecteth or endureth already, serueth not but for a continuall torment vnto him, as if he were in a hel, except hee change his mind, amend his fault & returne to God againe, and so betake himselfe againe to that place and order of his, which God had assigned him. Beholde what good instructions we haue in our selues, which ought to pricke vs forward to goodnesse, and drawe vs backe from wickednesse: especially our heart beareth vs certaine testimony of that which is acceptable in the sight of God.

Of the two void places in the heart, and of their vse.

What the vitall spirit is.

Of the great artery.

Now as wee haue heard, that the forme thereof is aptest for the motion it hath, so the substance & matter whereof it is made, is a kinde of flesh that hath none like it in all the other parts of the body. For it is needfull it should bee so thick and fast, that it may the better discharge that office and duty that is laid vpon the heart. On the other side, it is so seated in the breast, that the foundation and foote thereof is directly in the midst of it: but the narrow end of it bendeth somewhat towards the left side. Which is done in regard of two great commodities, wherof the one is, that it should not rush against the bones of the breast: the other that it should heate the left side the more, seeing the right side is holpen by the heate of the liuer, which is on that side. And although the left part of the heart bee very bigge, and hard, & consequently more heauy then the right, which is more subtile, thin and soft, and therefore lighter, neuerthelesse God hath giuen it such a counterpoize, that both sides are of equall waight: so that although there bee no ligament or band to tie it vnto the other parts that are neere about it, yet without inclining or bending any one way more then other, it hangeth in the midst of the vessell and skin that compasseth it round about. For the left part, which of it owne nature is heauiest, containeth in it a lighter matter, namely, the vital spirite; and the right side that is not so heauy hath in it a more heauy matter, which is the blood. Whereby we see how the providence of God hath so wel framed the counterpoise, that both parts are equall, like to an even and iust paire of ballance. From whence also wee may take a good lesson concerning the vprightnes that ought to be in our heart and will, and in all our affections, & with what heart we ought to follow the ordinances of God, and that way which he sheweth vs in his word, how we should continue & abide stedfast therein, and turne neither to the right hand nor the left, as we are often commanded in the holy Scriptures. Moreover, forasmuch as the skin that compasseth the heart, hath the bones of the breast on the one side, & the lungs on the other, it was requisit that it should be of a matter so wel tempered, that it might receive no harme by the hardnes of the bones & on the other side should not be so hard as to be able to hurt the lungs, which are of as soft & tender a flesh as any is in all the body. Which teacheth vs sufficiently, that the providence of God hath forgotten nothing in any respect. But wee must further know, that there are two capacities or hollow places in the heart distinguished one from another by a partition, the one being on the right side, the other on the left. That place on the right side serueth to receive the blood that cometh from the liuer to the heart by veines; both for the nourishing of it selfe & of the lungs and for the generation of the vitall spirits, whose forge and shop is in the other void place on the left side, where the heart doth exercise his chiefe office, which is to ingender the vitall spirits of the finest & thinnest blood, which resolueth it selfe there, as if it came of the sweat that proceeds out of the right capacity. Now the vital spirit is as it were a most bright & liuely flame, like to the celestiall nature, which carrieth heat & life to the whole body, and is the instrument of the chiefe actions & works therof. In this left hollow place there is a great artery, which is as it were the stock of all the arteries in the body, which a litle from the heart diuideth it selfe into two branches, wherof the one ascendeth vpward, to carry the vital spirit into the vpper parts of the body: the other, which is somewhat bigger, descendeth downward. By meanes of these arteries, which are as it were the pipes of the heart, the greatest benefit of all is communicated to all parts of the body.

Now because the arteries & veines haue need one of anothers help, they meet one another, and

and are so linked & ioyned together, that the arteries are seldome alone without the veines. For the arteries being ioyned vnto the veines doe giue them aire and spirit, which through the vitall heate stirreth the blood, and helpeth to bring it to perfection, and to preserue it. In like manner the arteries sucke some small quantity of blood out of the veines, whereby the vital spirit is carried, sprinkled, and increased. Wherein we haue againe a notable example and goodly patterne of that mutuall communicating, that ought to bee among men, without which neyther nature nor humane society can bee preserued: the like also hereof we see betweene the heart and the lungs, in which there are pipes that passe from the one to the other for their mutuall helping & succouring one of another. For the Arteriall veine, that proceedeth out of the right side of the heart, carrieth blood to the lungs to nourish it: and the veiny arterie, which commeth out of the left side of the heart, carrieth aire vnto it from the lungs to refresh it. For after it is brought to the lungs by the arterie or wind-pipe, the lungs communicate the same vnto the heart. Likewise by that same veiny artery, the ouer heated ayre and fumes are carried from the heart: and serueth besides to carrie the spirit and the arteriall blood vnto the lungs to heate them. Therefore this arterie is not altogether so thicke as the rest are, nor so thinne as the veines, to the end it may easily enlarge or straiten it selfe, or giue and receiue the ayre, & that through hardnes it hinder not the motion of the lungs, as also that the foggie blood may not euaporate & sweate through. For this cause it is called the veiny artery, because it holdeth of the nature both of an artery and of a veine, and hath this office belonging properly vnto it, to carry the ayre and the spirit.

An example

succour.

Of the veiny
artery.

There are also in the heart other small peeces, which Anatomists distinguish from it, as the two little eares, the right and the left, which are as it were little doores, as there is also in all the pipes thereof, which are so small, that vnneth may they be discerned by the eyes. These doores and pipes that are in them serue partly to this end, that when the heart sucketh such blood as is necessary for it selfe, the veine wherewith it draweth should not breake, through any ouergreat, vehement, and sodaine attraction: and partly, that the ayre might enter in more gently and better wrought, according as neede requireth. For this cause also it is, why the heart doeth not draw the ayre immediately from the mouth, both because if this space were not betweene, it could not draw so much as it wanteth, and so would bee choaked, as also because it should receiue it in too colde, wherupon it would be greatly hurt. Therefore it hath pipes, passages, and instruments, not onely to bring this ayre vnto it, as it is brought to the lungs, but also to dispence and prepare it as it is most conuenient for it, as we haue learned already by our speach of the rough artery, and of other instruments of the voyce and respiration. Out of which wee are to note two goodly points of the providence and wisdom, whereby he doth admonish vs of that moderation, which we ought to keepe in all things, and how we ought to bebaue our selues, not onely in one worke, but also in all things that we take in hand. For concerning the first, God hath provided alwaies throughout the whole worke of mans body in such sort, that there should be no violent thing, but hath so well framed, disposed and linked altogether, that no one part or member should receiue hurt of another, but all might helpe and support each other. Therefore if there bee any burthen to carry from one to another, God hath so distributed it by litle and litle, and by such conuenient meanes, that no part is pressed: teaching vs thereby, that he loueth moderation and hateth violence in all things: for which cause he dispenseth all & distributeth drop by drop, as it were by distillation. And to the end he may conioyne in one, things of a contrary nature, he alwayes placeth betweene two contraries things of a middle disposition which are most apt to tie them together and to keepe them. Besides, wee see how he hath ordered all the parts of the body so wel, that one onely member and instrument serueth oftentimes for many offices and vses, as we haue already touched it. The first is, that we ought to looke so well vnto all things, that wee neither forget nor omit any thing that shall bee requisite and necessary. The other, that we should imploy our selues about euery thing that we can and may do, according to those gifts and graces, which wee haue receiued of God, and that we should vse all things to euery such purpose as they will serue, and so auoid all vaine and superfluous charges. For (as it is commonly said) nothing is to be done by many things that can be performed by fewer: otherwise there will be more hinderance then helpe, and greater losse then profit. For this cause as God hath not given to the body one member lesse then there ought to bee, so he hath not given it one more. For if there were either more or lesse, it would not onely be monstrous, but there would bee eyther some want or some let and hinderance. And when as one member is able to satisfie two offices, he hath not created many to do it, if either profit or necessity required not the helpe of many. Whereupon gover-nours of Commonwealths ought to learne, that their people are not to be burthened with vnprofitable and vnecessary offices and persons. If therefore men would learne those lessons that God giueth them in their owne bodyes, and in the members thereof, they would alwaies keepe a meane in all things, following this heavenly example, and neuer offend either with too little or too much. But notwithstanding wee haue all Nature to be our Mistresse, so that she keepe a schoole within vs, and teach vs these things her selfe, yet wee profit little thereby. Now leauing this speech, seeing we haue taken a viewe of the nature of the body, and of the naturall motion thereof, which is commonly called the Pulse, and what vse it hath in this corporall life, as also of other things concerning this matter, it shall bee good for vs now to speake of another motion that is in the nature of the soule, which serueth not only for this life, but also for the spirituall, in respect of which especially it is giuen vnto it, an image and representation whereof wee haue had in this motion of which wee haue already spoken. It belongeth to thee ARAM, to discourse vpon this matter.

Of the second motion of the Heart, which belongeth to the affections of the Soule, and of those that goe before or follow after iudgement: of the agreement that is betweene the temperature of the body, and the affections of the Soule. Chap. 39

Man was created not onely to be, but also to be well.

ARAM. As God is not only an eternal & infinit essence, but also infinitely good & happy, so hath he not rested in giuing vnto his creatures life and being, as it were imparting to them some part of his being, but it hath pleased him also to make them partakers of that Good which is essentiall in him, and of his blessednesse and felicitie, according as every one was capable thereof in his kinde. For he will not onely haue them to be, but also to be well.
For this cause we see, that although men desire much to be, and therefore are greatly afraid of death, as of an enemy that seeketh to vndoe them, yet many times it falleth out so that they desire death, to the end they might be no more, because they thinke it a greater good or at leastwise a lesse euill to be no more, then to be miserable and vnhappy. And by this we may know, that man was not created of God onely to bee, neither was that his principall end, but also to be blessed. For this cause as God hath giuen to the creatures an inclination to preserue themselves in their life, to the end they might be, so he hath put into them, a naturall appetite and desire of that which is good, to the end they might be well, and that good might befall them, but man specially is thus affected: which desire of good is also ioyned with an eschewing of euill. For in the pursuite of good, his contrary, which is euill, must of necessitie be fled from. And of this naturall inclination to good proceede all those affections of the soule that draw it hither and thither to seeke for it: but because of her bad iudge-ment, proceeding of the darkenesse of ignorance which is in the minde, she chooseth oftentimes the cleane contrary to that which she desireth, as we haue already touched.

What the affections are.

We call then properly by the name of affections, the motions and acts of that naturall power of the soule, which consisteth in following after good, and eschewing of euill. For re-ceiuing of God in our first creation to be and to be well, we haue still some naturall seedes of the perfection of these two great gifts, which teach vs naturally, that it is a good thing for one to preserue himselfe and his being, as also to be well and happy in his being: but this is onely generally. For when we are to come from these generalities vnto particulars, there are wonderfull errors and disorders throughout the whole course of mans life. Now among the motions of the soule, some go before iudgement, others follow after: although oftentimes they are so sodaine and headstrong withall, that it appeareth plainly they haue shaken off the bridle, and neuer expected and stayed for any iudgement. Notwithstanding it is true, that the heart is not moued before there hath beene some iudgement to determine, whether that which is then offered vnto it be good or euill. But because the motions of our spirit and minde are very light and sodaine, and neede not so long time, as otherwise is requisite for vs if we will take good heed to our matters, hereof it is that they seeme to vs many times to preuent and go before iudgement giuen, when indeed they follow it. And as for those naturall motions, which in truth go before it, they are such as are bred and borne of the disposition of the body, as the desire to eate in hunger, and to drinke in thirst, and sorrow in time

time of sickness, or the motion of a melancholike humour, or ioy proceeding from good and pure blood in the heart. But the other motions follow the aduice of iudgement, and as that is mooued and changed diuersly by such meanes as haue already beene declared, so the affections alter, and increase or decrease, or otherwise vanish cleane away and come to nothing. Whereof it followeth, that they are appeased by the same meanes by which they are mooued, according as they are applied vnto them. But although it behooueth that the affections should bee pricked forward by iudgement, yet it followeth not thereupon, that they cannot be stirred vp, except this mature and ripe iudgement be alwaies there, which ordaineth things to be done after the discourse of reason. For it is enough for them if they haue another iudgement, that obserueth not such an exact and diligent examination, but onely that which fantasie offereth without any other discoursing. And this iudgement thus mooued by fantasie, is most vsuall and ordinary, and that which most guideth and ruleth the affections of men. Therefore it is a sodaine and tumultuous iudgement, of which a man may truly say, A short sentence of a fottishe Iudge. Thus fantasie beeing very turbulent and skittish, and drawing to it selfe confusedly some shew and apparance of opinion and iudgement, wherby it deemeth that which is offered vnto it to be either good or bad, is the cause that wee lye in the middest of marueilous troubles in respect of our affections of feare, of desire, of sorrow, of ioy, and that one while we weepe, and sodainly wee laugh againe. And because it hath great power over the body, as we haue already declared, these perturbations doe manifestly incline that way. We see also by experience, that there is great agreement betwene the qualities and temperature of the body, and the affections of the soule: in so much that as the bodies of men are compounded of the qualities of heate, colde, moisture, and drinesse, so among the affections some are hot, others colde; some moist, others dry, and some mingled of these diuers qualities. So that euery one is most subiect to those affections that come neere to the nature, temperature, and complexion of his body. As for example, the affection of ioy is hote and moist, and therefore they that are hot and moist, as children, young men, sound and healthy folkes, and idle persons, are more easily inclined to that affection. Contrariwise, sorrow is a cold and dry affection, and therefore they that are colde and drie are most giuen to that affection; and such are old folkes and they that are of a melancholy humour, which is earthy, cold and dry. For the like reason, they that haue a soft and tender heart, receiue more easily the impression of ioy & griefe, as waxe taketh the print of a seale: and they that haue a hard and hot heart, quickly receiue ioy and keepe it a long time. And on the other side, they that haue hard and cold hearts, receiue sorrow and griefe very soone, and retaine it long, as appeareth in melancholy and melancholike persons. And as the affections follow the temperature and complexion of the body, so they for their parts haue great vertue and power over the body. Therefore wee see, that ioy is as it were a medicine to the body: and foode to the naturall heate and moisture, in which two qualities life chiefly consisteth, as wee haue already heard. For it greatly preserueth and increaseth them: forasmuch as it strengtheneth the animall and naturall vertues, stirreth vp the spirits, helpeth digestion, and generally profiteth the habite and disposition of the whole body. For the heart thereby sendeth with the blood, much naturall heate, and more spirits vnto all parts of the body. By meanes whereof the members are watred and moistened by the humiditie contained in the fountaine of blood: whereupon it followeth, that all the parts increase in bignesse and waxe fat. For this cause Phisicians alwayes exhort sicke persons to bee as merry as they may, and to auoide sorrow and sadnesse, which beeing colde and dry is contrary to life, and so consumeth men. For it drieth vp the whole body, because the heart thereby is closed vp and restrained: so that no great quantitie of spirits can bee made there, and those few that are there, cannot easily bee distributed and dispersed with the blood throughout the members. Whereupon the vitall vertue and her companions beeing weakened, the liuely colour of the face waxeth wanne and pale, and in a manner vanisheth cleane away: and so consequently the whole body becommeth leane and consumeth, as if it tooke no nourishment, yea death oftentimes followeth thereupon. This agreement therefore, which is (as we see) betwene the temperature and complexion of the body, & the affections of the soule, ought to teach vs to be very temperate in our eating and drinking, and in all other things belonging to our life. For as wee are either temperate or intemperate, so wil the qualities be whereof our bodies are compounded: and so consequently according to the temperancie or intemperancie that is in vs, the affections of the soule also will bee more moderate or immoderate, and the perturbations which they shall bring with them, will be greater or lesse, and more easie or vneasie to bee pronoked or appeased. Whereby we might know what great agreement God hath made betweene the bodie and the soule. For notwithstanding their natures differ much one from another, yet seeing they must be linked together, it is necessary they should haue some agreement betweene them, to the end they may be conioyned and vnited in one. It is true, that by the reasons of humane Philosophie, we know well how the coniunction of corporal things and of their qualities, what contrariety so euer it is betweene them, may be effected and wrought. But as we cannot see or know our soule, or any spirituall nature, as we know our bodies and bodily natures, so can we not iudge so easily of the meanes whereby the body agreeth with the soule, and corporall natures with spirituall, but onely as experience and the effects giue vs some sight thereof. For we see by experience from whence the good or ill disposition of the body, and health and sicknesse proceede, namely, from the good or ill temperature of the qualities thereof. We see also, that according to the nourishment which the body taketh, and that sobriety or gluttony it vseth in eating and drinking, and according to the abstinencie or the effects it bringeth forth in all things, it is either better or worse affected and disposed. We see likewise the changes and alterations that befall it, according to the ages and exercises it hath. Wherefore although we had nothing else to looke vnto, but to maintaine and preserue our health, yet ought we to desire to be sober, moderate, and very temperate in all things, seeing moderation beareth so great sway in all the parts of mans life. But it ought to be more precious in our eyes, when we see that the temperance or intemperance that may be in our bodies, extendeth it selfe vnto the estate of our soule, and that it can do much either in the helping and maintaining, or in the hurting and troubling thereof. For we know already by experience, that which is of a cholericke nature, is more subiect to those diseases that are bredde of a cholericke humour, then a flegmatike person that is of a contrary temperature, and that a flegmatike body is most subiect to diseases proceeding of flegme. The like may be said of al the other qualities & complexions. If then euery one encline more to such diseases, as may proceede from those naturall qualities which abound most in his body, it is an easie matter to iudge, what is like to fall vpon him if they exceede, whereby they are encreased much more. And if that humour which naturally exceedeth most in a man (and of which his temperature and complexion hath his name) cause him to incline most to those diseases that may be bred thereof, a man may iudge into what disposition of body he may fall through excelsse of other qualities, which are more repugnant to his nature & complexion, if there be no such counterpoize and equalitie, that one contrary may serue as a remedy against another. But having considered of these things, we must goe forward and prosecute our speech of the affections of the soule, which are as it were health & sicknes therein according as they shal be either well or ill moderated, and see what conueniencie there is betweene corporall and spirituall phisicke. Finish therefore this dayes worke, ACHITO B, with some discourse vpon this point, which may serue to instruct vs in the matter of the affections of the soule, of which to morrow we are to intreate particularly and in order.

Of the Health and diseases of the soule: of the agreement betweene corporall and Spirituall Phisicke: how necessarie the knowledge of the nature of the body and of the soule, is for euery one. Chap. 40.

ACHITO B. It is alwayes in his power who hath giuen vs being, namely God the spring and fountaine of all essences, to preserue and keepe vs therein, and to take it also from vs when it pleaseth him. But forasmuch as he delighteth not in destroying the works which himselfe hath wrought, he hath giuen vnto his creatures certaine meanes to preserue themselves in that nature wherin hee created them. And that they might haue those meanes neere at hand, he hath placed them even in their owne nature. For they haue by nature an inclination, that moueth and vrgeth to keepe and defend theselues as much as they can possible, from euery thing that may corrupt their nature, that is contrary vnto it, or that wil bring to an end that beeing, which they haue receiued of God. But that which herein is most to be lamented in man, is his ouer great care and curiositie in searching out remedies meete for the maintenance and preseruatiō of his body, the least grieue and ill disposition whereof seemeth vnto him to be very burthensome: but as for thinking either vpon those meanes, whereby God hath appointed him to attaine, to an eternall and blessed life, or vpon the diseases

Diseases of the soule, which in stead of life will bring death vnto it, and farre more dangerous, Subborne, and vneasie to be cured then those of the body, hee dreameth little thereof, his care is very small, he esteemes them not great, and therefore is very slouthfull in seeking remedy for them.

We are to know then, that the affections of the soule are as it were health and sicknesse therein, according as they are eyther temperate or intemperate. For as there is no euill disposition or sicknesse in the bodie, but contrariwise good health, if there be not some excess in the qualities of which it is compounded, which may destroy that equality that is requisite for the keeping of it sound: so is it with the faculties, powers, qualities and affections of the soule, which according to her nature hath her health & diseases. Wherefore when the harmony, conueniency and temperature of her powers and affections, is such as her nature requireth, then is she well disposed and in health: as contrariwise she is ill affected and diseased when in place of temperance and mediocrity, there is intemperance and excess. Now according to that which wee heard in the speech of the conueniency betweene the temperature and complection of the body, and the affections of the soule, we see that a man of a cholerike nature is a great deale more easily stirred vp to anger, then an other that is of a flegmatike or melancholy nature. For facing the cholerike humour is by nature hot & burning, like to fire, that man in whom this humour reigneth is sooner inflamed with anger and wrath, then another that is of a contrary nature. For fire will more speedily kindle in a matter that commeth neerer to it owne nature, and of which it may more easily take hold, then in another that is more contrary to it. It is otherwise with flegmatike or melancholike men, according as the humours which rule in them, dispose and incline them more to be carried with one affection rather then with another. Therefore we see that they which are of a cholerike complection as they are of a more hot and dry nature: so their affections are more sodaine, burning and violent, like to fire. Flegmatike and melancholie persons as they are colder, so they are not so easily moued, but are more slow and heavy, and haue also other inclinations and other affections. And as they that are commonly said to be sanguine, are of the best temperature, so their affections are for the most part more cheerefull and more temperate. And as there are diuers mixtions of bodily qualities, so there are sundrie sorts of temperatures and complexions of the body, and consequently of soules in regarde of their faculties and affections. Therefore also there is great agreement betweene corporall and spirituall Physicke. For this cause the Physicians both of the bodies and soules of men are to follow almost one and the same methode, and obserue a like order in their arte and practise, every one according to the subiect propounded vnto them: inasomuch that look what the one doth vnto the body, the other is to deale so with the soule, such things being applied as best agree with their seuerall natures. VVherein they may further each others worke greatly, obseruing that end at which both of the aime, which to the one is the health of the body, and to the other the cure of the soule, considering that the one may helpe the other, as hath bene already touched. For if the body be not temperant, hardly will the soule be: and if the soule be intemperate, the body desireth not to be temperant. Therefore also we see, that not onely Physicians for the body appoint men diets, both for the preservation of their bodily health, and also for the recovery and restoring thereof againe, but also spirituall Physicians doe the like in regard of the soules health, so far forth as bodily sobriety will serue greatly to that purpose. For this cause not onely ordinary sobriety and moderation, which ought to be kept throughout the whole life of man, is so greatly recommended vnto vs in the holy scriptures, but fasts also, which beeing more strict abstinences, are very profitable, yea necessary oftentimes according to times, places and persons. For they serue to tame and humble the flesh, that it may be the better kept in, and lesse hinder the spirite, which thereby is the better inabled to attend to euery good worke, and to the contemplation of the diuine and celestially things. Therefore the people of God and holy men fasted often, whereof we haue many testimonies in the scriptures. And as it is necessary that bodily Physicians should know well the temperatures and complexions of mens bodies, and their natures, their health and diseases also with their conuenient and apt remedies, so is it needefull, that spirituall Physicians should know the nature of soules, of their faculties, powers and affections, and the natures of vertues, which are their health, and of vices, which are their diseases, together with those medicines and remedies that are necessary for the preservation and increase of vertues, and for the diminution and abolishing of vices. For without this knowledge, neither of them can be good Physicians; but it may bee feared, least they

But wee must yet draw more instruction out of this matter here offered vnto vs. For whatsoeuer hath beene hitherto spoken concerning the agreement betweene the temperature of the body, and the affections of the soule, or concerning the health and diseases of them both, or the knowledge, that is requisite in Phisicians to follow a good method in their art and practise for the healing of their patients, I say the vnderstanding of all these things is not onely necessary for the Phisicians both of soules and bodies, but euen for euery one of vs particularly. For if wee were all skillfull in the art of corporall Phisicke, I meane not such skill as is needefull for them that make publike profession thereof to all, but onely so much as is necessary for the preservation of our owne health, I doubt not but we might easily auoid many infirmities and diseases, whereinto wee fall daily for want of good diet, good gouernement, and the vse of those meanes, which might either retaine vs in health, or restore it quickly vnto vs, when it is somewhat altered or impeached. More-ouer we should haue this aduantage besides, if we fell into any disease: that we should know the better how to keepe and gouerne our selues more moderately and wisely, and obey the Phisicians counsell the better, because we should haue greater knowledge of that which we ought to doe, and of the danger whereinto we might fall, or which we might easily auoide.
Wee may say as much of the soules phisicke, the knowledge whereof is a great deale more necessary for vs, not onely because the soule is more noble and precious then the body, but also because it is a harder matter to know the nature and diseases of the soule, then of the body. And if we prooue so happy as to be able to comprehend any thing, wee shall know daily better and better what things are in vs of God, and what is his order, as also what there is of Satans, & what is that disorder & confusion, which by meanes of sin he hath brought into all things. For as sin is cause of that exces, which is in the qualities of which our bodies are made & consequently of the diseases that proceede fro thence, which afterward bring death to the body; so is it in respect of the soule, & of the excesse that is in the affections therof & in al the other parts of it, contrary to that nature in which God created the same. And as sin is the cause of disorder & confusion in both of them, so it is the cause that one helpeth to spoile another wheras there should be a pleasant harmony & concord, not only of the bodily qualities among themselves & so likewise of the qualities of the soule among themselves, but also of the qualities both of soule & body one with another. For GOD hath put, not only into our soules, but in to our bodies also the seedes of all the vertues, & the pricks & meanes to incite and to lead vs vnto the, in such maner & form as shal be declared hereafter. Although we may learne some what by that which we haue heard already of the coueniencie that is betweene the body & the soule, betweene the temperature of the one and the affections of the other. For if the one bee answerable and correspondent to the other, no doubt but God so disposeth of the temperatures and complexions of the body, as he hath disposed of the nature of the affections in the soule, seeing the one is to serue the other through that mutual agreement, which they ought to haue one with another. Now to morrow we will prosecute our speach begun concerning the affections of the soule, to the ende that wee may fully vnderstand this goodly and large matter, which may procure to the soule and body, both life and death.
And first, mee thinkes wee are to enter into the consideration of foure things, which are in the will and in the power to desire, that is in the soule, namely, naturall inclinations, actions, habites, and affections. This shall be then, ASER, the subiect of thy discourse.

ASER. All the actions of the soule are bred of the powers and faculties therof: and therefore by the benefit of nature, which is the gift of God, she hath receiued power for all things, which shee ought to doe. Now concerning the facultie of knowing in the soule, and in the vnderstanding part thereof, of which we haue intreated heretofore, we find three things worthy of diligent consideration, namely, naturall principles, actions, & habites gotten by long custome. Wee may remember those sundry degrees

grees, which we said were in the knowledge of the minde, and how by this faculty it doth not onely know simple and particular things as beastes doe, but also compoundeth and ioyneth them together: how it compareth one with another, separateth them and discourseth vpon them: finally how it iudgeth, and either approueth or refuseth them. All which things are actions of the minde, proceeding from those notices, and naturall principles of knowledge that are therein. Now if these actions be sodeine, and passe lightly, so that the mind doth not stay in them, nor acquaint it selfe with them, the bare & simple name of action belongeth to them. But if the minde doth one and the same thing often, museth much vpon it, calleth it often to memorie, and accustometh it selfe thereunto, so that it is in a manner imprinted in it, and thereby the minde becommeth prompt and ready in regard of the long continuance therein, then doe these actions take the name of habite, which is bred by the often repeating and reiterating of the same things. Whereby the mind is made more fit and apt to performe those exercises, vnto which they haue addicted themselves, and wherethey haue continued. So that such a habite is as it were a light in the spirit and in the soule, whereby the actions thereof are governed.

How habites
are bred in the minde.

In like manner we finde in the Will, and in that power of desiring, which is in the soule, foure things to be considered, namely, naturall inclinations, actions, habites, and affections which intermingle themselves in every one of the other. All these things are good of their owne nature, euen as nature it selfe, being considered as God hath created her. But as nature was corrupted through sinne, so is it with these things by reason of that disorder which the nature of sinne hath brought vnto them. But let vs first speake of naturall inclinations, and then we will prosecute the rest. As therefore the minde hath his natural principles of knowledge, so the will hath her natural inclinations and affections, which of their own nature are good, as they are taken from that first nature created of God: neither would they at any time be wicked, if there were no excelsse in them proceeding from nature corrupted, which afterwarde breedeth in vs such inclinations and affections as are altogether euill and damnable. We loue our selues naturally, our wiues, our children, our kinsfolkes, and our friends, yea wee are by nature so inclined to this loue, that if it were not in vs wee should not onely not be men, but not deserue so much as to be accounted and taken for beastes, no not for the wildest, most sauage and venemous beasts that can be. For we see by experience what great inclination and affection there is in every one of them towards their little ones. Therefore when S. Paul maketh a beadrill of the vices and sinnes of such men as are most vicious and execrable, and as it were monsters of nature, he saith expressly, that they are without naturall affection: which indeede cannot be cleane rooted out of any nature living, vnlesse it be altogether monstrous and vnnaturall: For it is an affection which is as it were a beame of the loue that God beareth towards all his creatures, and which he causeth to shine in them, so that it is not possible, that they which are capable of any affection of loue, should not loue their owne blood and their like, especially men. Wherefore if this loue and this affection were well ruled and ordered, it is so farre from being vicious, that contrariwise the spirit of God condemneth as monsters those men that want it. And therefore God doth not forbid and condemne his loue and affection in his Law, so farre forth as it is ruled thereby, but he approueth it, and appointeth it to be the rule of our loue towards our neighbour, when he saith, Thou shalt loue thy neighbour as thy selfe. But when this loue & affection is disordered in vs, it is not only vicious, but also as it were the original & fountaine of all other vices & sins, whereas if it were well ordered & ruled according to the wil and law of God, it would be as it were the originall and wel-spring of all vertues. For wee should not loue our selues but in God and through him, nor consequently our wiues, nor our children, nor our friends, nor any other creature whatsoever: whereas clean contrariwise, we set God aside, and seek nothing but our selues & the things of the world. Therefore this loue & affection being now so vnruely through sin, is so violent in vs, that it withdraweth vs from the loue of God and of his creatures, to loue the diuel & his wicked workes, because it seemeth to vs, that he is a greater friend vnto vs then God. For whereas the holy Spirit doth resist & set himselfe against our euill affections, & will haue vs to bridle them, Satan on the contrary part letteth them loose, & not onely giueth vs ouer to follow our peruerse & vicious affections with full sway & liberty, but also prouoketh & thrusteth vs forward with great vehemencie. Whereby we may iudge what loue and affection a man may carry towards creatures in those things wherein they may be contrary vnto him, and with what fury and rage he may be led against them that resist his disordered affections, seeing he carieth such an affection toward God his

Creator. Therefore S. Paul speaking of wicked men that should be in the latter times, sayeth first, That they should be selfe louers: and having set down this disordered loue as the roote, after he commeth to the branches & fruits of such a tree, saying, That they shall be couetous, boasters, proud, cursed speakers, disobedient to parents, without thankfull, unholy, without natural affection, truce breakers, false accusers, sinterperate, fierce, despisers of them that are good, traitors, heady, bie minded, louers of pleasures more then louers of God, hauing a shew of godlinesse, but denying the power thereof. And in the Epistle to the Romanes hee expreesly mentioneth haters of God. Thus wee see what the loue of men is towards themselves being left in the corruption of their nature, in respect of that which ought to be, if it were not vnruely and disordered. For man should loue himself as the gift of God, as also his life & being which God hath given him, and that blessed estate for the enioying of which he hath his being, and that Good wherein it consisteth, & wherby he may attaine vnto it, and should loue no other thing, nor otherwise. But the great excesse that is in the loue of our selues, causeth it to bee cleane contrary, both to that loue which ought naturally to bee in vs, and also to our loue towards God, so that it ouerthroweth & confoundeth all heauenly order, and the whole course of mans life. Neuertheles, when it so falleth out that this loue & affection is moderate in vs, although indeede it be neuer so as it ought to be according to the rule of Gods wil, yet are they acceptable in his sight, as our other natural affectiōs & friendships are, which we beare towards them that belong to vs: provided alwaies that they be ruled and guided by faith and true loue, and kindled with the flames of the holy Ghost, as they were in Zacharie and Elizabeth towards their son Iohn, and in so many other holy men, as haue loued both themselves and theirs according to God, wherof we haue a notable example in Abraham. For out of all question if ever father loued his children, he loued his son Isaac. But he shewed evidently by the effect, that he did not onely loue him with the loue of flesh & blood, as commonly wee loue our children, but he loued him also in God, towards whom yet his loue was far greater, seeing he was very ready to offer him vp in sacrifice vnto him, when hee so commanded it. But although this natural loue & affection be not so pure in vs as in these holy men, but that still there is mingled with it some thing of our own, because of sin, which we haue by inheritance, yet is it alwaies acceptable to God, so that he be first and chiefly loued. For through his mercy he beareth with our infirmitie which euermore accompanieth our desires and wills. As for those that are guided onely by the light of nature, and are no regenerated by the spirit of God, albeit these naturall affections are too vncleane in them, yet they doe not somuch displease him, as inhumanity and cruelty doe, that are cleane contrary to the other, & which doe vtterly dispossesse men of loue and charity. We may consider the same things in all the other naturall inclinations. For we see that some are by nature inclined to ciuill iustice, some to liberality, & others to such like vertues. Now if these inclinations be wel guided, they are goodly seeds of vertues, but if they be not wel ordered and ruled, they corrupt and degenerate, yea they turne into the vices that are contrarie to those vertues. For iustice which is neuer without moderation can be turned into ouer great rigour, or into cruelty, as we see it in many, who being naturally inclined to severity, which many times is very necessary in iustice, becomes so rigorous and extreame, that their severity, which ought to be vertue, is turned into cruelty. The like may be said of other inclinations and affections. Now that which befallerh these inclinations, is procured also vnto them by the humors and qualities of the body, which haue a certaine agreement with the affections. For a sanguine man, in whose nature blood beareth greatest sway amongst the other humours and qualities, will naturally be more inclined to loue, to ioy, to liberality, and to such other affections as are most agreeable to his nature. But if this complexion be not moderated and well guided, it will easily passe measure in every affection, so that it will fall into foolish and vnlawfull loues, into excessine and vnmeasurable ioyes, and into prodigality in steede of following liberality. The same may be said of all the other temperatures and complexions for their part, in that they may be seeds and prouocations, either to vertues or to vices, according to that correspondencie, which is between the bodies & the soule, and the temperature of the one with the affections of the other. Therefore we may well conclude, that as diseases ingender in the body of the humours that are in it, according to their change, mingling & corruption: so it fallerh out in the nature of the soule & in the affections therof. For as good natural humors become euil by corruption that seazeth vpon them, & turne that health which before they afforded into diseases, so the inclinations and naturall affections of our soule, which of their own nature are good & the seeds of vertues, are turned into vices & into their seeds, through that that corruption which sinne bringeth vnto them. Behold then what wee haue to consider of those naturall inclinations that are in the Will and in the desiring power of the soule, and of the actions thereof, namely to will and not to wil, and to suspend and stay her action, and to command ouer the power of the appetites, of all which we haue largely intreated in our discourse of the Will. Wherefore we will come to the Habites, of which thou shalt now discourse, A M A N A.

Of the Habite of the soule in the matter of the affections, and of what force it is: of the causes why the affections are given to the soule with the vse of them: of the fountaine of vertues and vices. Chap. 42.

A M A N A. If a man will learne an occupation, hee prooues not a workeman the first day, but learneth by little and little, and beginneth to labour therein: afterward by long continuance and custome he groweth more ready in his arte, and practiseth it with greater facilitie and ease. A painter waxeth expert in his science by often painting, and his hand wherewith he labourerh by long continuance becommeth more steady, more ready and able, so that he can handle his penicill with greater ease, & is far more expert therein then he was in the beginning. We may note the like in the soule, and in the chiefe powers & actions thereof. For there are some of them, which incontinently follow the nature of the faculties of the soule, when they haue their iust times, & are come, as a man would say, vnto their ripenesse, as we may see by experience in the corporall senses. For not long after the childe is borne he seeth and heareth, the reason whereof is because the senses of seeing and hearing are by nature absolute and perfect. Therefore in such actions there needeth no exercise to cause them to performe that which they doe well, but onely a good vigour and strength, because in them nature is a great Mistres that hath all efficacy. But there are far more excellent actions, as science, arte, prudence, fidelity, & such like, which had need of vse and exercise to cause them to doe readily and well. This vse bringeth custome, which hath in it a faculty to worke, and a disposition tending therunto. And then such actions take the name of Habite, which is bred by the reiterating.

Thus the actions of the Wil and power of desire in the soule, of which we haue spoken before, when they are often reiterated, so that they grow to bee firme and stedfast, are called habits, because the Wil is so accustomed therunto, that it becommeth more constant either in desiring one certaine thing, or in eschewing the same. Therefore as the affections are more or lesse forward, more seldome or often vsed, more weake or strong, so they are called eyther inclinations or actions, or habits. But we are to note, that habits extend not themselves only to those things which we doe, but also to those which we suffer and abide, which displease vs & are contrary to our nature. For custome diminisheth & moderateth by little and little the sense of that griefe & pain which they bring vs, wherof we haue trial in all diseases, which commonly seem not so grieuous & intolerable after we haue bin long accustomed vnto the, as in the beginning of the. And although pouerty be a heavy burthen, neuer thelesse custome maketh it familiar vnto vs, & familiarity causeth vs to think it lighter. Wherefore we ought not to maruel, if our God doth vsually send affliction to his children to acquaint the therewith, as also to the ende they might obtaine the vertue of patience, which is learned by often suffering: insomuch that there remaineth a habite in men, which beeing nothing els but a common custome, causeth them mildly to beare and sustaine all euent. Whereas there are some that like furious and desperate men are carried away with great impatience, eyther because they neuer suffered much before, or if they did suffer, yet they neuer accustomed themselves to beate their afflictions patiently. Moreover we know by experience, that although the way of vertue at our first entring thereinto, seeme vnto vs very difficult to tread in, yet afterward we finde it very easie, when we haue walked in it a certaine time. For there is no honest trade of life in which we finde not great difficulty. And the more excellent it is, so much the more troublesome and tedious it will seeme to our flesh, whereas the path of pleasure will seeme to be very delectable and easie, because it is a great deale more naturall to our corrupt nature. But how hard focuer it be to our flesh to follow after a vertuous, honest, and sober life, yet custome will make it easie to querpasse, as likewise to forsake that which is contrary vnto it. Therefore it hath not without iust cause bene giuen out long since by wise and skilfull men, that it is very good and profitable to bee accustomed med to good things, especially from ones infancy : that it skilleth much how every one hath bath beene brought vp from his youth : that nothing is of greater force then custome, eyther to good or to euill, as that which seemeth to bee an other nature. Now vpon this speech of Habites wee are to note further, that as all other naturall things in the soule are giuen vnto it for the good thereof, so is this habite, which is no other thing but a custome rooted therein. For except continuance of time did confirme this power of the soule, I meane, that it ought not onely to doe a thing, but to doe it well and as it ought to be done, that is, to get a facultie therein through vse and exercise, to the ende it may doe the same thing afterward more freely and readily, and bee more willing to occupy it selfe about the same thing, and that after the same manner, I say, except this be so, many inconueniences will ensue thereupon. The first is, that it should labour altogether in vaine. The second, that it should alwaies come rude and vnskillfull, as it were a newe prentice, to the exercising of these excellent actions and workes. VVhereof this would follow, that ha-ving profited nothing with the time, it would not doe any thing perfectly. And this wee ought not onely to vnderstand of those things we doe willingly, but euen of that which wee suffer and endure maugre our willes: wherewith of all other things wee had neede to bee best acquainted. For seeing we are compassed about daily with so many miseries, seeing we must suffer and vndergoe so many sharpe and vnworthy assaults, how much greater will our miserie be, if long custome and an habite in suffering should affoord vs no ease and refreshing? But let vs come now to that which particularly concerneth the affections of the soule, that wee may be fully instructed in the nature and sundry kindes of them. First, wee will note, that we vnderstand by affection that naturall power in the soule, which openeth it selfe towards Good, and withdraweth it selfe from euill, as wee haue already declared, before. Now when the actions of an affection are growne to bee habites, then are they called either vertues or vices, according as they are well or ill done. And from hence proceede good or ill manners, of which morall Philosophy tooke that name, because it in- treateth of them. For that sheweth what vertue and vice is, how many kindes there are of them, and what difference there is not onely betweene vertues and vices, but also be- tweene the sundry sorts of them, as wee haue discoursed at large in our first Academicall as- sembly. But let vs vnderstand this, that the knowledge of the soule and of the powers of it, about which we now labour, is the right spring-head and fountaine of that Morall Phi- losophy and doctrine. This knowledge therefore is very profitable and necessary, to the end that by it wee may know the originall and beginning of all vertues and vices, of their whole generation, and their sundry kindes. For if wee bee well instructed in all the parts and powers of the soule, we know the causes of these actions : wee know how the minde iudgeth, how the wil chooseth & commandeth as we haue already spoken. And thus we see, that there are most sure and certaine principles of knowledge, which shine in the mind as it were a light, which are the rules whereby the soule squareth out her actions, and which discern betweene trueth and falsehood, good and euill, to the ende that all the ac- tions thereof might agree with those rules, which are the beames of heauenly wisdom in our selues. For it is an order which God hath so ordained and established. And forasmuch as the soule was to dwell in the body, God gaue vnto it this naturall power of the affections, that it might be wakened and stirred vp by them as it were with prickles, thereby to be kept from idlenes, and from being lulled asleepe and oppressed with the heavines of the body, and so neglect all care of good things, and of that which is very expedient & profitable for it selfe. For this cause the soule hath her affections, of which some serue for spurs to prick her bi- ther and thither, and as often as neede requireth others serue for a bridle to keepe her backe and to stay her from rushing vnto euill, and from following those things that are hurtful for her. And indeed we stand in need of such spurs and bridles: but herein we erre greatly in that we know not how to keepe a moderation betweene these twaine. For because wee make these spurs too sharpe, and pricke the horse too much which wee haue to guide, the bri- dle on the other side is too grieuous vnto him, so that he listeth vp and girdeth forward over furiously. And this commeth to passe because we doe not content our selues with that which is requisite for the succouring of our naturall necessities, but we adde thereunto infi- nite superfluities. For vpon some light necessitie that might soone be dispatched, we tor- ment our selues a great deale more then need is, because we perswade our selues that our ne- cessities are greater then they be, & so seeke after more remedies & help then is requisite. Of this we haue daily experience in that care which we take for things necessary for this life, which

which is the cause that we burne continually with insatiable couetousnesse, which is such a marvellous spur vnto vs, that we take very little rest for it. For if we would bee contented with enough, it would not put vs to that torment, which we daily suffer. But nothing sufficeth vs: and therefore the affections are in our soule, as the windes vpon the sea. For some windes are very small, and mooue the water but a little: others are more vehement, & raise vp certaine waues: and some againe are so tempestuous, and make such horrible storms and gulses, whereby the Sea is so mooued, that sea and land and fish and all seeme to bee turned topsie turuie.

The affections compared to the windes.

The like may bee sayde of the motions of the soule. For some are so light, that they seeme to be nothing else but smal beginnings of moouing. There are others stronger, which mooue it somewhat more. And some also are so violent, that they altogether trouble the soule, euen in such a vehement manner, that they drive her from the seate of iudgement. Therefore these two first kindes of motions are properly called affections, and the other that are so violent are termed Commotions and Perturbations. For they bring a kind of blindness with them, which is the cause that iudgement and reason see neuer a whit. Whereupon it followeth, seeing neither Reason nor iudgement beare any more rule, that the Soule is as if shee had no more power ouer her selfe, but were subiect to the iurisdiction of some other. The Grecians terme such affections with a word that signifieth as much as it wee should say passions.

Of commotions and perturbations.

And in deede we commonly say, that a man is passionate, when he is tormented by such violent affections. For as the whole body suffereth when it is mooued, or thrust too and fro, and stricken on euery side: so is it with the Soule being violently mooued euery way. And as the moouing is more or lesse moderate, so she suffereth more or lesse: and if the motion be very violent, confusion followeth thereupon. Now for the sequelle of this speech, let vs consider how the affections are more or lesse moderate, according to the disposition of the iudgement: and what is the spring and originall of so many sundry affections, as wee see in men. It belongeth then to thee ARAM, to handle this matter.

That according to the disposition of the iudgement, the affections are more or lesse moderate or immoderate: of the cause of all the motions of the soule and heart: of the varietie of affections: of the generation, nature, and kindes of them. Chap. 43.

ARAM. Whatsoeuer we doe or wish for, we doe or desire it for some Good, whether that which we iudge to be good be so in truth, or in opinion only. And therein we resemble God our Creator, who is not onely good, but also goodnesse it selfe, euen the perfection of all Good. Wherefore if we desire to know what is the true Good, we must vnderstand, that there is but one onely true Good, euen the same, by participation of which we are first made good, and then of good, most happy. For we cannot be happy and blessed, which is the end wee all looke for, but we must first become good. For as there is no true felicitie and blessednes but in Good, being the source and fountaine, yea the perfection of all happines and contentation, so also there is no felicity nor blessednes but in goodnes, which is as proper to God as his very diuinitie: because that as he cannot be God except he bee good, so he cannot bee good with that goodnesse that is in him, but he must be God. And as he is the essence of all essences, so he is the essential Good, and the essential Goodnes of all Goods & of all Goodnesses. But although our nature doth of it selfe alwaies tend to that which is Good, as we haue shewed in the handling of the chiefe powers of the soule, Vnderstanding and Will, neuerthelesse wee differ much, nay we are clean contrary to GOD, when we come to the election of Good, because of the bad iudgement we haue, by reason of the darknesse of ignorance wherewith our mindes are blinded.

Hereof it commeth, that the more the iudgement is corrupted, infected and deeper plunged in the flesh, the more euill and carnall are the affections, the more in number and the more violent: yea such as doe not onely trouble and peruert the internall senses of the soule, but the externall senses also of the body. This we may obserue in them that are caried away with loue, who thinke oftentimes, and are verily perswaded, that they see and heare those things, which indeede are nothing so. Contrariwise, the purer the iudgement is, and the higher it is lifted vp from the flesh and from the earth, the fewer and lighter are the affections which trouble and molest it. For the more it taketh greater heede and marketh what trueth or what falsehood, what good or what euill there is in all things. VVhereupon it commeth to passe, that the iudgement is not so often nor so easily moued. And when it is moued, it is not so violent nor headie, but more mature and moderate. For all great, violent, and turbulent motions proceede of ignorance and inconsideratenesse, or through a false perwasion, which maketh vs to thinke, that the Good or Euill is greater then indeed it is. And this commeth for want of experience, which beeing as it were a darke cloude and mist before the eyes of our minde, doe greatly trouble it: insomuch that wee ayme not at that certaine Good, after which wee ought to seeke, but contrariwise wee propounde to our selues many sortes of Goods, with many and sundry endes and meanes to attaine vnto them, which we change and rechange from houre to houre, very inconstantly according to places, times and occasions, whereby it is euident that there is no stayednesse in vs. Besides all this, there is another great mischiefe, namely that we haue not that prudence which beastes haue by naturall instinct onely without reason or iudgement, whereby to know how wee may keep our selues from those tempests, which our affections may moue in vs. For when beastes perceiue any tempest comming, they sodainly withdraw themselves, and seeke for meanes to auoyde it. And they that sayle one the Sea, foreseeing the tempestuous stormes which threaten them, prouide thereafter in goodtime, least they should bee carried away thence with. For otherwise they bring themselves within the compasse of this danger, that afterward they cannot be Masters of their Shippe neither arriue at their desired haven, but rather hazard the breaking of their Shippe against some rocke, or of sticking fast in some sande, or of being swallowed vp and overwhelmed with some whirlwindes and tempests. The like may bee said of the motions of the soule made by affections. For there are not so many sorts of windes, whirlwindes, or tempests in the Sea, as there is varietie of motions that come from the affections in our hearts. Therefore wee ought to bee very carefull that when wee see and perceiue any beginnings in our soules, wee straightwaies giue not our selues ouer into the power and swinge of our affections. But wee are so farre from looking to this, that wee throwe our selues into the midst of the tempest, that it may carry vs, not whither wee would, but whither that will. For seeing wee enterprise our affaires, not by the appointment and decree of an vpriight iudgement directed by reason, but at the iudgement and lust of our corrupt and crooked nature, wee are so much moued as our nature hath power. For naturall actions are not bounded by our will, but extend themselves as farre as the power and vertue thereof is able to permit. But it is cleane contrary with a prudent and wise man. For hee is not deceiued in the election and choise of that which is good, because hee chooseth with good iudgement, and propoundeth not to himselfe many vncertaine Goods, but one onely, which is the true and certaine Good. Likewise hee chooseth not many wayes and meanes to come vnto it, but a few that are well sifted out, and infallible: besides, he is not gouerned by his affaires and affections, but gouerneth them, neither giueth himselfe ouer into their power, but abideth alwaies in his own: insomuch that if any affection heginne to moue by vertue of his naturall inclinations, hee presently stayeth it, compelling it to giue place and to obey, right iudgement. Thus much generally of the nature of affections: now it remaineth, that wee should say something of the number and variety of them. Surely it is very difficult yea impossible to set downe a certaine number of an infinite thing: although indeede the number of the affections is not infinit by nature, but onely in regard of vs, that cannot comprehend them all. But we will reckon vp the chiefest of them, which are the fountaine of the rest.

Heere then wee haue first to note, that all motions of the soule are in regard of some good which they seeke, or of some euill which they would auoide, because it is contrary to that good. Therefore euery motion of it selfe tendeth alwayes to that which is good, or withdraweth it selfe from euill, or else setteth it selfe against it, as we haue already heard in the handling of Will. Now euery good, and euery euill, is eyther present, or to come, or past, eyther possible or impossible. And as we take the absence of euill for a good, so wee iudge the absence of good to bee an euill. For this cause the Diuines make two kinds of paine or punishment, whereof the first is the paine of losse and dammage, and the other is the paine of sense and feeling. By the first they vnderstand that paine which a man hath because hee wanteth some good that hee should and would haue. For men account it damage, to lose that profite, which they ought to haue. By the second they vnderstand that paine which is felt, not only when some good is wanting, which a man should or would haue, but when some euill is present, that is contrary to this good, which men fee by effect. Therefore they say that the paine of the losse and damage, is the priuation of the ioyes of Paradise. For although there were no torments of hell for the wicked, but onely a priuation of that eternall life and happinesse, for the which man was created of GOD, yet were this no small punishment to be depriued thereof. But there is a great deale more, when the wicked are not onely depriued of a blessed life, but besides that are detained in perpetuall torments, as a malefactor that doeth not onely want good company, but is withall kept in perpetuall prison and torture. But let vs proceede with our matter.

Of the generation, nature & kinds of the affections.

When any good is propounded, so soone as euer the soule and minde knoweth it, it is well liked of. And this liking or delight is as it were a little pleasant winde of motion in the heart, which beginneth to arise and to follow after this good. Now when this pleasure and liking is confirmed and waxeth strong, it is turned into loue. And the motion of that present Good, which wee haue already gotten is called ioy: and the motion of some Good to come is called Desire, which is inclosed within the bounds of loue. If the matter bee of some euill, it is called offence, because the soule is offended thereby: and therefore shee is displeased therewith and disliketh it, whereas shee is well pleased with Good. If this displeasure or dislike be confirmed, it is turned into hatred. And as griefe is for some present euill, so is feare of some euill to come. The motion against a present euill, is anger, enuy, indignation: and against an euill to come, is confidence and boldnesse. Now all these affections haue others vnder them. For fauour, reuerence, and mercy are comprised vnder loue, delight vnder ioy, hope vnder desire, and desire vnder griefe. As for pride, it is a monster compounded of diuers affections, as of ioy, of desire, and of boldnesse. And as the affections are quickly bred one of another, so some of them are bridled & restrained by others. For the first, enuy, hatred and anger spring of loue. For they are motions of the heart that loueth, against him that hateth or hurteth her who is deere or beloved. And desire riseth of reuenge, and the ioy that commeth thereby, procedes from anger and malace. If a man loue any thing, hee wisheth it would come, and hopeth also that hee shall enioy it: and contrariwise, hee feareth that it will not come to passe. If it come to passe, he reioyceth. If it come not to passe when he thinketh it will, or when he expecteth it, he is grieved. In like manner, great ioy is lessened through griefe, and enuy through mercy, or through feare. And one griefe altereth another, when it is greater: and feare maketh griefe to be forgotten, and causeth the lame to runne. To bee short, these sundry motions of affections are like to stormy waues and billowes, which beeing driuen one of another, doe either augment, or diminish, or wholly oppresse one another. VVherefore the like happeneth in the motion of our affections, that commeth to passe in a sedition and ciuill dissension, in which no man considereth who is the worthier person to obey and follow him, but who is the stronger and most mightie. So in the sight of the affections there is no respect had to that which is most iust, but onely to that which is strongest and most violent, and which hath gotten such power ouer the soule that it hath wholly subdued her to it selfe which thing we ought to stand in great feare of. But whatsoeuer affections are in vs, there is alwaies some griefe or some ioy ioyned with them. Therefore following our matter, it shall be good for vs to consider particularly of the nature of these two contrary motions, of which, ioy serueth greatly for the preseruatiō of life, but griefe drieth vp and consumeth the heart, euen vnto the death of it, as we shall now learne of ACHITOB.

How the affections are bred or bridled one of another.

Good similitudes.

That Ioy, or Griefe are alwaies ioyned to the affections: and what Ioy and Griefe are properly, Chap. 44.

ACHITOB, The knowledge of the Affections of the heart and soule is very necessary for euery onery one, because they are very euil and dangerous diseases in the soule, but yet being known they may be cured more easily. This cause hath moued vs, after we haue spoken of the heart and of the naturall motion thereof, & of the vse it hath in this life of the body, to enter into the consideration of a second motion it hath, which serueth not onely for this corporall life, but also for that spirituall life, in regard of which it was chiefly giuen, and of which wee said, that there was as it were an image and representation thereof in the first motion. Now we shall better vnderstand this by the subiect of this discourse

The first motion of the heart is an image of the propounded second.

ded vnto vs, being handled particularly as we intend to doe. For as by the first naturall motion of the heart, it receiueth such refreshing as is necessary for the sending of life vnto the whole body, and for the maintenance and preservation of the same, as also for the expelling and driving out of all such things as might hurt and stifle it: even so is it in this second motion, as farre as wee can conceiue of the nature of it. For seeing God hath appointed ioy as a meanes to preserve life, hee hath likewise put this affection in the heart, whereby it is as it were enlarged to receiue within it selfe, and to imbrace all Good that is offered vnto it: as also it restraineth and shutteth it selfe vp through griefe which is contrary thereunto.

Griefe or Ioy
in all the affections.

Moreover we shall finde, that there is no affection in vs, which is not intermingled with some griefe or else with some ioy. For seeing the heart is the proper seate and instrument of all the affections, when it is as it were stricken and beaten with some vnpleasant thing that is offered vnto it, then doth it retire, close vp it selfe & feele griefe, as if it had receiued a wound, then doth it flie from the thing it liketh not. Yea the heart doth alwaies either enlarge or shut vp it selfe according to those affections that are within it, the causes of which are in it owne nature, GOD hauing so disposed and willed the same, for the reasons which we haue haue already touched. For if the heart be ioyful, the ioy that it hath, doth bring so great pleasure vnto it, that thereby it is opened and enlarged, as if it would receiue, imbrace, and lay hold vpon that thing which reioyceth it, and bringeth vnto it that pleasure, which it hath in this ioy. Now because there is ioy in loue and hope, the blood & spirits are gently & mildly dispersed by their moouings, by reason of the reioycing at the Good that is present, or that is expected, as if it were already present. And forasmuch as such motions are made by the enlarging of the heart, wherby we imbrace the thing offered vnto vs, the face also appeareth smiling, cheerefull, and ruddy. For a man may easily iudge, that the obiekt presented to the heart, mooueth that power wherby it is stirred vp, because that before the heart doth moue it selfe, it must know the thing that offereth occasion vnto it to be mooued, either with ioy or griefe, or some such like affection. For as we haue learned already, the outward senses doe first perceiue the things that are offered vnto them, and then they present them vnto the common sense, which presently by a singular providence of God sendeth them to all the other senses, and to all those powers that are in the sundry parts of the soule and body. This done, if there be matter of ioy, the heart being stricken with that which is acceptable vnto it, enlargeth it selfe, and being thus gently enlarged, as it were to embrace the same, it disperseth much naturall heate with the blood, besides great quantity of spirits, of which it sendeth a good portion to the face, if the ioy bee so great that it mooueth a man to hearty laughter. For the face it selfe is in some sort blowen vp and enlarged: the forehead is made cleere and smoothe, the eyes glister and shine, the cheekes become ruddy, and the lippes gather in themselves. In a word, the heart doth so enlarge it selfe, that it is represented in the face, as it were in a glasse, or in an image framed to expresse the ioy and gladnesse which it hath.

The effects of
the face.

Moreover, experience teacheth vs sufficiently, what difference there is betweene a cheerefull and a sad countenance. Therefore when we loue one, we embrace him as if we would ioine him to our selues, & put him into our bosome & heart, as some deere and very pretious thing. Which we see chiefly in mothers, when they hold their little infants betweene their armes, and embrace them with great affection of the heart. For this cause Saint Paul being desirous to let the Corinthians vnderstand what good will hee bare them, how louing, ready & cheerefull his affection was towards them, what ioy he receiued thereby, as him selfe speaking plainly doth with his mouth giue full testimony of his hart, writeth thus vnto them, O Corinthians, our mouth is open vnto you: our heart is made large: you are not kept strait in vs. And then complaining of them that their heart was not so bent towards him, he saith: But yee are kept strait in your owne bowels. And here wee may note, that by this word what is meant by bowels in the Scripture.

Bowels is meant generally all the internall members and parts of man, especially the heart, and those that are next vnto it. Now because the heart is the seate of the affections, and the other members neere vnto it serue for his vse, therefore the bowels are taken in the holy Scriptures for all the motions of the heart, & for all the affections of men that proceed from it, but chiefly for loue; also for ioy, pitie and compassion, which haue their beginning from loue, whose nature is to open the hart: which in steade of opening shutteth vp it selfe against those that are not loued, or that a man hateth. Therefore as loue or hatred is great or small, hot or cold, so doth the heart open or close it selfe. Hereof it is said in the history of the two women that stood before Salomons iudgement seat about their two children, whereof the one was dead and the other alive, that the bowels of the true mother were mooved towards her childe.

And Saint Paul exhorting the Colossians to charity and compassion, saith, Now therefore, as the elect of God, holy and beloved put on the bowels of mercy (that is to say of tender affection) kindnesse, humblenesse of minde, meekenesse, long suffering: forbearing one another, forgiving one another, if any man have a quarrell to another: even as Christ forgave you, so doe ye. And above all these things put on loue, which is the bond of perfectnesse: and let the peace of God (namely that which God hath established among his) rule in your hearts, to the which ye are called in one body, and be gracious, or amiable. VVe see heere what vertues accompany these bowels of mercie, of which he spake in the beginning, as in deed all these vertues and heavenly gifts are so knit together, that they cannot be separated one from another. And Saint John speaking of that liberalitie and loue, which ought to be among Christians, sayth, Whosoever hath this worlds good, and seeth his brother have neede, and shutteth up his bowels from him, how dwelleth the loue of God in him? Then he addeth, Let vs not loue in word, neither in tongue onely, but in worke and in truth. And to this purpose Esaias saith, If thou powre out thy soule to be hungry, and refresh the troubled soule, then shall thy light spring out of darkenesse, and thy darkenesse shall be as the noone-day. All which places agree very well to that which we have touched concerning the motion of the heart, whereby it is either opened or closed vp, as the affections are disposed that moue it. But let vs consider more narrowly the nature of these affections of ioy and sorrow, and what difference is betweene them, seeing we have taken them for the ground of our speach. For the first, let vs know, that ioy is properly a motion or an affection of the heart, whereby it taketh pleasure and stayeth it selfe in that Good, which is offered vnto it: or if we had rather thus, it is a motion of the soule, proceeding from the iudgement of some Good, which is already present, or certainly neere at hand. And therefore when the heart is enlarged therewith, not onely laughter is bred, but all the body also leapech when the ioy is so great that the breast cannot containe nor keepe in the heart. But when the ioy is moderate, it purgeth the blood by heate, it confirmeth health, and bringeth with it a lively and vigorous heate, which is very wholsome and acceptable to the heart. True it is, that the heart and will often deceiue themselves in the choice and election of that which is Good: whether it be that following reason and iudgment, corrupted, which should shew what is Good, they embrace their error: or whether it bee that VVill being corrupted of it selfe through sinne, letteth loose the bridle against the iudgement of reason, and so suffereth her selfe to bee carried headlong by her euill affections, in following some false shewe of good. VVhereupon it commonly commeth to passe, that in steade of ioy which the heart should receiue of Good, vnto which the will tendeth naturally, it receiveth great sorrow and griefe after knowledge taken of the fault. This is the cause why wee are so often admonished by the spirit of God, to renounce our owne sence, reason, prudence, and wisdom, to submit our selues wholly to the counsaile and wisdom of God, and to iudge of good and of euill, of the true and false Goods according to his iudgement, and not according to our own: as also to renounce our owne desires to follow his will. As for griefe or sorrow, wee may iudge of this affection by the contrary, which is ioy, namely, that it is a motion and an affection of the heart, whereby it is restrained and pressed either with some present euill, or with some that is in a manner present: which displeaseth the heart as if it had receiued some grievous wound. Therefore it trembleth and languisheth, as a sicke body, who drying vp with griefe by little & little, in the end dieth, except he haue some remedy against his sickness. For the like happeneth to the heart of man through griefe as long as it is within it, in so much that it neuer forsaketh it, vntill it hath quiet dried vp and consumed the same. And therefore as there is pleasure and rest in ioy, so in sorrow there is a dolour & torment. For it ingendreth melancholy, & melancholy ingendreth it, & increaseth it more, so that we ofte see melancholy me very sadde, although no harme hath befallen the, neither can they giue any reason of their heavines. Moreover, this blacke melancholy humour is of this nature that it will make the spirit & mind darkish, whereby it groweth to be blockish, & the heart loseth all his cheerefulness. And because the braine is cooled thereby, it waxeth very heavy & drowsie. Now when griefe is in great measure, it bringeth withall a kinde of loathing & tediousnes, which causeth a man to hate & to be weary of all things, euen of the light & of a mans selfe so that he shal take pleasure in nothing but in his melancholy, in feeding himselfe therewithall, in plunging himselfe deeper into it, & refusing all ioy & consolation. To conclude, some grow so far as to hate themselves, & so fall to despaire, yea many kil & destroy themselves. And as the heart by enlarging it selfe with ioy appeareth in the countenance, so doth it also in sorrow and griefe. For as in sorrow the heart drieth vp and gathereth it selfe in, so it causeth the face, which is the image of it, to retire and draw backe, yea it deprieth the face of all colour, & causeth it to fall away. Briefly, it marreth all health, and hath for continuall companions, sighs, plaints, groanes, teares, and weeping, and oftentimes gnashing of teeth, as it is written of the damned, because of that sorrow & indignation in which they are, by reason of the torments which they suffer. It is true that the most of these things serue as a remedy against sorrow. For howsoever griefe shutteth vp the heart as we haue said, yet by groning, sighing and weeping the heart doth in some sort open it selfe, as if it would come forth to breathe, least being wholly shut vp with sorrow it should be stifled. Again, teares are giuen vnto vs to testifie our griefe & to manifest it to others, that we may moue them to haue pity and compassion on vs, and to helpe & succour vs. They serue vs further to declare what compassion wee haue of other mens sorrow and griefe, which vse is very necessary for vs to get and preferue friendship one towards another, & for our mutual comfort & consolation. For we are greatly comforted, when we see any take pittie and compassion of vs. Wherefore when we can not otherwise solace them that are grieued, but onely by declaring that we are sorrowfull for their heauinesse, and for those euills which they suffer, yet doth that afforde great consolation. And although it seemeth an easie matter to giue this comfort, yet is it harder then many thinke it is. For before we can finde this in vs, wee must first haue loue in our hearts, which causeth vs to open our bowels, & moueth vs to compassion towards our like, that we may weepe with them that weepe, as we must reioyce also with them that reioyce according as Saint Paul exhorteth vs therunto. For by this meanes we testifie that vniõ & coniunction which we haue one with another, as members of one and the same body, and as if we felt in our selues all that good and euill which others feele. Now because in our definition of those affections ioy and griefe, we made two sorts of those that men feele in their hearts, namely, either of that good and euill which is present, or of that which they look for, we must consider more particularly of these things, and see first, why God hath put these affections in the soule, and what is true and present ioy, as also what that other kinde of ioy is, which hath regard to that which is to come, which is properly called Hope. Now let vs heare thec, A S E R, vpon this matter.

Of the causes why God hath placed these affections of Ioy and Sorrow in the heart: of true and false Ioy, and of good and bad Hope. Chap. 45.

A com pari-
son.

A S E R. Men haue commonly sharpe wits to know vaine, earthly and carnall things: but as for heauenly, true and eternall things, they are able for the most part to vnderstand nothing. So that wee may compare the eyes of their soule to the eyes of an Owle, which seeth clearly by night, but when the Sunne is risen, seeth neuer a whit. Euen so man hath some knowledge of the troublesome things of this world, but his sight cannot pierce into the celestiall and diuine light. Therefore it falleth out often, that being beguiled by his owne sense and reason, in stead of Good and of Ioy, he chuseth and followeth after that which is euill and full of griefe. For when the affection of the heart, which naturally desireth Good and seeketh after ioy, is misled and deceiued by humane reason, it easily embraceth euill in place of Good, and that vnder some vaine shew of good, which seemeth to be in that euill thing it chuseth. And although at the first the heart feeleth not that which happeneth vnto it, yet hath it leisure enough after to complaine of the torment which is alwaies equall both for age and time, to the fault committed, and to the abuse of those gifts and graces which God hath placed in the nature of the soule.

Forasmuch then as the heart is the beginning of life, we may well know, that God hath not without good cause placed therein such vehement affections of ioy & griefe, which serue either to preferue or to destroy it, and haue for their companions hope and feare, as we will declare hereafter. For by these affections God would giue vs pricks & solicitors, to cause vs to thinke seriously of that lesson, which Dauid giueth vs, when he saith, Taste yee and see how gracious the Lord is: blessed is the man that trusteth in him. Feare the Lord yee his Saints: for nothing wanteth to them that feare him. The Lyons doe lacke and suffer hunger, but they which seeke the Lord shall want nothing that is good. What man is he that desireth life, and loueth long dayes for to see good? Keepe thy tongue from euill, and by lippes that they speake no guile. Es- chew euill and doe good, seeke peace and follow it. The Prophet sheweth heere plainly, wherein true life and felicity consisteth: and the reason thereof he setteth downe afterward, namely that the Lord looketh vpon the good and bad, and that as he preserveth the good, so hee rooteth out the remembrance of the wicked from off the earth. Therefore he saith, Great are the troubles of the righteous, but the Lord deliuereth him out of all. Malice shall slay the wicked, and they that hate the righteous shall perish. The Lord redeemeth the soules of his seruants, and none that trust in him shall perish. Wherefore as the children of God that are partakers of his promises, cannot bee without great ioy in their hearts, which feedeth and preserveth them, and causeth them to liue happily, through the testimonie and taste which they haue of the sweetness, goodness and fauour of God towards them: so contrariwise, perpetuall sorrow dwelleth in the heart of the wicked, who cannot haue that ioy in them, because they want that which should bring it vnto them. For howsoever it seemeth that there is no ioy in the world but theirs, yet they neuer haue any true ioy, neither indeede can haue. For they seeke not for it, neither doe they knowe what it is. And therefore instead of seeking it in God in whome onely it resteth, they seeke it in creatures, and in all kinde of vanity, and yet finde nothing but in offending the maiestie of God. For this cause Iesus Christ hath long since pronounced their sentence, saying, We bee to you that laugh, for yee shall weepe. Contrariwise, ye that weepe are happy, for ye shall laugh. Blessed are they that mourne: that is to say, that feele their miseries, and seeke for ioy and consolation in God: for they shall bee comforted. After speaking to his disciples, he saith, Verily, verily I say vnto you, that yee shall weepe and lament, and the world shall reioyce: ye shall sorrow, but your sorrow shall bee turned into ioy. And then he compareth their sorrow & their ioy to that which a woman with child hath, which is pained so long as shee is in trauaile, but when she seeth it borne, shee receiueth ioy, and soone forgetteth her anguish. Whereby the word of God teacheth vs, that the griefe of good men shall be turned into double ioy, that their sorrow shall bee short, and their felicitie of long continuance. For there is one ioy euen in being deliuered from euill, although it bee not so great as when any Good happeneth vnto vs. But the ioy is doubled, when besides this deliuerance, there commeth vnto vs some ioy which we had not, which is procured vnto vs by meanes of that paine and euill which we suffered. Therefore our Sauour saith further to this effect, Ye are now in sorrow: but I will see you againe, and your hearts shall reioyce, and your ioy shall no man take from you. If this ioy cannot be taken away, it is eternall, so that death it selfe can not abolish it. Whereupon it followeth, that it remaineth yet after death, & that there is an other life after this in which we shall haue fulnesse of ioy. Therefore we may well call it our owne, seeing it alwaies continueth with vs. For if it were not so, Iesus Christ who is the truth it selfe should not be true. But as he cannot lie, so wee may assure our selues of his promise. For seeing it is grounded on him, and vpon his grace, resurrection, & immortall life, we may be as certainly perswaded of it, as we are assured of his resurrection, and of his eternall ioy and life, wherein hee liueth and reigneth for euermore. Wherefore all those to whom it is promised, & that are assured of the fruition thereof by faith in him, haue iust occasion to liue in great ioy. So that Saint Paul not without good cause saith, Reioyce alwaies in the Lord, and againe I say reioyce. But of the ioy of caruall men wee must say as Salomon writeth, That it is better to goe to a house of mourning, then to the house of feasting. And that there is a way that seemeth right to a man, but the issue thereof is the way of death: yea, in laughter, the heart shall be grieved, and the end of ioy is sorrow. The heart of the wise is in the house of mourning, but the heart of fooles is in the house of mirth. For they thinke of nothing but of iollitie, whereas wise men meditate on the miseries of this world. Therefore we may know how greatly Epicures, and such as give themselves to pleasures and dissolutenesse beguile themselves. For they thinke there is no ioy nor pleasures, but in their life, and that there is no life more sad or melancholy, then that of the children and seruants of G O D. But it is cleane contrary. For they that feare and honour G O D, haue more ioy in their heart in the midst of their greatest sorrowes, by reason of that sense and feeling ingrauen in them of heavenly and eternall ioy, which they certainly expect & beginne already to taste heere, then all worldlings and carnall men can haue in the greatest triumphs of all their pleasures. Now, as there are two kindes of ioy in the heart of men, so are there also of sorrowes. For we doe not only feele ioy for some Good, or sorrow for some euill, which we now taste of, but also for that which wee attend and looke for. Concerning this latter kinde of ioy, it is properly called Hope, which is an affection and motion of the heart, whereby it wisheth some Good to come, and prepareth to open it selfe and to receiue it. Therefore wee we saide before, that Hope was comprehended vnder desire, vnto which it giueth forme and being. For hope is a desire ioyned with confidence, that the Good which we wish for wil come to passe. Therefore the motions of Ioy and Hope are very like, seeing Hope is alwayes mingled with Ioy, neither is there any difference but in the time, because the one is of a present Good, and the other of that which is looked for. In the meane time Hope hath no euidence or science, but is grounded onely vpon coniecture of opinion, or likelihood and probability or possibility. And yet there is nothing so light, or so small, or strange, vnto which the heart will not easily ioine it selfe and take hold of it, when it seeketh for helps & props to ground and stay it selfe vpon. Neuertheles there is great difference between hauing already, and hoping for a thing, namely, in respect of men, and of hope, which hath no other grounds, then those of which I now made mention. But when the expectation is grounded vpon God and his promises, it is as sure of that which it expecteth, as if it did already possesse it: which is very comfortable to a man, in respect of that which hapneth to them, who can haue no certain hope or expectation of Good. For although there be hope, yet if it be not grounded vpon God it can bring no certaine ioy, or of any long continuance. Besides, when such a one shall faile of his hope, his griefe will be doubled. Wherefore they that build not their hope vpon the word of God, can haue no true and certain hope, but they feed themselves onely with their fantasies, as they that dream they find riches, which vanish away when they awake. Such is the hope of the wicked, and of all worldly & carnal men. Neuertheles the perswasion of hope which holdeth vs vp with the expectation of better things, is very pleasant and necessarie for the life of man, in the middelt of so many miseries, of so many sharpe and almost into lerable paines and trauailes which accompany them. So that it bringeth great comfort to men, and is in stead of sauce vnto them, without which they would find all things to be not onely without tast, but also of a very bitter and vnpleasaunt taste. Therefore hath the providence of God provided a remedy for this, namely, that hope should breed of very light causes, and should lean & stay it selfe easily vpon them: as if it selfe were very light, or very hooked & gliuish, being ready to take hold of, & to retaine whatsoeuer it meeteth withall, or can lay hands vpon, to ground & leane thereon.

Now if men finde so great comfort in hope such as it is, and being laide vpon so weake a foundation, it is easie to iudge, what ioy the faithfull receiue by that most certaine hope of eternall life, and of all the good thinges that God hath promised them: in regard whereof Saint Paul saith, There is one body and one spirit, euen as ye are called in one hope of your vocation. It is not then without cause that he saith in another place, Wee reioyce in tribulations, knowing that tribulation bringeth forth patience, and patience experience, and experience hope, and hope maketh not ashamed: because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the holy Ghost, which is giuen vnto vs: as if he should say, that they which stay themselves vpon such a hope, shall neuer be ashamed nor deceived. For the expectation thereof is neuer frustrated, but it hath alwaies a good & happy issue. For when we perceiue that we are deceived of our hope, we are ashamed & confounded. But this neuer happeneth to true hope, which proceedeth of a sound faith in Iesus Christ, by meanes whereof we haue accessethrough him vnto this grace wherein we stand & reioyce vnder the hope of the glory of God, as Saint Paul laid a little before. Therefore he exhorteth christians to reioice in hope, & calleth God the God of hope, praying that he wold fill the Romans with all ioy and peace in belieuing, that they may abound in hope through the power of the holy Ghost. And in the epistle to the Hebrewes, hope is compared to a sure and stedfast ancre of the soule. For this cause God is often called in the holy Scriptures the hope & fortress of his people & of his. It is written also, that they which hope in the Lord, doe reioyce. For hee that hopeth in him shal be healed & preserued. Therefore it is not without cause, that the spirit of God so often repeateth vnto vs this sentence, Blessed are they that put their trust in the Lord: for they shall neuer be confounded. It is better to hope in him then to put any confidence in Princes. But vnfaithfull & wicked men can neuer be partakers of such a Good, because they haue no such hope. For it is written, The expectation of the iust is gladnesse, but the hope of the wicked shall perish. And againe, The hope of the hypocrite shal perish, his confidence shal be cut off, and his trust shal be as the house of a spider. He shall leane vpon his house, but it shall not stand, hee shall hold him fast by it, yet shall it not endure. But to prosecute our matter, now that we haue seene the hope of good men together with their ioy, let vs consider what remaineth to the wicked of their vaine & false ioye, namely, Feare, which is the second kinde of sorrow mentioned by vs. Tell vs then AMANA, what Feare is, with the nature and effects thereof.

Of feare, and of the nature and effects thereof towards the body, the minde, and soule, and how it troubleth them: of the true harnesse and armour against Feare. Chap. 46.

AMAN. As wicked men can haue no certaine hope of any good they looke for, so they neuer haue any true ioy of any present good, because they alwaies forsake the true Good, and stay in that which is not Good but in their opinion and fantasie, neither doe they at any time referre the end of good things vnto God, but looke onely vpon the things themselves. Therefore it is neuer in their power to reioyce in that ioy which they accompt to bee their true ioy, but onely by offending God, as wee heard before. Which is the cause why they seeke after nothing more then to hide themselves, and to depart from him as much as they can possibly, so that they would neuer heare any speach of him, but desire to bury the remembrance of him for ever, because they can heare nothing spoken of him but as of their iudge, neither thinke of him, but he awakeneth their conscience, which they labour with might and maine to rocke asleepe. Wherein they take a cleane contrary course to that which they ought to follow to obtaine the true Good. For seeing God is the soveraigne Good of all creatures, what Good can they finde that is greater, wherein they can fully reioyce and satisfie themselves? Or what other Good, dare they promise to themselves to finde without him, and when they haue him for their enemy? But they are like to drunken men, who cannot vnderstand this Diuinitie, vntill they haue slept out their Wine, and are awaked out of their drunkenesse. Then shall they know what is true and false ioy, what is good and bad Hope, when their ioy shall bee turned into sorrow, their expectation and hope into feare and terror, wherewith the wicked shall be continually haunted, as the Spirit of God teacheth vs.

The wicked cannot abide to speake or heare of God.

Now, as sorrow is a griefe for some euill which a man presently feeleth, shutting vp the heart as vnwilling to receiue it: so feare is a sorrow, which the heart conceiueth of some looked for euill, that may come vnto it. Therefore it restraineth the heart also and closeth it vp, as being desirous to auoide the euill. We see then that there is the same difference betwixt sorrow and feare in respect of euill, that is betweene ioy and Hope in regard of Good. So that we may well say, that Feare is not only a fantasie and imagination of euill approaching, or a perturbation of the soule proceeding from the opinion it hath of some euill to come, but it is also a contraction and closing vp of the heart, which commeth from that which euery one iudgeth to be euil for himselfe, when he thinketh it is at hand & will lichte vpon him. Therefore first of all it draweth in and shutteth vp the heart, and so weakeneth the same. Whereupon nature being desirous to relieue and succour it, sendeth heat vnto it from the vpper parts: and if that be not sufficient, she draweth away that heate also which is in the neather parts. By which doing she suddenly calleth backe the bloud and spirits vnto the heart, and then followeth a generall palenesse and colde in all the outward parts, and chiefly in the face, with a shiuering throughout the whole body. For seeing the first moouing thereof is in the heart, the other alwaies followeth: so that when the heart trembleth, the whole body doth so likewise. Whereupon it followeth, that by reason of the great beating and panting of the heart, the tongue faltreth and the voice is interrupted. Yea it commeth to passe sometimes, that present death followeth a great and iuddeine feare, because all the bloud retiring to the heart choaketh it, and vtterly extinguisheth naturall heat and the spirits, so that death must needs ensue thereof. Therefore we cannot doubt but that feare hath great power over all the body, and ouer life it selfe, For this cause Esaïas, after he had denounced the iudgement of God against the Babylonians, and the coming of the Medes and Persians by whom their Citie should bee taken, and themselves slaine, saith thus: Therefore shall all handes bee weakened, and all mens hearts shall melt: which is as much to say, as that their hearts shall faile them for feare. And therefore hee addeth, They shall be affraid: anguish and sorrow shall take them, and they shall haue paine as a woman that trauelleth: every one shall bee amazed at his neighbour, and their faces shall be like flames of fire. But here wee will note what hee meaneth by these flames of fire. For if the face waxe pale through feare as it falleth out for the most part, it seemeth that it cannot be enflamed, for thē it would be red rather then pale. But we are to know, that when nature will strengthen the heart, she sendeth vnto it from all parts, succours of heat & bloud to encourage it the more. Therefore they that haue but a little warme blood in the hart are naturally the greater cowards: so that it is a better token of courage when the face is pale through feare, then when it waxeth red. For this cause Cato misliked that a childe should become pale in the face through shame, in stead of being red: & that a souldier should looke red in time of danger, in stead of being pale. For as it is a token of impudencie in a childe not to blush for shame, so is it a signe of cowardliness in a man of war to looke redde when he seeth himselfe in any danger. Therefore a pale countenance sheweth that the blood and naturall heat are gone to the heart to strengthen it: but when it is redde, that argueth that the blood and heate are not much gone inward to strengthen the heart: whereupon it is made more weake, and so the feare of it is greater & the trembling much more. And because the blood & naturall heat mount vpward in stead of descending, therefore doth the face looke red. Which argueth want of courage and a fainting heart: as it befell the Babylonians, whose hearts were possessed with feare and terrour at the coming of their enemies, because God would giue them ouer into their hands. We might also referre this rednesse and inflammation of visage to the paines and griefes which they were to endure. For when one is pressed with griefe, his countenance is red and fiery: because men are then as it were shut vp in a fire.

Iob. 41. 16.

feare in the
soule.

And as the face is red through Feare, for the reasons set downe by vs: so if the naturall heate leaue the heart and goe downeward, the feare is not onely encreased, but it bringeth withall a loosenesse of the bellie. Therefore it is written in the Booke of Iob, where it is spoken of the feare that Linathan bringeth vpon men, that the mightie tremble at his maiestie, and purget themselves through his moouings: that is, through feare of him. Hereupon a heathen Poet, when he would note a feareful & dastardly fellow, saith to this purpose, that his heart was fallen into his heeles. Now if feare mooueth all the body in this sorte, no doubt but it greatly mooueth also the minde and the whole soule of man. For it so troubleth the minde, that it confoundeth all the thoughts thereof; as we may try by this, that many times the least fancie of euill that entreth into our braine, is enough to trouble the minde very much. For as imagination and fancie beare great sway ouer the affections, so they shew what power they haue, chiefly in the affection of Feare. And surely among all liuing creatures, none hath such a confused feare, or is more amazed therewith then man is. Therefore wee may well say, that no miserie is greater, no bondage more shamefull, seruile or vile, then feare is. For it maketh men very abiects, flatterers, and suspicious, and so daunteth their courage, that it leaueth them as it were half dead, yea, causeth them sometimes to despair vtterly, so that they are as it were Images destitute of counsaile, not knowing which wayes to helpe themselves. For this cause the holy Scriptures make often mention of a heart that is powred out like water for feare, or that melteth like waxe. And in Jeremy it is said, In that day, saith the Lord, the heart of the King shall perish, and the heart of the Prince, and the Priests shall bee astonished, and the Prophets shall wonder. For truly if a man be once possessed with feare, especially if he bee inclined thereunto by nature, but aboue all, if God terrifie him, a man may well exhort him to boldnesse and to take courage vnto him, and alleadge all the reasons that can be to strengthen him, against Feare, but it will be to small purpose. Therefore one saith very well, that no harnessse can bee found, which is able to incourage feare and to make it hardy. For if any Armors had the skill to make such harnessse, they should want no customers. But onely God is able to arme vs against this, because it is he that giueth or taketh away the heart of man, that sendeth feare or boldnesse, as pleaseth him. For although he hath sowed the seedes of them both in the nature of the body and soule of man, with the meanes also that leade thereunto, yet he hath not subiected himselfe to all those meanes, no more then he hath to the whole order of nature, but hath alwaies reserued in his power both Feare & faintnesse of heart, and boldnes and assurance, which are their contraries. For assurance is a certaine perswasion and trust, whereby wee are confirmed in danger against euills that threaten vs and come neere vs: and boldnesse is a confidence, which pricketh forward the courage either to repulse euills or to followe after good thinges, which are excellent and harde to obtaine. Therefore when GOD is minded to punish men, he taketh away their hearts whome hee will destroy, causing them to tremble and to flie for feare, as it is written in Iosuah, where Rahab speaking to the spies of the Israelites that were sent to Iericho, vseth these words: I know that the Lord hath giuen you this land, for the feare of you is fallen vpon vs, & al the inhabitants of the land faint because of you. Contrariwise, our GOD heartneth and emboldneth those by whome hee will ouerthrow others, and to whome hee mindeth to grant victorie.

Therefore

Of Feare, and of the remedies against it. 473

Therefore it is written, that he will cause the feare of his seruants to fall vpon his enemies, that the wicked and such as haue not called vpon GOD, shall feare where there is no cause of feare, & shall tremble and flie for feare, although there be none that persecute them. So that if wee doe desire to finde a harnesse that will arme our heart thoroughly against all feare, let vs put on the armour of the true feare of GOD, and of sound Faith in him. For as the Prophet Dauid saith, Blessed is the man that feareth the Lord: the iust shall liue in assured hope: hee shall neuer bee moued, hee shall not bee afraid of euill tidings, for his heart is fixed and beleeneth in the Lord: his heart is stablished, therefore he will not feare. For whosoever feareth God and walketh in innocencie, God is with him: and hee that hath God on his side, what can hee or ought he to feare? For when he is with vs, who shall be against vs? May he not well say with Dauid, When I was afraid, I trusted in thee. In God doe I trust, I will not be afraid: what man can doe vnto me. In the feare of the Lord (saith the wise man,) there is assured strength, and his children shall haue hope. Therefore Iesus Christ saith to his Disciples, Let not your heart be troubled. And then he sheweth them the meanes, saying, Ye beleue in God, beleue also in mee. For nothing but Faith in God through Iesus Christ is able to giue vs this assurance. On the other side, if wee bee not armed with the feare of God, and with true faith, that wee may be certaine of his helpe and providence, and of his loue towards vs, there is nothing that can assure vs: but rather that which is written in the Law will befall vs, I will, saith the Lord, send a faintnesse into their hearts in the land of their enemies, and the sound of a lease shaken shall chase them, and they shall flee as fleeing from a sword, and they shall fall, no man pursuing them. And in another place where mention is made of them that despise the Law of God, and rebell against the Lord, it is saide, The Lord shall giue thee a trembling heart, and looking to returne till thine eyes fall out, and a sorrowfull minde. Thy life shall hang before thee, thou shalt feare both night and day, and shalt haue none assurance of thy life. In the morning thou shalt say, would God it were evening, and at evening thou shalt say, would God it were morning, for the feare of thine heart which thou shalt feare, and for the sight of thine eyes, which thou shalt see. Therefore when wee see, that in any great and dangerous affaires, the boldest and most couragious are oftentimes the greatest cowards, and most astonished and carried away with feare and terrour, and even many times without any great cause are amased and voide of counsaile, whereas contrariwise cowards by nature grow to bee most hardy in the midst of daungers, thereby God sheweth very well, whether strength and courage come from him or from men, and who is to haue the praise thereof. But now that we haue seene the first motions of the heart, in the affections of ioy, of sorrowe, of hope, and of feare, and know that they haue respect to good or euill, either present or to come, let vs learne in the next place, that as contemplation consisteth in the rest of the Spirit after the discourse of reason and iudgement, so after the heart hath the fruition of that Good which belongeth vnto it, it is still and quiet, resting it selfe therein: which rest is called Delight or pleasure, of which the order of our speech requireth that thou shouldest dilate, A R A M; at this present.

Of the delight and pleasure that followeth every ioy, and of the moderation that is required therein: of diuers degrees of pleasures, and how men abuse them, especially those pleasures, which are received by the corporall senses. Chap. 47.

A R A M. It is certaine, that all the affections which God hath placed in the nature of man, were given vnto him in regard of so many good things, which were meete and conuenient for his will to long after and to desire. For ioy and hope, which afford pleasure and consolation to the heart, were bestowed vpon him to be spurs and sollicitors to induce him to seeke after God his soveraigne Good, in whom alone he may finde al delight rest and pleasure. As for sorrow and feare, they are sure testimonies vnto men of the iudgement of God, and executioners of his vengeance: to this end that the feare of euill, which may come vnto them, should keepe them in awe, and that sorrow and griefe for euill which they haue already committed, should be vnto them both hangman & punisher. It is true that these affections being natural in every one, bring forth contrary effects both in the good & in the bad. For the children of God neuer separate his power from his goodness, & the feare which they haue of him, is not ioyned with hatred, but with trust in his mercy, which mooueth them to be grieved for offending him, and to loue him, to seeke him and to reioyce in him, and to haue him in singular honour and veneration. But the wicked who feare and tremble, like to malefactors fearing their iudge, hate and despise God, desiring nothing more then to escape his hands, and to flee from him as farre as they can. If they be grieved, it is because they may not enioy false ioyes, and vnlawful pleasures. Therefore that which is giuen them for Good, is turned by them into sin and euill, and pleasure and griefe.

A fantastical
Good.

But here we must call to minde what we haue spoken already concerning the signification of this word Good, as it is commonly taken, not considering whether it bee true or false, but onely according to that opinion which men haue of it. For there are many whose fancy is sufficient to afford them as much pleasure, as if indeede they enioyed that Good, which they thinke to haue. We see many such fooles in the world. For some are Popes or Cardinals by fantasie; others Emperours or Kings and great princes, or otherwise very rich, or possessours of some great Good. And yet such fantastical fellows are better contented & pleased with that which they thinke they haue in their foolish imagination, then they that haue them in trueth, vnto whome commonly they serue for nothing but to torment them more.

wise men.

Therefore I knowe not which of them I should esteeme more foolish and fantastical. For none ought to bee taken for truly wise men, and of ripe iudgement, but they who know that all thinges in the world and vnder the Sunne, are onely vanitie, as Satomen sheweth in his booke of the Preacher. Therefore he saith thus: I said in mine heart, Goe to now, I will proue thee with ioy: therefore take thou pleasure in pleasant thinges: and behold this also is vanitie. I said of laughter, thou art mad; and of ioy, what is this that thou doest? But to goe forward with our matter, let vs consider what delight and pleasure is, so far as men may enioy it in this life. It is then a rest which the heart taketh in the enioying of some Good that it liketh: euen as contemplation is the rest of the spirit after the discourse of Reason & Iudgement. Now we are to note, that there is no delight & pleasure in any thing, except there be some agreement betwene that part or power that requireth pleasure, & that which bringeth the same vnto it. This agreement cannot be without good proportion of the one with the other, whereby there is some similitude and resemblance betwene them.

Of delight & pleasure what it is, and how it is received

For this cause also, the thing that bringeth delight must not excede too much, eyther in greatnes, or in smalnes aboue the power which receiueth it, in regard of that part or instrument whereby the pleasure is received.

Heereupon when wee spake of the eyes and eares, wee shewed that light was to be dispensed to the eyes, and sounde to the eares, in good measure and moderation. For if the light bee too great, the eyes cannot receive it: insomuch that they will bee hurt and offended, in steade of receiuing delight. On the other side if it bee too little, it will not suffice them: and therefore it must bee betwene both. And as euery mans sight is sharper and stronger, or more dull and weaker, so must the light bee dispensed according to that measure. The like may be said of sounds in regard of the eares, and of all other thinges in respect of those senses vnto which they agree. And if this moderation be requisite for the outward senses, it is no lesse necessary in respect of the inward senses, and of all the powers of the soule. Therefore as God is incomprehensible and infinite, so is he receiued with delight of that part of the soule, which cometh neere vnto his nature, and which is most incomprehensible, most ample, and most infinite in regard of other parts, and that is the Spirit and Vnderstanding. On the other side, because there is no proportion or agreement in greatnesse and infinitenesse betwene GOD and the Soule, she receiueth and comprehendeth him by such meanes, whereby he may be applied vnto her, and she made after a sort capable of him. For if he should present himselfe vnto her, such as he is in his high and diuine maiesty, especially man being in this estate wherein he is in this mortall life, she could not beare so high maiesty, as being too exceeding great for her. So that instead of receiuing pleasure, ioy & delight, she should not only be very much frightened, but euen wholly overwhelmed & swallowed vp as a drop of water wold be consumed being throwne into a great fire: as we may iudge by so many examples as are in the holy Scriptures to this purpose. For when GOD manifested himselfe to the Patriarkes, he neuer appeared vnto them in the greatnesse of his maiesty, but tooke vnto him alwaies some shape, and vsed such meanes as were agreeable to their nature. Therefore also it is very requisite, that God should descend & apply himselfe vnto our smal capacity, to the end we may enioy him and his Goods, and take pleasure and delight in them. For this cause, he hath not onely appointed the ministerie of his word and Sacraments to shew and communicate himselfe vnto vs by them, applying himselfe vnto our nature and capacity, but hath also manifested himselfe in flesh, in the person of his sonne Iesus Christ, to become more like vnto vs, and to draw nearer vnto vs in our owne nature, to this end that we might enjoy him and al his benefits the better, and receive more true and entire delight in them.

And thus much for this point of the agreement that ought to bee betweene the thing that delighteth, and that which receiveth pleasure. Next wee are to note, that a man may take pleasure by all those partes whereby he may knowe, as well by the internall as the externall senses, and by all the powers of the minde and soule. Whereupon it followeth, that as every one is more or lesse addicted to any of these partes, so hee delighteth most in those pleasures, which hee may receive by that part vnto which hee is most given. Therefore we see that the baser and more vile sort of people, and such as are most rude and ignorant, are more mooved by corporall and externall things, which moove the bodily senses, then by spirituall and high things, that are more meete for the spirit, and wherein it taketh greater pleasures. But with prudent and wise men, and such as are more spirituall, it is otherwise. So that as every ones nature is more noble and excellent, or more vile and abiection, and according to the nature of those things wherein every one delighteth, so is the delight, either more noble and excellent, or more base and contemptible, more pure and quiet, or more impure and troublesome, of longer or of shorter continuance, and hath more or fewer pleasures, and those either more or lesse tedious. Now among those delights which a man may take by the bodily senses, the basest & most abiection of all, is that which is received by the sense of touching. For as it is most earthy of all the externall senses, so are the pleasures that are taken by it. That delight which is taken by the sense of tasting, is a little more honest and lesse contemptible, and yet is it brutish enough. As for the delight that may be received by the sense of smelling, it is very light, and nothing so pleasant, as the irksomenesse that cometh of the contrary, is vnpleasant. For a good smell bringeth not so great pleasure as an euill smell causeth displeasure: besides, that this sense of smelling is not so sharpe in man as in beastes. And concerning those pleasures, which a man may receive by the eares, they haue some more beauty and excellencie in them. For the more they holde of the nature of the aire, they are so much the lesse earthy and brutish. And those which wee receive by the eyes, are yet more excellent then all the rest, because the eyes are of the nature of the fire, which cometh neere to the celestial nature. And thus much for those pleasures, which a man may receive by the corporall senses, of which the noblest & best are baser & of lesse excellency then the least of those, which wee may receive by the basest parts and powers of the soule. For, as much as the soule is more noble & more worthy then the body, so much is the least thing in it greater and more magnificall, then that which is most noble and most excellent in the body. And as there are diuers degrees of pleasures according to the variety of the externall senses, & according to the difference that is betwixt them and the powers of the soule: so is it betweene the powers of the soule, as some of them are more noble & more diuine then others. For those which appertaine to the nourishing and generatiue powers, are more corporall, earthy and brutish, then those that belong to the vital parts & to the heart. And those that are proper to the spirit and minde, are purest and best of all: among which that delight that is in contemplation is the chiefeest, as we may iudge by that which wee haue already spoken. Wherefore if wee would consider well of all these degrees of delight and pleasure, and could iudge well of them, we should not be so deceived in them as commonly we are; preferring the least before the greatest, the basest before the noblest; those that are most earthy before them that are most heavenly, and those that fade soonest before them that continue longest. Besides, the very enjoying of every one of the ought to suffice to make vs know their nature, & the difference between the one & the other, & how far one is to be preferred before an other. For how doe we see men given ouer to those pleasures wherein they delight, not onely in eating and drinking, in dainty morsels and delicate drinks, but also in other carnal pleasures that are more earthy & vile, especially when they are excessive and vnmeasurable, as they are in whoredome? For those which we receive in eating and drinking, belong to the sense of taste, which is brutish enough: but these others to the sense of touching, which is a great deale more brutish. We know by experience also, that these senses are sooner wearied and tired with their pleasures, then any other, and that such delights commonly bring with them more irksomnes & loathing then ioy & pleasure: leaving many times behind the a long & shameful repentence for pollutions received by them.

sures.

The pleasures that belong to the other senses, as they are of longer continuance, so they weary not a man so quickly, especially those that delight the sight. Yea the baser and more vile the pleasures are, the sooner doe they loath a man, as they knowe by experience that are giuen to whordome. For how insatiable soeuer they be, yet can they not but be glutted therewith: neither are they able to continue their vnruinesse so long in that pleasure (howsoeuer they want no good will) as in the pleasures that come by eating and drinking. Neither can the greatest gluttons, drunkards, and daintie mouthed persons follow so long together after the delights of their gluttony, drunkenesse, and dainty diet, as they may after those which they receiue either in smelling, or in hearing, or in seeing. As for the paines that are to be taken in the obteyning and vsing of these pleasures, the more earthly and brutish the delight is, the greater labour is to be had about it: and the more excellently the pleasure it vsed, the greater hurt commeth thereby, as we daily see in gluttons, drunkards, and whooremongers, by the testimony of those diseases, which take hold of them through their excessse. Thus then we may learne by the vse of those pleasures, which are receiued by the bodyly and outward senses, which of them are to be preferred before others, with the agreement necessary therein, and the moderation that alwaies ought to be obserued in them. But to goe forward with our matter, wee are now to compare together the delights and pleasures that are receiued by the spirituall and internall senses, and to vnderstand what difference there is betweene the vse of the pleasures of the spirit and of the body, and how the one driue away the other. Now let vs heare what ACHITOB will tell vs of this point.

Of the comparison of pleasures receiued by the internall senses: and how men descend by degrees from the best to the basest pleasures: of the difference betweene the vse of spirituall delights and corporall: and how the one chase the other. Chap. 48.

The cause
why a little griefe is strō-ger in vs then a great pleasure.

ACHITOB. Experience dayly teacheth vs, that we need but a little griefe to diminish a great pleasure, or otherwise to take it cleane away, and to change it into great displeasure, yea to turne a great ioy into extreame sorrow and sadnes. But few there are that meditate and know the cause thereof. The truth is, we can think of no other cause, then of the corruption of our nature, of the estate and disposition of our body, of the course of our age and life, which decline continually and waxe worse and worse. Therefore a small griefe findeth greater strength within vs to cause our heart to giue backe and to close vp it selfe, and wholly to cast vs downe, then a great ioy and delight is able to open and enlarge it, and to sustaine and hold vs vp. For a little force will throw downe this shaking and reeling body, but there had neede to be a great deale of strength to vnderprop and stay it vp firme and stedfast. On the other side we can more easily want pleasures, then not feele their contrary griefes.

For we doe not perceiue so much the want of a good which we haue not, as the presence of an euill which wee suffer. For in the first, it seemeth that wee want nothing, but in the other the sense is afflicted, and the sound estate and disposition thereof is cleane taken away and ouerthrowne. Now if wee desire to feele such griefe as little as we may, and to approach as neere as our nature will permit, to true delight & pleasures, we must withdraw our selues from vile and abiect things, and contemplate most high and excellent things.

Of the pleasures of fan-
tasie.

Now as we haue learned by the former discourse that those delights and pleasures, which are receiued by the chiefest senses that fauour least of the earth, are of longer continuance then the other, so we are to know, that the pleasures of the fancy are more stable and firme then those which come by the corporall senses. Hereof it is, that men are cloyed a great deale sooner not onely with the pleasures of eating and drinking and of other more abiect things, but also of sweet smells, of musick, of harmonickall sounds, and of the beholding of goodly sights, then with those goods that are in the fancy and in opinion, whereby the minde is deceiued, as namely the getting and possessing of silver, of riches, of power, of honours, and of glory. For these Goods are goods rather in opinion then in truth. But because fancy propoundeth them vnto her selfe for Goods, therefore shee taketh pleasure and delight in them. Therefore the couetous man delighteth in his gold, silver, and riches: and the ambitious man in power, glory, and honours, which are the pleasure of fancie, and with which she is not so soone wearied, as the body is with corporall pleasures, but contrariwise the more she hath, the more her delight encreaseth, and becommeth insatiable. But the pleasures of reason, of the mind and of the spirit, continue a great deale longer then they, because the spirit is not weary or tyred, but is recreated and refreshed. But none can iudge well of this, but those that have had experience thereof. No marvaile therefore if such men as are addicted to these other more base and earthly pleasures, mocke and deride them that contemne their delights, and make so great account of these spirituall and heavenly pleasures, that they are content to renounce all the rest, and to forgoe all the goods in the world that they may enjoy these, as we see it was with those holy personages that have tasted of them. As for those carnall and beastlike men, we may say of them as we doe of hogs, that delight more in a puddle or linke, then in precious stones or sweet odours, namely that they follow that which is most agreeable to their naturall disposition, because they want iudgement to discern the value of those things which they contemne and make no account of.

The pleasures of reason and of the minde.

Now among the pleasures of the spirit, those that consist in contemplation are of their nature by which we shall become blessed in the life that lasteth for ever. Therefore it is no strange thing, if many of the Philosophers affirmed, that this kinde of life was the best of all and most excellent: and if Aristotle placed the ende of all Goods and of beatitude in contemplation. Now if these Philosophers that never knew what was the true and chiefe Good, did notwithstanding mount vp so high, what a shame is it for vs to whome the soveraigne Good is revealed from heaven, if wee stay and as it were rot in these base, brutish and supposed pleasures? Therefore we must consider, how wee come downe by degrees from the highest unto the lowest steppe, by reason of this heavy burthen wherewith our nature corrupted through sinne, is sore charged: whereupon she is driven downward to seeke for delights and pleasures, and to recreate her selfe in these earthly things. But according as she retaineth more or lesse of her first purity and nobility, so she keepeth higher, or descendeth lower from the contemplation of the highest and most excellent things, to those that belong to the affections of this life. Therefore some take pleasure in the administration eyther of the common wealth, or of their domesticall affaires. There are others who not being able to soare vp so high, delight themselves in the knowledge and remembrance onely of those things that were done by other men, yea many times in histories and fables. Some take pleasure in handy workes, and in such artes & occupations as belong to them. There are many, that cannot apply their mindes to so good things as those, but give them the bridle to recreate and delight themselves either in vnprofitable sports and pastimes, or in vile and abiect idlenesse. Yea there are others that come lower. For they suffer themselves to be overcome by the allurements of their corporall senses, so that they fall into brutish pleasures, as if they were become brute beastes, and as if their minde and spirit were wholly swallowed vp and plunged in the most bottomlesse gulfe of immoderate and excessive pleasure. And when a man is come downe so low, he can descend no lower. But yet he may seeke after pleasures crosse-wise, and turne cleane out of the way from reason and iudgement, feeding and delighting his fancie and imagination with false opinions. From hence it is that he hath found out nobility, renowne, glory, popularity, favour of Princes, and all other vaine things that consist in externall goods. Yea if he could, he would gladly be deprived of that spirit and minde which God hath given him, that he might not retaine & keepe any gravity or severity becomming his nature, but plunge and give over himselfe with full saile to follow all kinde of pleasure, voluptuousnesse and delight. For his nature is become so nice and tender, that he can away with nothing that would molest him: so that every little burthen waileth very heavy vpon him. Againe, it is already so pressed with the fardell of corruption, that of it selfe it draweth downward continually, and needeth not bee driven that way by any other meanes. Therefore a great many, that of themselves would not seeme to stoop so low, fearing to lose any part of their reputation, if they should not keepe that gravitie that becommeth their person, finde meanes to do that by others which they durst not do of themselves. Hereof it commeth, that they delight in Murriners, fooles, tumblers and other of like trades, which are not onely vnprofitable for the life of man, but very hurtfull also, by reason of the corruptions which they bring with them. In all which things we may see the vanity of our corrupt nature, and of those pleasures it taketh delight in. But there are other notable reasons, whereby wee know what difference there is betweene the pleasures of the minde and spirit, and those of the corporall senses. For the spirit needeth no space of time wherein to intermit his pleasures, and then to take them in hand againe, but only changeth them from one to another, namely from the greater to the lesse, or from the lesse to the greater. In the meane time I say, there is no intermission, but it is continually busied: onely it changeth from one delight to another. For seeing our spirit is in continuall motion, it can in no wise cease from doing, vnlesse the power from whence the motion ther of proceedeth, be stayed by some impediment of the instruments which it vseth. As indeede it falleth out in a drunken man, whose spirit and minde is as it were buried by those vapors that trouble it, of which the braine is full. The like is in an Apoplexie or falling sicknesse. For these are violent things and such as resist the nature of the spirit. But presently after the violence ceaseth which hindreth his power, he falleth to his accustomed action againe, for the doing whereof he needeth no externall ayde, but onely that all lettes and impediments should be remooued and taken out of the way. Which beeing remooued the spirit & mind cannot be idle, but necessarily thinketh of somewhat continually, about which it is occupied. Therefore whosoever laboureth to stay it altogether from thinking, so that it should not be busied about something, it is all one as if he went about to change the nature of the fire, and to keepe it from burning, after it hath found conuenient matter and is already kind led. For either it will be vtterly extinguished, if the impediment it hath bee stronger then it, or else beeing of greater force it will make way for it selfe. Therefore wee had need to be well aduised alwayes what matter wee minister to our spirit, and looke that it bee agreeable to the nature thereof, and be seeming the same, least it should be distracted and wander after those things that might hurt it. And when we would recreate the minde, seeing it is in continuall action, we must so change the matters about which it is to be employed, that they be good and honest, howsoever they be diuers and sundry. But it is not so with the corporall senses.

For they must necessarily haue some space of time to rest in euen from their pleasures, & to cease for a while from vsing them: because they are more fresh and pleasant after they haue abstained for a time. But the spirit cannot rest. In the meane time the pleasures of the body, and those of the soule and spirit haue one another in chafe. Therefore they that are addicted to corporall pleasures, haue lesse knowledge and feeling of those that are spiritual; and contrariwise they that delight in spirituall pleasures abstaine from those that are corporall. For these delights are in continuall combat one against another, so that they cannot be acquainted together, because they are contraries. This combat is such another as that which is betweene the flesh and the spirit.

Moreover, we see by experience, that those delights which we receiue of naturall things haue more force and are purer, and continue lower then artificiall pleasures. For let a man shew vs the goodliest workes that can be, either of gold or of siluer, or pictures, or garments, or houses as curiously wrought as can be deuised, either for beauty or cost, yet when we haue seene them foure or fve times, we begin to be full of it, and take not so great pleasure therein as we did. But who is euer weary of beholding, I will not say the heauens, the Sunne, the Moone, and the Stars, but the earth, the sea, riuers, mountaines, valleyes, gardens, trees, herbs and flowers? The cause hereof is the agreement of nature. For we being naturall, naturall things are more agreeable vnto vs then artificiall. And because wee were created and made, not by the hande of a Paynter and mortall man, but by the hande of the liuing GOD, who painteth liuing images and pictures, therefore wee take greater delight in his handie workes, then in the workes of any other, how excellent a woorkeman soeuer hee bee. And indeede they are of farre greater perfection then those that are made by the arte of man. Therefore Arte laboureth alwayes to follow nature, and to expresse her workes as neere as it can: insomuch that they are accounted the best worke men, and men delight most in their doings, that come neere vnto nature. How much more then ought wee to like the workes of nature, and consequently GOD himselfe, who is the Authour and Creatour of nature, and of all her workes? For the least worke of his in nature is more excellent in his kinde, then the perfectest worke that humane arte is able to shew. Nowe if wee come from his naturall workes, to those that are supernaturall and aboue the reach of nature, wee shall finde in them a great deale more matter of all kinde of delight. For if wee could consider aright of these things, wee would ascend vp from artificiall things, and from that delight which they affoord vs, euen vnto naturall things, and from these vnto the Author and Creator of them and of al nature, & there we would seek for our true delight and pleasure. Herein nature her selfe is our good Mistresse, as thee that leadeth vs thereunto as it were by the hand. But our inconsideratenesse, or blockishnesse and ingratitude is the cause, why we cannot learne this lesson of her and why we haue not the maruellous and excellent works of God and nature in such due admiration as we ought to haue.

Whereupon it commeth to passe also, that we take not so great delight and pleasure in them, and that custome which ought to encrease this delight in vs, is a meane rather to diminish the same. And by this meanes also we are kept from that admiration which we ought to haue of God the Workemaster of them, and of that delight and pleasure, which we should finde in him, if we mounted vp so high and sought him there. But because we are alwaies musing about vile and abiect things, we haue no leisure to consider of, and to contemplate higher and more wonderfull things. Now to ende this daies speech, seeing wee are taught that God hath giuen vs the affections of ioy and of sorrow, to induce and mooue vs to seeke him, to the ende that by eschewing the euill that is contrarie vnto vs, wee might attaine to that soueraigne Good, which he hath prepared for vs, and to that true delight, pleasure and blisse, which wee may finde in him; let vs know, that wee haue good occasion to pray vnto him incessantly, that he would vouchsafe so to lighten our senses and minde, and to rule all our affections and willes in such sort, that wee may at the length attaine thereunto. For then we shall not onely be deliuered from all sorrow and griefe, but haue the full fruition of perfect ioy and perpetuall delight. And to the ende that we may goe forward to morrow with our matter of the affections of the heart and soule, thou shalt intreat A S E R, of the affections of Loue, which follow those of which we haue already spoken.

The ende of the sixt daies Worke.

The seuenth daies worke.

Of the affection of Loue, of the nature, kindes, and obiect of it : of the beginning of friendship : of the vertue and force of alluring that is in likenesse and in beantie : of the agreement that is betweene beauty and goodnesse. Chap. 49.

A S E R. If we know not throughly the affections of our soule, which by reason of the corruption of our nature, are so many diseases in vs, wee shall neuer know our selues well, nor the Image of God, which is imprinted in our soule, nor the affection of his goodnesse towards vs. Likewise wee can neuer learne what pure and sound parts of the nature of the affections remaine yet in man, and what is added thereunto by reason of sinne that is in vs, neither yet what vertue and vice are, except we truly know the nature of the affection.

Moreover, without this knowledge, we can neuer make choice of good from euill, or of truth from lying. For being, as we must needes be during this life, subiect vnto, and tossed on euery side with an infinite number of strange passions, if they be vnknown vnto vs, we cannot discerne amongst a multitude of contrarie opinions, which of them is soundest, euery one of them pretending some shew of good & of truth. Therefore as we saw yesterday the affections of ioy and of sorrow, of hope and of feare, and of delight and pleasure, which follow ioy, whereby we may conceiue the contrary vnto it, namely, griefe and torment which follow sorrow; so this day we are to proceede in learning what other affections there are of the heart and soule.

I will begin then with the affection of loue, which is a motion whereby the heart lusteth after that which is good indeed, or which seemeth vnto it to be so, desiring to drawe the good to it selfe, to the end it may enioy the same. This affection commeth neere to the nature of hope, but it is a great deale more hot. Therefore after the heart is once moued, it presently draweth vnto it that thing which is offred for good, labouring as it were to haue the fruition of some great Good. But let vs consider how this affection is bred in the heart.

The know- ledge of the affections requireth.

What loue is.

After

After that Iudgement hath iudged a thing to be good, so soone as the same thing is presented to the Will, it doth by and by moue, allure and draw the same vnto it selfe by a certaine naturall agreement, even as the like is betweene the mind and the truth, and between the eye and beauty. This motion of the heart and will, hath even then ioyned with a certaine kinde of reioycing, as testifying thereby, that the thing pleaseth it, and is very good and agreeable vnto it. Now when this reioycing is confirmed, it is called loue, which is an inclination or a proceeding of the will towards that which is good. For it fareth with the Will, as if it went before to meete with the good that is comming, to receiue & embrace it. Whereupon ariseth a desire of coniunction to knit the same thing to it selfe, and this loue is called Cupiditie, Lusting, or Coueting. But because this affection is so out of square in this our corrupt nature, these names are commonly taken more in the euill then in the good part. Now this affection of desire or coueting, hath respect either to that good which we enioy already, or which we haue yet in hope onely and in expectation. If it be already present, this cupiditie breedeth a desire to retaine and keepe it still: if it be yet in expectation, it bringeth forth a desire & longing to enioy it. And in this sort we loue all those things which we esteem and take to be profitable for vs, either for the soule, or for the body, or for the external goods. For this cause many loue God, because they know that it is he who giueth good things vnto me. But this is not that true loue wherewith we must loue him. For although they are very wicked and too vnthankfull, which loue him not, at leastwise with such a loue and for that cause, yet if we goe no further, we loue our selues more then we doe him in this kind of loue, seeing the chiefe cause for which we loue him, is not in respect of himselfe, but of vs. For wee loue him by reason of that good, which we receiue from him. But true loue is that, which causeth vs to loue a thing, because it is good in it selfe, and not in respect of any profite that may come vnto vs therby. With this loue we ought to loue God, & our neighbors & friends: & of this loue we haue a very cleare & manifest image in the loue of fathers & mothers towards their childre. For they loue the, not because they haue respect to som good, which they may receiue of them, but because they are their children. For although they receive nothing but trouble by them from the time of their childehoode, and expences rather then profite, yet that letteth them not from louing them tenderly & with great affection. Now if by this loue grounded vpon such a cause, we iudge the like of the loue of God towards vs, seeing it is he that hath imprinted the same in the heartes of parents towards their children, as an image of his loue towards vs, we conclude well. For seeing he is the fountain of all true and perfect loue, al other loues are but as it wee little riuers, which flow from this lively spring. But there is none so expresse an image thereof in all the creatures, as the loue of fathers and mothers towards their children. For doth God loue vs in respect of any profit, which he looketh for at our hand? Hereof it is that he setteth forth himselfe vnto vs as a Father, to the end we may the better know, that he loueth vs with a right fatherly loue. Therefore also he wil haue vs to call him father, & so to account of him: yea he will not haue vs to take any other for our Father of whom we depend wholly, but him alone. And no doubt but we should receiue wonderfull ioy and consolation, if we could as well feele within vs that loue which this good Father beareth vs, as wee feele the loue which wee beare towards our children. Now when loue is reciprocall and mutuall, so that he which is loued doth also loue for his part the partie that loueth him, then is friendship bred of loue, wherein is mutual beneuolece and good will. Wherefore as God loueth vs, so must wee for our parts loue him, seeing this is the chiefe cause why he hath created man according to his image and similitude, and hath given him a soule that is immortall, and endued with vnderstanding and reason, to know him first and then to loue him. Therefore if we consider by what steps we ascend vp to God, we shall finde that as by the loue which he first bare vs, wee descended from the highest to the lowest, so likewise we mount vp againe from the lowest vnto the highest by that loue, which we beare him. For our soule descendeth from the highest, which is God, vnto the lowest which is the body, by the loue of the Creator towards her, who by means of this descending and coniunction communicateth his blessednesse both with the soule and with the body. And as she came downe from him, so by the knowledge which she hath of God, and loue which she beareth him, shee ascendeth vp againe and returneth to her first birth. Concerning those degrees by which we come thither, wee beginne first at materiall and corporall things, as the beginning of mans generation and birth teacheth vs: then we come to the senses of the body, by that vse which we haue of them. Afterward we vse imagination and fantasie, and from that we come to reason and iudgement, next to contemplation, and last of all to loue. Hereby we may learne also to know the steppes of descending, seeing they are the same, but begun at the contrary end. Wherefore if iudgement be governed and overcome by the affections, and reason by fantasie, the estate of the soule is wholly ouerturned and peruered, as if the body beeing minded to walke, should set the head vpon the ground, and lift the heeles vppward. So likewise is it if in steade of mounting vp to God by loue, we descend in such sort to the creatures, that wee ascend vp no more to him, that we may be one with him. For loue maketh all things one. Therefore if we be vnited with God, there must needs be perfect friendship betweene him and vs. For as he loueth vs, so we loue him, & then our selues for loue of him. And from the loue of our selues springeth our loue towards our wiues and children, as though they were a part of vs, as also towards our like and towards our workes. For similitude and likenesse is a great cause of loue, seeing that when one resembleth vs, it is as if we our selues were another: because similitude maketh many things to be as one and the same thing. Wherefore seeing God hath created vs to his image and likenesse, it cannot bee but that he loueth his image and similitude in vs, and vs also in respect of that, as if it were himselfe. For this cause the more this image is reformed and renewed in vs, the more (no doubt) he loueth vs: and the like also may be saide of our loue towards him. In like manner beauty hath great vertue to procure loue, and that for many causes. For first, the beauty which appeareth without in any body, is as it were a witness and testimony of the beauty in the soule, according to that which wee haue already spoken of the agreement of the powers and affections thereof with the temperature of the bodie. For God hath created all things in such manner, that he hath commonly ioyned beauty and goodnes together. And as it is written in Genesis, That he created nothing but that which was very good, so there was nothing made, but it was very beautifull in his kinde. Therefore as there is agreement between the body and soule, so bodily beauty is as it were an image of the beauty of the soule, and promiseth after a sort some good thing of the inward beauty. For internall perfection breedeth the externall. Whereupon the internal is called goodnes, and the externall beauty, which is as it were a floure of goodnes, that is the seed. It is true that this which we say doth not alwaies fall out so, but that oftentimes a man may see the cleane contrary: whereupon we haue this common prouerbe, Proper fel- lowes at the gallows; & faire women in the stews. For ordinarily the goodliest men & such as are best furnished with the gifts of nature in the disposition of their body, are most wicked and vicious: and more beautifull women are strumpets, then foule women, at leastwise they are in greatest danger, & haue much more adoe to keep their chastity. For there is alwaies great strife between chastity & beauty, which is so much the more increased, as beauty is the greater, because it is so violent, that oftentimes many desire willingly to die for the beauty of others, and some are so tossed and tormented, that they become senseles and out of their wits being overtaken with looking vpo a beautiful face, which hath such pricks, that they pierce even to the liueliest part of their heart and soule.

Whereupon it commeth to passe, that the poore silly louers are so tormented and full of pactions, that they stand altogether amazed, and are like to them that are roasted by a soft fire: yea their soule is so subiected to their concupiscence & desire, that she must obey them, as if she were some poore chambermaide and drudge. Whereby we may know what good there is in such Beauty, and what good commeth with it, also what coniunction and agreement it may haue with goodnesse, and whether a man may not truly say according to our common prouerbe, That Beauty without goodnes is worth nothing. But we are to consider what is the cause hereof. For we speak not of that which is now done, but of that which should be done, if the nature of man had continued sound: and of that which yet would most commonly be put in vse, were it not that euil education, besides that naturall corruption which is already in euery one, did infect even that little good of naturall inclination which remaineth man. But howsoeuer it be, bodily beauty doth alwaies promise more good of the soule, then deformity doth. If it fall out otherwise, it is because God will shew, that all good things come from his onely grace, and not from nature: and therefore he doth not alwaies follow one course and one selfesame order without any change. Besides, hee commonly recompenceth in one thing that which is wanting in another, so that hee supplieth that in the spirit which is wanting in the body, or in the body which is wanting in the spirit. On the other side, because many abuse that beauty of the body which God hath bellowed vpon them, as they do al other his gifts, he letteth them fall oftentimes into great vices, whereby they shew the deformity of the soule, which bringeth also their bodily beauty into great obloquy.

obloquy and shame. For as beauty causeth vertue to appeare more faire, when it is ioyned therewith, so contrariwise it maketh vice more vgly and lothsome to looke vpon. Therefore Socrates had reason to say, that it was good for every one to beholde himselfe in a glasse, that they which saw themselves faire should be the more afraid to blot their beauty with vices, and that they which were foule should labour to beautifie themselves with vertues. Now seeing we are entred into the causes why beauty draweth Loue, following this matter, we would know of thee AMANA, what other things are to be considered herein, with the sundry degrees and kinds of Beauty, and what is the proper effect of Loue.

Of other causes why Beauty procureth Loue, and of diuers degrees and kinds of Beautie: how it is the nature of Loue alwaies to vnite, and what other effects it hath: how Loue descendeth and ascendeth not: what power it hath to allure and breed Loue.

Chap. 50.

Three kinds of Loue.

A*MANA*. Many amongst the Philosophers haue made three kinds of good, or of good things: namely, that which is pleasant, profitable, and honest. Hereupon, forasmuch as Loue is a desire of good or goodly things, or at leastwise of things so accompted: they haue also made three kinds or sorts of Loue, of which the first is towards delightfull and pleasant things, and such are those things which tickle and delight our senses, being properly called the goods of the body. The second kind of Loue is towards profitable things, as honours, riches, greatnesse and such other like things, called externall goods or the goods of Fortune. The third kinde is towards honest things, as wisdom, prudence and other vertues, which are the goods of the soule. As for the two kinds of Loue, wee may well place them amongst the perturbations of the soule, because so many euill affections spring from them that all confusion proceedeth from them, yea euery mans life is thereby made miserable. But to loue and desire good and honest things, is that which truly maketh a man famous. For this loue maketh the chiefe part of his soule excellent, even that part whereby hee is man, and which is farthest remooued from bodily matter and from obscuritie, and nearest to diuine brightnesse, I meane the spirit and vnderstanding, which of all the other parts and powers of man, onely is voide of the blot of mortalitie. The consideration of the diuers degrees and sundry sorts of beauty doth prepare the way whereby we may come to this laudable and honest loue. For by them we may ascend vp from the lowest to the highest, and turne our corporall and earthly loues into spirituall and heavenly.

God created the world by
loue.

They that are most ignorant know that loue is a desire of beauty, and that Beauty draweth Loue. Yea some of the learned Heathens haue taught, that it was Loue which moued God not onely to create the world, but also to create it beautifull, and of so goodly a forme in euery part of it. And the name whereby it is called, yeeldeth testimony of the beauty of it. For world signifieth as much as a goodly and well decked ornament. Therefore seeing God hath created and framed it by loue, no doubt but loue is dispersed and shed throughout the whole world, & is continually drawn & procured by beauty, to the end it might be conformable & like to the fountaine from whence it came. On the other side, all beauty is as it were a beame of that infinite and diuine beauty that is in God: and therefore as the diuine forme draweth vnto it true and perfect loues, so the image and similitude thereof draweth the images of loues. And that loue wherby Almighty God was moued to create all things, proceeded from his owne goodnesse. Now forasmuch as beauty is a beame of that goodnes which is shed ouer all, as the Sun spreadeth his light by his beames; the goodlier any thing is, so much the more amiable and louely it is. For the mother of Loue is goodnesse, and the mother also of Beauty is goodnesse: so that both of them are bred and borne as it were of one mother. And according to the diuersitie of natures created by God, so are there diuers kinds of beauty, which are all as it were beames, flames, and lights of that heavenly & infinite beauty, which is the fountaine of all the rest. The first, chiefe, and most excellent kinde of all, is that beame of heavenly beautie, whereby the spirit and mind is adorned and polished with vnderstanding and contemplation. The second is, in that illumination whereby the soule receiueth knowledge. Therefore the vnderstanding mounteth vp to those two first degrees of Loue, which is drawne by such beauties: and from thence proceedeth the loue of spirituall things. The third kind, which is as it were an other beame of diuine beauty appeareth

Diuers kinds of Beauty

appeareth in the effects of lower degrees, which are in that fruitfulness which God hath giuen vnto the creatures, putting into them seeds to preserve and to increase their kinds. The last and lowest, yea, the most troublesome and earthly kinde, is in corporall matters, which are purtraied and painted with great variety of formes and shapes. And as the vnderstanding ascendeth vp to the two first degrees, of which I haue already spoken: so the imagination stayeth it selfe in the two last, and from thence proceedeth the loue of the body and of bodily things, and the affection to beget of that goodly thing, thereby to draw out a form like to that beauty towards the which a man is affectionated.

Now when wee shall consider aright of all these degrees and beames of beauty, it is certaine that we will strue to ascend vp from the lowest to the highest, whereas commonly we descend from the highest to the lowest, feeding out spirits with corporall and terrestrial loves, which differ from their nature, in steade of spirituall and celestially loves, which is their proper foode. But we must note further, that the greatest, last and chiefe force of loue, is of many and diuers things to make one and the same. Therefore he that loueth our friend, or doth him any good, seemeth to do that to vs which is done to him, and we esteeme of it, as if we receiued it our selues. For it is the nature of loue, which way soeuer it turne, alwaies to loyne and knit vnto it selfe: as on the contrary side, hatred is of this nature, that it will euermore disioyne and separate. For this cause Iesus Christ prayed so earnestly for his vnto his Father, to the end (saith he) that they all may bee one, as thou O Father art in mee, and I in thee, euen that they may bee also one in vs. And Saint Iohn saith likewise of him, that hee should gather together in one the children of God which were scattered. For seeing hee came to destroy the workes of the diuell, (as he sayeth elsewhere) and seeing it is the nature of this enemy of mankind to scatter, to disioyne and separate, by reason of the enuy and hatred which he beareth to God & men, it must needs be that Iesus Christ should gather together that which the diuell hath scattered, & vnite in one that which he hath separated: to the end that as man was one with God, before he was seuered by sin through the enuy and malice of Sathan, so hee might returne into vnity and vnion with his Creator by the abolishing of sinne, which is the cause of the separation, and by the likenes of vertue with God through the meanes of Iesus Christ. Therefore so great goodnes and beneficence of God towards vs, ought to enflame our loue towards him, and moreouer to encrease the same, when we daily feele new benefits powred vpon vs, which proceed & come from his burning loue and charity wherewith he loueth vs, although he receiue no benefite thereby. For we are to vnderstand, that although he which hath receiued a benefite from another, ought to carry greater loue towards him, then he that bestowed the benefite is bound towards the other to whom he hath done a good turne, yet the contrary oftentimes falleth out. The cause whereof is, because his loue that bestoweth a good turne proceedeth from his owne bounty and goodnes, whereas the loue of him that receiue a benefite, commeth of necessitie. So that the one hath a great deale better foundation then the other. For that loue which proceedeth of necessity respecteth our selues, because we loue for the good which wee haue receiued, and not in regard of the person from whom the good commeth. And this loue proceedeth from the loue we beare to our selues, so that it ought rather to be called Loue of concupiscence, then true Loue. For as wee loue the person that doth vs good, because of the good which we receiue, so we loue him & wish his good, not so much for it selfe as for our selues, and for that profite, which wee hope will come to vs thereby. But after we haue begunne with this kinde of Loue, it serueth vs oftentimes as a steppe for to passe by afterwards vnto true and perfect loue. For acquainting our selues to loue them that doe vs good, we learne afterward to loue them, not onely for loue of that good which they doe vnto vs, but also because of themselves: in so much that we will not cease to loue them although it fall out so that they can doe vs no more good, yea although they stand in neede of the like good at our hands againe. Now when wee are come to this degree, our loue is a great deale more pure, yea, then is it true loue which now loueth not the person beloued onely for loue of it selfe, but for loue of him, euen with the like loue wherewith it hath bene and yet is loved of him. And as he that loueth, is void of true loue if he loue onely in respect of the good he receiue, so he that doth good, loueth not with true loue, if he doe it to receiue some profite thereby, and with hope of recompence, & not merely for his loue, to whom he doth it. For such a man respecteth himselfe more then him whom he pretendeth to loue. Such is the loue of hypocrites towards God. Therefore they honour and serue him as hirelings doe, so long as he vseth them well, and they see reward, as Sathan accused and slandered Iob before God, as though he serued him for no other cause but for the benefits which he receiued of his goodnesse. Whereupon it pleased God to take trial of that loue which his seruant bare vnto him, to confound the slanderer, and to propound to euery one in the person of his seruant Iob, an example and patterne of true feare, of true loue, of true faith, & of true patience. We see then that there are two sortes of hired loue, because it may be such, not only in respect of him that receiue a benefit, but of him also that bestoweth it when he doth it for the causes aforesaid. But he that doth good only of charity and loue hath no such scope, but looketh only to the good, which he delighteth to communicate to others in respect of that goodnes which is in himselfe. Therefore he hath a more sure and excellent begining of his loue, namely, his owne goodnes & wil, then he hath that receiue the good, whose loue beginneth at neede and want. That loue also which is grounded vpon goodnesse goeth on more easily and with greater courage from good to better, then that which commeth from necessity proceedeth to good. For hee that doth good, imparteth the same frankly of his owne good will because he will do so: and therefore it redoundeth to his great honour. But he that receiue a good turne, taketh it because he hath need of it: and therefore he must acknowledge himselfe bound to his Benefactor. For this cause he is somewhat ashamed of his need & want. For as S. Paul witnesseth according to the saying of Iesus Christ, It is a blessed thing to give rather then to receive. Therefore that may well be said in this respect, which is commonly spoken, namely, that although Loue be of the nature of fire, which alwaies mounteth vpward, yet doth it descend but neuer ascend. For Fathers and Mothers alwayes loue their children, yea their childrens childre better then their children loue them. The like may be said of others that are in the place of parents. And by a greater reason this may be spokee of the loue of God our Father towards vs, as also of the loue of Christ Iesus. For he did not onely loue vs before we loued him, yea, euen then when we were yet his enemies, but now also we come farre short of louing him as he loueth vs. Therefore he is called by Saint Iohn, not onely louing and charitable, but euen Loue it selfe. For as he is the Creator of all things, so he loueth, perfecteth, and preserveth them all, and turneth them vnto himselfe. But among all other things which drawe Loue, nothing is of greater force then loue it selfe. For as one fire draweth another, so is it with loue: for one draweth and engendreth another. Therefore if we would be loued, wee our selues must loue. But when the contrary falleth out, namely, that we are hated of them towards whom we are well affected, it is because he that is loued doth not know nor feele the loue that is borne him. For likenes hath such force and vertue in loue, that it is as it were the mother therof. For seeing every one by nature loueth himselfe greatly, and similitude is as it were the same in many, it causeth him that resembleth vs, to bee as it were our selues, whereupon it followeth, that the same likenesse which causeth vs to loue one another, induceth him also to loue vs. And againe, loue causeth him that doth loue to engraue and imprint in his heart, that face and image which he loueth: so that the heart of him that loueth is made like to a looking glasse, in which the image of the party beloued shineth and is represented. Therefore when he that is loued, beholdeth and acknowledgeth himselfe in him that loueth him, he is moued and whetted on to loue him againe, as one within whom hee knoweth himselfe to be as it were Inhabitant, yea as a second selfe. Moreover, he that loueth doth as it were deprime himselfe of himselfe, and giue him selfe to whom he loueth. Therefore he that is beloued accompreth him deare, and is as carefull of him as of a thing of his own. So that if we loue God, we shall be in his heart, as if our image were engrauen there: and his image also shall be in ours, yea, hee will be carefull of vs, as of his owne children, as wee likewise will be very carefull of his honour and glory. And the more wee know his loue towards vs, the liker we shall be vnto him, and shall loue him the more: as hee in like manner will loue vs the more. Now because men can neither see nor know one anothers heart and will to iudge of their loue, we must declare the same by outward workes. For none but God knoweth the hearts and wills of men. Neuerthelesse hee will haue vs to manifest by workes our loue towards him and our neighbours, as he hath shewed vs his loue by giuing himselfe with all his benefits vnto vs. Therefore we must yeelde testimony of our loue, by obeying his word & keeping his holy commandments, the fulfilling of which consisteth in true and perfect charity. But forasmuch as the loue of men is so disordered now adays, we are to take good heede, and to looke diligently that we deceiue not our selues, by louing that which we ought not to loue, esteeming that to be a good thing which is wicked, and well done that which is ill done: to the end, that our loue, be not inordinate, and bestowed vpon false and euill things, and so prooue a vicious desire rather then true loue. Therefore it shall be good, if following our matter, we consider what this affection of cupidity or desire is properly, and what are the kindes of it, and how wee may separate it from Loue. Let vs then hearken to ARAM discoursing of this matter.

Of Desire and Coueting, and of the kinds of ill: of the infinitnesse of mens desire, and what Good is able to satisfie and content it: of the difference betweene Desire and Loue, and of the vttermost limits and end of Loue. Chap. 51.

A*RAM.* As at the entry of a Forrest some one path may seeme to bee broad and beaten enough, yet afterward when a trauailer is well entred into it, he beginneth to loose it by little and little, and being amazed, the farther he walketh on, the more he wandereth out of his way: even so when as sensuality inuiteth vs to the fruition of some object, we thinke it an easie matter to attaine therunto, and hope to get some great good thereby: but the further we enter into and follow that path, which our concupiscence doth shew vnto vs, the worse we finde the way to bee and can see nothing before vs but a large fielde full of thornes and thistles, which notwithstanding seeme for a time vnto fore eyes to bee faire flowers of very goodly fruit. But the tastling of them alwaies bringeth with it a long and late repentance in the end. Now as the body of the Sun when he first riseth may be easily looked vpon, but after being mounted vp certaine degrees in the Zodiacke, dazeleth the eyes of them that behold it: so we may in some sort know our euill when it beginneth first, but when it hath gathered full force it wholly dimmeth our reason, and yeeldeth to no counsaile. Therefore before any passion grow to be strong, we must labour, that whatsoeuer shall be rashly desired, may be suppressed by a prudent and an aduised discourse.

We haue heard by our former speech, that Desire and Coueting is an appetite or longing to obtaine some Good which we iudge is profitable vnto vs, or to preferue it if wee haue it already. For this cause we must alwaies consider aduisedly what Goods wee want, whether they be necessary for vs or no, whether we seeke after them, either because we neede them, or for profit sake, or else only to satisfie the vanitie of our minde, and our foolish and carnal affections. For there are some Goods so necessarij for vs, that without them we can neither liue, nor preferue our life. The necessitie and want of these is ficly called naturall, and ought rather in deed to be termed appetites then desires. In the number of these Goods are meates, drinks, clothing, dwelling places, Phisicke, fire, water, and such like things which mans life cannot be without. Therefore our appetite to these things is wakened as it were by a certaine naturall instigation, which pricketh and prouoketh the soule to make it desire and seek them, so that they stay not vntill iudgement haue giuen sentence, but proceed on forward as we may see, by experience in hunger and thirst. It is not therefore without cause said, that the belly hath no eares. But there are other goods not altogether so necessary for mans life, which yet we cannot be without when neede requireth, and they serue to this vse, that men might liue more commodiously and better at ease: as wine, exquisitnesse in dressing and preparing of meates, spices, and many such like things. For it is certaine, that although there were no wine nor any artificiall drinke, yet nature would be content and could well away with water: and although meate be not so delicate, nor so well and finely dressed as it might bee, yet will it nourish well enough, so it be naturall. The same may be said of the rest, of which there is great vse in the life of man, and of those pleasures and delights which we take by all the corporall senses. The desires of these things are not to be condemned, seeing they are naturall also, provided alwaies that moderation bee kept in them. For God hath not created any creature, which he will not haue man to vse, so that he abuse it not, but being contented with those pleasures which he permitteth vnto him, keep himselfe within the limits thereof & fall into no excesse, neither lath out beyond all reason and measure.

There is yet an other sort of goods wherof we haue spokē before, which is more in fancie and in opinion then in any other thing, namely, the getting & possessing of silver, of riches, of power, of honor, and of glory. These goods fil men ful of innumerable desires, which haue neither measure, terme, nor end, insomuch that amongst all creatures liuing none is so burdened with them as man: who notwithstanding might well satisfie himselfe with a few, if he could be content with that which will suffice nature, and follow her. And therefore of all

Euils must be resisted in the beginning.

What desire is Diversity of Goods.

Goods belonging to this life.

Goods of fancy & in opinion only.

these sorts of desires mentioned by vs, we may well say, that those which concerne naturall things haue some limitation, but such as concerne things found and inuented by men, haue no bound nor measure at all in them. For what end is there in the coueting of riches, honours, glory and such like things? True it is, that of their own nature, and as being the creatures and gifts of God, they are not ill: but they become such through the fault of men, I mean through their insatiable coueting & abusing of them, and through that false opinion, which commonly we haue of them. For we propound these things to our selues, that we may liue with greater ease, pleasure and rest: but it falleth out cleane contrary. For beeing such goods as reach not vnto the spirit, they cannot profit the same: or if they doe reach vnto it, yet the profit that cometh by them is very light and vaine. For they are not able to found the bottome thereof, it is so profound & capable, much lesse are wee to thinke that they can make vs happy. Nay, they are so far from performing this, that it is impossible to beleue how troublesome it is to the spirit to search and find them out, and to obtaine & keep them.

couetousnes.

For after that ambition and couetousnes be once moued & pricked forward through false opinions and vaine iudgements, they grow and waxe disordered out of measure. For the spirit thinketh in it selfe, that if once it could get either those honors & glory, or that mony & riches which it wisheth for, it should be very happy, and liue at great ease and rest. But when it hath obtained that, it is not only in the same estate wherein it was before, but oftentimes far worse, and lesse contented. The reason is, because the spirit considereth not, that those things which it laboureth to get, are vnable of their owne nature to afford that which it requireth of them. Whereupon, not knowing his own vice and foolish imagination, it is perswaded that this falleth out so in respect of the greatnes & excellency of that thing wherunto it aspireth, and therefore not hauing gotten so much as is requisite fully to satisfie the desire it hath, it setteth it selfe to get more. And when it hath proceeded in this sort, yet it is alwayes new to begin, being as far from contentation, yea a great deale further then it was before. So that we may conclude, that desire or coueting is bottomlesse, and voide of al stay. Therefore we must know, that the meere wants of this life, doe neither breed nor encrease these desires in vs, but they proceede from a false opinion and perswasion, which we haue of them. For it is certaine, that the opinion wee conceiue of those wants, which wee imagine wee haue, breedeth such a feare in vs, as ingendreth & encreaseth these desires. And the carking care to preserue those things that are without vs, namely, externall goods, proceedeth from the same fountaine. For our foresight stretcheth it self not only to vrgent necessities, or to such as we verily thinke are to come to passe, but even to all those that may any way happen: so that we propound to our selues all the wants in the world, as if heauen and earth should faile vs. Besides, many doe not onely looke to those necessities which they may feare, but also to those pleasures, which they would haue. For they suppose that by meanes of power, riches, authority, and dignities, they may attaine to the fruition of all the pleasures & delights which they wish for. And when a man hath tasted of pleasure, this taste doth breede another desire to continue therein, and to preserue those means wherby they may alwaies enioy such pleasure. Wherby we may iudge how the desire & coueting that is in man, wandreth & goeth astray, when as notwithstanding it is given him of God, to the end he might wish for that which he iudgeth to be good for him, and that he might follow after it, and hauing obtained the same might hold and keepe it fast.

of coueting.

Now forasmuch as God is the true, stedfast, and firme good of man, hee doth naturally wish and desire him: and because this good is infinit, it falleth out thereupon that the largenesse, length, and depth of our coueting is infinite, and can be filled with no other thing but with God, Wherefore when it is comethither, there it staeth and resteth it selfe. But whilest it wandreth hither and thither, there will be no end, but one desire begetteth another: insomuch that there are infinite kindes of them, which take their particular names of those things which they couet. For the vnmeasurable coueting of honours is called ambition: of gold and silver, couetousnesse: of meates and drinckes, gluttony and drunkennes: the vnlawful and immoderate desire and coniunction between man & woman, is called Whoredome: which also hath diuers kindes vnder it, according to the desire of their filthinesse and enormities in whom it aboundeth. The vertues opposite and contrary to these vicious desires, are iustice, liberality, continency, chastity, and temperance: of which vertues & vices, and of others proceeding of them, we haue discoursed at large in our first morall institution.

Two sorts of Loue.

Therefore to conclude that which hath beene hitherto spoken of Loue and of Desire, I thinke we ought to make two sorts of Loue, the one in vertue, the other in vice. For that

Loue

Loue proceeding of Desire and Coueting, such as we see commonly in men, is false and faigned. And because it counterfaiteth often the actions of true loue, therefore we ought to be very wary, that it beguile vs not, and that wee take not the one for the other. Concerning the first, we must remember, that all loue is begotten of Good, that it bendeth and draweth towards Good, as we haue already learned. Now Good is of that nature, that it breedeth in vs a desire to be ioyned vnto it, in regard of that agreement which it hath with vs: of which agreement and coniunction commeth delight, and then blessednesse and felicitie. So that the vtmost bounds and limits of Loue is to be knit together in vniety as much as may bee. And the straighter and closer the bond of loue is tyed and conioyned in one and the same essence, so much the more truly and perfectly is loue come vnto his end, & consisteth in the perfection of his nature. Therefore desire of coniunction which is in Loue is giuen to man, to the ende he should wish and couet to be vnited with God his true Good, that being made as it were a little God like vnto him, he might be partaker of his eternall blessednesse. This is the true, firme, and fruitfull coniunction of Loue, and the great and excellent reward thereof. For all the rest are nothing in comparison of this, but onely vaine and fruitlesse. Now the loue of the body desireth the coniunction of the body, and the loue of soules desireth to be ioyned with soules, that there may be as it were one soule in many bodies. And this coniunction is the greatest, truest, and of longest continuance, which caueth but one heart and one will among friends, as if they were one onely body, and one onely soule, and as if he that loueth were the same party that is beloved. Therefore it is written of the first Christians that were in the Church of Ierusalem, that the multitude of them that beleued were of one heart and one soule; neither any of them said, that any thing of that which hee possessed, was his own, but they had all things common. Neither is it said without reason in common prouerbe, That all things are common among friends: which is the cause that a friend calleth and accompteth as his owne, whatsoever belongeth to his friend, whether it be in prosperitie or in aduersitie. Therefore also it is commonly saide, that a stedfast friend is tryed in doubtful matters. Whereupon it commeth to passe in true loue, that friends lift vp into great dignity, are more careful of those whom they loue (how base soeuer they be) and of their affaires, then of themselves and of their particular estate. Moreouer we are to knowe, that as it is the nature of Loue to ioine together, so doth it also bring equality with it, so far forth as the nature of those things that are conioyned, wil beare in so much that the highest steepe down to the lowest, to lift them vp vnto themselves, and they that are equall associate themselves together. Therefore as we haue often said, that the fountaine and paterne of all true loue is in God, so in this point it doth chiefly shew it selfe vnto vs. For hee abaseth himselfe to our smalnesse, as though he would reach vs his hand from heauen, or draw and lift vs vp vnto himselfe by the meane of Iesus Christ, in whom and by whom wee are truly vnited vnto him. But here wee are to know that the desire, lust, or coueting which is bred of Loue groweth to be vicious through the corruption of our nature which otherwise being directed by good meanes and by reason according to the will of God, and aiming at the right Good which is God, would cause vs to loue God first for his owne sake, and then his creatures in him, and for the loue of him. Neither should wee euer couet worldly goods with an vnbridled desire, but would rather accompt all mortal things vnworthy to be cared for by our immortall soules. Whereunto we shall be the rather perswaded, if following that which we haue begun to speake of true and false loue, and of the difference between them, we consider what good things are to be found in the one about the other, what sundry rewards men propound vnto themselves in loue, what knowledge is required therein, and how the one is increased by the other. This then shalbe thy matter subiect, A CHITO B, which thou shalt take to make an ende of our discoursing of the nature of Loue.

ACHITO B. Good is loued so much as it is knowne, and as wee are able to vnderstand what it is. For things are first known, to the end they may be loued. Now there are three

Three means to knowledge

meanes of knowledge in our soule, namely, by sense, by reason, and by the minde. From the sense springeth appetite: which is common to vs with beasts: from reason groweth election, which is proper to man: and from the mind and spirit, in which the image of the diuine essence is engrauen, proceedeth the will. As then sense knoweth none but sensible & corporal things, so the appetite desireth onely the same things: and as the mind of it owne nature inclineth to the contemplation of spirituall and intelligible things, so the will feedeth and contenteth it selfe onely with internall & heavenly goods. Now man, that is to say the soule, by nature reasonable, being placed as it were in the midst of these two extreames, and sustaining wonderfull assaults and combates through the impression of these two contraries, taketh part one while with the desires of this side, an other while of that, according as he inclineth by his election either to this part or to that, by stooping down to the sense, or by lifting vp himselfe to the mind. But because of the darknes of error, which shadoweth his reason, it is very necessary that the spirit of GOD work mightily therein, to this end that by the power and vertue thereof, the naturall affection of earthly things, which offer violence to all the powers of the soule, might bee transported and lift vp to the desire of celestiall and eternall things.

The cause of mens error
from the true
Good.

Truely forasmuch as Good is the object of Loue, good reason it is that we should lift it vpward, and separate it from the earth as much as wee may. For as so many rash affections, which are the spring of all vices, haue their beginning from earthly loue: so contrariwise celestiall and heavenly loue adorneth the soule with two excellent ornaments, namely, wisdom and vertue, the ground of all true Beauty, in which all good, all contentation and felicitie consisteth. And this loue which hath GOD for his ende and scope, hath three great benefits among many others, which are not to bee found in any other loue, especially in that of concupiscence. For first, there is no good so excellent in the enioying of earthly things, but it is mingled with some thing that may displease vs, or some way harme vs. Whereupon taking it to bee a lesse benefite, and not altogether so good for vs, wee are of this iudgement, that it is the lesse to bee wished for of vs. But there is no such thing in God. Therefore if the soule of man did beholde him by contemplation, not such a one as he is (for that is impossible) but as shee might contemplate him notwithstanding she is enclosed in this body, shee would bee rauished in her loue with greater vehemency, then shee is stirred vp to embrace that, which of all mortall and transitorie thinges shee iudgeth best and certaine. For shee should know, that God is a Good, wherein there is nothing mingled, that may breede yrkesomnesse, or be hurtfull, but is altogether profitable and full of pleasure. Although it cannot bee gaine sayde, but that the contrary seemeth to come to passe oftentimes, when we see that they which loue God as they ought, and which by meanes of this loue are driven forward & induced to procure his honor and glorie with all their might, are commonly most visited with griefes, losses, and sorrowes. Whereof it commeth to passe, that many are alienated from this loue, because they greatly dislike that troublesome estate. But we must know that this humane and friuolous consideration proceedeth onely of this, that the price of loue is diuersly valued. For there is one kinde of loue that is perpetuall and firme, and another which is temporary, according as the present motion of the heart pricketh one forward to follow any thing, because at that instant it seemeth vnto him to be good, or in regard of the profit, which he seeth therein, or of appearance of good, which he imagineth is in it. As for example, we know wel, that health is a greater good, then is the swallowing down of dainty morsels, the pleasure whereof passeth away very quickly.

And yet it commeth often to passe, that our appetite stirreth vs forward with such vehemency, that meere lickerishness causeth vs to eate such meates as we know are contrary to our health. The reason hereof is, because we compare not the good that is in taste, and in dainty fare, which so dainly passeth away, with that which is in health, which is of a longer continuance: or else because we thinke there will not come so great hurt thereof as there may come, or else we hope easily to remedy the same. And thus is it with them that consider not what great good there is in God, but forget him, or els suppose that they can easily recover that which they shall lose, by following after a terrestrial and transitorie Good, which causeth them to turne aside from God. For if they thought well vpon it, & knew what losse they receiued, they would neuer suffer themselves to be governed by their appetits & worldly desires. But the bare imagination & consideration of honours and of earthly goods doth so daze the eyes of their minde, that they cannot know the greatness & excellency of celestiall all goods, which they forsake for those other, whereas contrariwise, if they were not altogether blinde, they should perceiue, that this light affliction of good men, which passeth away in a moment, bringeth forth in them an eternall waight of most excellent glory, and maketh the partakers of God, who is the perpetual & stedfast reward of their true & holy loue. Now touching the second benefit, which being in his loue, is not to be found in the loue of creatures, we are to know, that this latter is alwaies in feare & care for that thing which it loueth, least some euil should befall it. So that notwithstanding any security that may be had, yet there is alwaies some vexation in all loue towards men & towards mortall things. But in that loue which is towards God there is nothing but delight without care, griefe, or disquietnes. For we are very certaine, that all things are most safe there, full of ioy & lasting happiness. And for the third, we see that in the loue of concupiscence, there is commonly enuy & euill ielousie (which is one kinde of it) because many couet that which one alone would wholly possesse. But it is cleane contrary in the true loue of the soule, wherein is vprightnes and fellowship. For he that loueth vertue and a vertuous man, is so farre from being ielous, that he would not only haue many companions, but wisheth that all men in the world were like affected with him. The same may be said of him that loueth God. For he would haue all men his companions in that amity, & iudgeth all those to be miserable & wretched, which are estranged from it. As for that friend, who would alone loue his friend, hee loueth not perfectly, but rather loueth some thing in him that is profitable to himselfe, as namely, to enioy alone whatsoeuer good hee iudgeth to be in his friend: which is the nature of the loue of concupiscence that looketh inwardly to it selfe. But true friendship looketh outwardly vpon him whome it loueth, insomuch that hee which loueth, liueth in him. Wherefore Saint Paul not onely knowing the nature of true loue, but also hauing felt by experience the vehemencie thereof, saith, I liue, yet not I now, but Christ liueth in mee. For hee that truly loueth, careth no more for himselfe, but for that thing which he loueth. This degree of loue may be rightly called Rauihing, in which the louer is so rapt out of himselfe, that he forgetteth himselfe altogether, being wholly in him whom hee loueth, & he whom he loueth being in him. But as we said in the beginning of our speach, Good is far loued so forth as it is knowne, & as we can vnderstand what it is, therefore it is necessary that the knowledge of it shold be so great, that it be sufficient to draw loue, which encreaseth by thinking offe of that thing which is beloued. For therby it is planted & rooted more deeply in the heart. Wherefore there is nothing more contrary to loue then forgetfulness, the mother of ingratitude, especially in our loue towards God. For the more we thinke of him, the more doe wee call to minde his goodnesse towards vs: wherupon also our loue doth increase, and is inflamed in vs towards him. And the greater and more burning our loue is, the neerer are we vnited and linked vnto him. Therefore we may well conclude, that wee loue God according to that measure of knowledge which wee haue of him and of his benefits, and according as wee consider and remember them: and if wee want these things, we loue him not as wee ought. Now when wee are ioyned vnto the thing that is deare vnto vs, according to the end of loue, we know it a great deale better, because we behold it neerer: and then are we said to enioy it.

Hereupon we may note two kindes of knowledge in loue: the one first, the other last. By the first, we beleue that thing to be good, which we doe know: and by the last we haue experience of it, which is of great force in all loue: because the fruit thereof is the fruition of the thing beloued. This enioying is the action of delight & of pleasure, which is not only of the will, but also of the vnderstanding, as it is in God. And if we take it so. Loue shall be as the meane betweene the first knowledge which is onely begun, and the last, which is full and perfect: which consisteth in the vnion of him that loueth with him that is beloued, and wherein the desire that is in Loue, and which afflicteth & tormenteth the party louing, is alwaies abolished, not the loue it selfe: but being vnited, the greater number and the more excellent it findeth the goods in regard of those which the first knowledge afforded, the more is it encreased and inflamed. Hereof it is that we put a difference betweene Loue and the Desire that is in Loue, because when we loue a thing, we desire therewithall the fruition and possession thereof. And if there be delay made, so that we cannot enioy the thing so soone as we would, this delay tormenteth vs by reason of the desire, which presseth and pricketh vs forward to get the possession of it. But this torment commeth not of Loue, then which there is nothing more sweete and pleasant, but of that desire which endeth in the vnion and fruition of the thing beloued: In the meane time as long as this desire lasteth, the loue from whence it proceedeth, causeth the torment to be abated, yea it is not without some pleasure, especially when there is some hope that at length it may be obtained & brought about. And the more confident this hope is, the greater solace, yea the greater delight and pleasure it bringeth withall. For as loue hath great delight in vnion and fruition, so is it not small in hope, because it propoundeth vnto vs the enioying of the thing as being present, euen as if our imagination had already led vs vnto it. Therefore forasmuch as the hope of Gods children is certaine, they are now being in this world as it were blessed in heauen, although the desire which they haue of greater goods hoped for yet, and to bee enioyed in that full vnion & coniunction which they shal haue with God in the life everlasting, causeth them to groane & to sigh continually with all the creatures, waiting for their full and perfect deliuerance from all corruption and from this miserable life. So that we can not doubt but that our loue towards GOD will be far greater and much more vehement, when as we shall haue this full fruition of God our soueraigne Good, and when wee shall be perfectly vnited vnto him by true Loue, not seeing him obscurely in a glasse only, or knowing him in part, as we doe now, but beholding him face to face, & knowing him as we haue bin knowne of him. For the knowledge which we haue now of him is yet but begunne, in respect of that which we shal haue fully and wholly in that glorious and immortall life. And then also we shall be wholly swallowed vp with loue. By the same reason wee may well beleeue, that the loue and charity which the godly beare one towards another in this mortall life & pilgrimage, shall be a great deale more enflamed in the other life, then euer it was in the holiest and most perfect that euer was amongst them in this world. For the better mens friends are, the more stedfast & firme is their friendship, which among good men is alwaies of long continuance: but contrariwise with the wicked. And to speake properly there is no friendship betwixt them, but onely some familiarity and fellowship, or to speake better, a conspiracy against right, and common peace. Howsoeuer it bee, whether familiarity or fellowship, it is very short and weake, because it hath no good foundation. Wherefore they can not long continue vnited and knit together. We haue daily testimony hereof in worldly & carnall men, who hauing made for a time profession of very great friendship, vpon a Yea or a Nay, assault one an other euen vnto death. But we are not greatly to maruaile at it. For seeing their amitie and vnion is ill grounded, as it cannot be of long continuance, so they can receiue no great ioy or delight. But it is contrary in the friendship of men, as that which hath a farre better foundation, namely, God and his word. Wherefore if the better men, that friends be, the greater their friendship is and more firme euen in this world, no doubt but it will be greater, more burning and constant in that blessed and eternal life which we expect, where we shall bee much better men and more perfect then we are heere, better linked one with an other, as also we shall bee altogether a great deale more conioyned with and in God. For this cause Saint Paul had good reason to say, that Loue doeth neuer fall away, though prophecies bee abolished, or tongues cease, or knowledge vanish away. Wherefore in this respect he concludeth, that Loue is the greatest of these three, Faith, Hope, and Loue. But wee haue spoken enough of the nature of Loue for the subiect of our discourse of the naturall history of man. Now I thinke it will not be vnprofitable, if wee say somewhat of other affections that are neere neighbours vnto Loue and ioyned with it, as of fauour, reuerence, honour & piety, which haue such good or ill qualities in man, as the nature of that loue hath which bringeth them forth, as ASER will giue vs to vnderstand.

Of fauour, reuerence, and of honour: of their nature and effects: of those outward signes whereby they shew themselves: of pietie and compassion, and how agreeable it is to the nature of man. Chap. 53.

ASER. I cannot maruaile enough at the drowlines of many great spirits, who are so delighted with the vaine dreames of their owne fancies, that they employ all the gifts & graces of their minde, to lift vp euen vnto the heauens the pleasures that are received in the loue of humane and mortall things, especially in the fruits of concupiscence, & yet the least of them cannot be gotten without a thousand troublesome discommodities, besides that they leaue alwaies in man an insatiable desire of them. I would aske of them gladly, whē the most voluptuous man of the al, hath not, euen in the midst of his pleasures, sighed & bin subiect to passions, desiring some other thing besides: or whē there was euer found between twaine twaine that loued each other vncorruptly, that conformity of wils, that communication of thoughts, those continuall agreements, and that concord of life, which is necessary in all true loue: especially seeing it is a hard matter, yea impossible to see a wicked man; that is not daily at variance with himselfe, insomuch that if hee could leaue himselfe, as two men forsake each other, there are many, who vpon euery occasion would leaue themselves to take another body, or another soule. And as when one being very desirous to eate, and therupon falling asleepe, dreameth that he is feeding & yet is not satisfied, because it is not a dreame of meate that wil content the sence & appetite, which seeketh to be appeased, but substantial meate it selfe: euen so it falleth out when men dreaming in spirit, which is as pernicious a thing as the sleepe of death, giue themselves by a certaine inclination which they haue to the loue of Good, to seeke for the beauty, contentation & delight therof vpon earth, when they are not to be found in the whole world. As for their shadowes, which in some sort appeare in corporall & earthly things, and in those delights which proceede of them, they doe not feede their minds with sound & good things, but rather abuse & deceiue the. Therefore we ought to take great heed, that we set not our heart and affection rather vpon those miserable, corruptible & deceivable pleasures, wherein worldlings & carnall men doe glory, then vpon that great and infinite brightnesse, of which the Sunne is but a very small beame, and vpon those singular, blessed, and heavenly truthe, which the word of life doth teach vs, & which are the onely true & solide meates that can content & satisfie our spirits eternally.

A similitude
vanity of the loue of world
ly delights.

It is certaine that nature moueth vs to set our affection chiefly vpon some onething rather then vpon another: forasmuch as loue is a gift bestowed by the Creatour vpon all natures at the time of their birth. Now vnto Loue many other affections are ioyned, among which Fauour commonly hath the first place. This affection is a kinde of good will and liking, which springeth from a iudgement conceived of some Good, so that wee may call it a Loue begunne. For in this iudgement of Good, we esteeme well of him, towards whom our fauour is extended, and iudge him worthy of some good thing, and by this meanes wee beginne to loue him. Wherefore although fauour may be without true loue, yet loue can not bee without fauour. Notwithstanding, when wee fauour one before wee loue him, euen then already wee enter presently into the way that leadeth to loue him. And for the least shadow of loue in our heart towards another, wee fauour him: as wee see it in those that are linked vnto vs by some degree either of consanguinitie, or of affinity, or by meanes of some acquaintance & knowledge. Now forasmuch as GOD loveth vs, he beareth vs fauour also, although not in the regard or for the iudgement of any good, which he seeth in vs or in our corrupted nature: but because of the loue he beareth vs in Iesus Christ, his welbeloued, in whom by his grace he hath made vs acceptable to himselfe. Therefore this fauour bringeth with it the perfection of all Good vnto vs. For what can he want that is fauoured of God, who can doe all things? This fauour which God beareth vnto vs, is called grace and blessing in the holy Scriptures, which comprehendeth all those benefits which we receiue of his goodnesse. For they proceede all of this fauour, and this fauour of the loue he beareth vs in Iesus Christ. Reuerence also commonly accompanieth loue, whereby we vnderstand an affection proceeding from the iudgement of some great good, that hurteth vs not. For if we thought it would hurt vs, there would be feare ioyned with hatred, and not true reuerence. For although there is euermore in all reuerence, some feare mingled with shamesfastnesse, neuertheless this feare bringeth no hatred with it. This reuerence is bredde in vs by comparing the greatnesse of another with our smalnesse, as if we admired those excellent things that are in him. For as the heart doth enlarge it selfe through the consideration and opinion it hath of his owne greatnesse, so doth it restraine and close vp it selfe vpon the reputation and conceipt of another mans greatnesse, so it be good or at leastwise without hurt. Therefore if wee compare our greatnes with some other mans that is farre greater, we know our owne smalnesse thereby.

Why God fa-uoureth vs.

Of reuerence

Whereupon it commeth to passe, that we doe not onely esteeme worse, but euen dislike and contemne our selues: by which meanes we become more humble, whereas before we were puffed vp with pride through the opinion of our greatnes, of which wee haue experience as often as wee compare our selues with God, and lift vp our spirit euen to the consideration of his diuine maiesty, comparing that with our basenesse. For then beeing rauished with admiration of his highnesse, wee honour and reuerence him by reason of his power, vnto which wee ioine also his wisdom and goodnesse. And according vnto that reuerence wee beare towards him, wee doe reuerence those also

in whome we see the same gifts and graces shine. For power breedeth reuerence, and goodnesse loue. Wherefore if we iudge, that power and greatnesse are ioyned with goodnesse and tempered therewithall, we shall not onely be moued to reuerence, but this reuerence also will engender loue, as it is in the hearts of the faithfull towards God: because that as they consider him almighty and the greatest of all, so they behold him most wise and most good. But as I haue already touched, if wee thinke that this greatnesse or power either is or will bee hurtfull vnto vs, there is another kinde of reuerence, which onely hath feare that breedeth hatred, as it is in them that consider the power of God onely, and the rigor of his iudgement, not meditating of his clemency & benignity. Therefore as the great excellency which in all things appeareth in God, especially in power, wisdom and goodnes, induceth vs to reuerence him aright: so if we would haue men to honour & reuerence vs, there must be excellent vertues in vs, in which men may see the image of God to shine, that so he may be honoured and reuerenced in vs & we in him. For therein consisteth that true honour, & that true reuerence which we ought to seeke for & to desire. And although reuerence hath respect principally to the diuine maiesty (at the name of which euery knee ought to bow) & to those superiorities which are images thereof, vnto which they that are of lesse degree, estate & condition, ought to giue honor & service, neuertheless mutual reuerence is necessary in al true friendship, as wel in respect of the party beloued, as of him that loueth. And indeed we see how that true friends reuerence & honor one another, & al because of that good opinion which they haue conceiued each of others desert. Concerning this word Honour, it is properly a token, wherby we testifie that wee iudge him to bee endued with vertue whome wee honour. VVherefore as the consideration of vertue breedeth honour, so honour breedeth reuerence, and then honour and reuerence breede maiesty, which is the highest degree of honour, & encreaseth continually according as those vertues and good things excell, which induce vs to honour them. For if the vertues bee meane, wee honour them with a more simple honour, if greater, wee adde thereunto reuerence: and then maiesty is that honour which can bee giuen vnto the very greatest of all men. And as this affection of honour is in our heart, wee shew it forth by diuers outward signes, wherby we signifie and testifie, that we acknowledge their greatnesse and excellency whom wee honour, and that we submit our selues thereunto. Therefore the more humble and modest a man is, the readier he will bee to yeeld reuerence and honour to them vnto whom it is due. Contrariwise, the more drunken a man is with the loue of himselfe, the more he will presume of himselfe: and the greater this presumption is in him, the lesse will hee desire that another should be more excellent then himselfe, and wil be the hardlier perswaded to beleue it is so. Therefore he will hardly yeelde to giue him honour and reuerence. But Saint Paul admonisheth the children of God to goe before one another in giuing honour, and to be of like affection one towards another, not being high minded, neither wise in themselves, that is to say, arrogant and selfe-weening, presuming very much of themselves. So that as pride or humility aboundeth in vs, God, our superiours and friends shall be more or lesse honoured by vs. As for those signes, wherby we testifie this honour and reuerence, wee are to note that they are many, according to the diuersities of nations and countries, & of their manners. Most commonly we vse to bend the knee, in testimony that we abase and submit our selues to those vnto whom we doe this honour. Likewise we vncouer the head, which is a token of seruitude, according to the custome of the Grecians and of the Romanes. There are many other such like signes, as to rise vp, to giue place, to accompany, to salute, and infinite others, which would bee too long to rehearse, and without profite: all which we call bearing of honour and reuerence, or yeelding of reuerence. Wherefore although God looketh chiefly to that which is within, and not to that which is without, yet will hee haue vs by externall signes to declare that honour which wee owe and beare vnto him, and by them to yeeld him homage. Thus he requireth that we should testifie our faith and our loue towards him, by confession of mouth and by all good workes, that there may bee alwaies an agreement betweene the body and the soule, betweene the heart, mouth and hands, and betweene the workemaster that worketh, and his instruments and workes, to the end that the one may be known by the other. For if the outward signes agree not with the hart, we make them false witnesses, as the tong is when it lieth. For they beare witnes to that which is not: which is right hypocrisie, displeasing God and men. Therefore we must beware of this vice, and take heed that we make no other outward shew, then will stand with the affection of the heart.

Now hauing spoken of honour, reuerence and maiesty, by reason of that coniunction which they haue with loue, as also of fauour & grace, it remaineth now that we should speake some-

Somewhat of Mercie, and compassion, seeing that also hath great agreement with loue. Of Mercy & Mercy then is a griefe conceived in our heart in respect of some euill, which (as we thinke) compassion. is befallen one that hath not deserued it: and this we call also pity and compassion. Now because this affection moueth vs to aide, succour, and to doe good to them that are afflicted, as also to pardon such as haue offended vs, therefore Mercy is often taken in the holy Scriptures for aide, succour, fauour, grace, beneficence, good will, benefiting, friendship, benig- nitie, as also for the affection and inclination of the heart to do good and to succour al them that haue neede of helpe, and this proceedeth of charity. Therefore S. Paul saith, Hee that Rom. 12. 8. 9. showeth mercy, let him doe it with cheerefulness. Let loue be without dissimulation. Abhorre that which 10. is euill, and cleaue to that which is good. Be affectioned to loue one another with brotherly loue: not slothful to doe seruice: fervent in spirit, seruing the Lord, distributing to the necessity of the Saints: gi- uing your selues to hospitalitie. Whereby he admonisheth vs, that al the succours which we giue to others, ought to proceed from a sincere & cheereful affection of the heart, which should prouoke vs to performe the same: and this cannot be in vs without the affection of pitie, of mercy and of compassion. In regard wherof the name of almes is taken from a word which ΕΛΕΟΣ in Greeke signifieth Mercy: and therefore also almes signifieth asmuch as mercy, or that Ελεημοσύνη. succour that is done of mercy and compassion, wherewith we are affected in respect of the miserie of our like. Whereupon it followeth that as euery one is of a more tender heart, so he is more mercifull: as contrariwise hardnesse of heart extinguisheth mercy and compassion. As for this word Compassion, it signifieth asmuch as a like compassion, that is, a like sense and feeling of euill and of griefe, as if we our selues suffered that which we see others endure, by reason of that coniunction which we ought to haue one with another, as members of one 1. Cor. 12. and the same body, among which there is such agreement that if one suffer all feele it, and so all are carefull for it. Therefore it is written in the Epistle to the Hebrewes; that bro- Heb. 13. 3. therly loue continue. Be not (saith he) forgetfull to lodge strangers. Remember them that are in bonds, as though ye were bound with them: and them that are in afflictions, as if ye were also afflicted in the body.

Wherefore we may well conclude, that this affection of mercie is very necessary for men yea as sweet, as milde, and profitable an affection as any can be amongst them, which they haue receiued of God for their mutuall succour and consolation, in the midsts of so many miseries as commonly happen in the life of man. And this hee commandeth vs expressely in infinite places of his word, that the image of his vspeakable mercy might shine in vs by our mercy towards others. Hitherto we haue spoken of man, as of man and of those affections that are most humane in him, now others remaine, which often make him more brutish then any sauage beast that is. For seeing they come of the opinion of euill, they prouoke & stirre him vp greatly, making him marueilous wilde & vntamed. To the end therefore that we may enter into the discourse of this matter, we will first see what Offending and Offence is in the heart and soule, and consider what degrees it hath, and what good or euill may be in this affection. This we shall learne of thee, AMANA.

Of offence in the heart and soule: of the degrees of offence, and of the good and euill that may be in this affection: of contempt that is bred of it, and mockery, which followeth contempt. Chap. 54.

A*MANA*. The Philosophers haue set downe foure cause of al the troubles of the soule, from whence al the residue proceed, and into which they returne and haue their end: namely, immoderate desire, vnbrideled ioy, vnmeasurable griefe, and extreame feare.

Foure causes of all the troubles of the
soule.

These, as they say, proceede through imprudence or ignorance of the minde, & pusillani- mity of heart, from the opinion of good or euill things, present or to come, which wee ima- gine to be in the things of this world, being vnperfect and of small continuance. Now foras- much as these foure causes are the springs of all vices and sinnes, into which men plunge themselves in this life, they are called perturbations of the soule, which if they bee not mas- sited by reason, do so carie the soule hither and thither, that in the end they contraine the reasonable power thereof to giue over all authoritie and libertie, and to obey the lustes of the sensual & vnreasonable Wil. Now desire & ioy, teby comonly accompany the perishing goods of the body. For they are of that nature, that they inflame the soule with an insatiable lust, insomuch that the obtaining of one thing is the beginning of a new and vehement

desire of having another. And the enjoying of them besotteth the spirite with a sugred poison of fained delight and pleasure, vnder the yoke of which it easily suffereth it selfe to be overcome, to be bound and to be gouerned. As for griefe and feare, although they also bee not farre remooued from such false and vading goods of the body, yet for the most part they respect those aduersities and miseries, which in our opinion we iudge to be in the want and priuation of those goods. For they fill the soule with trouble and disquietnesse, as shee that thinketh her estate to be most miserable, if shee obtaine not the ende of her carnall and inordinate affections. So that if the body endure neuer so little, shee casteth foorth strange cryes and complaints. And although the body suffer nothing at al, yet is she alwaies in extreame feare, lest some euill should befall it.

How the passions may bee
good.

But these very passions may be diuided into good and badde. For honest desire, modest ioy, and moderate griefe and feare are naturally in vs, for the preservation of our being. Yea all these affections are endued with the qualities of commendable vertues, if they respect the soueraigne Good of man, as we may learne by our former speeches touching this matter, which were chiefly of good affections, and of such as are most naturall in man. Therefore following our matter subiect, we must from henceforth consider of a great number of other affections of the heart, which for the most part make men more beasllike then the verie beasts themselves, that are voide of all vnderstanding & reason, yea then the wildest beasts that are. All which affections take their beginning from the opinion of euill, as these that are good proceede from the opinion of Good. For the feare of euill doth wonderfully prouoke a man, and when he is touched therewith, he waxeth very sauage and wilde. Now the first sting and biting of euill is offence, by reason that the heart is offended, euen as when one rusheth against a thing and hurteth himselfe. Therefore by offence we vnderstand properly a certaine griefe of the soule and of the heart, which commeth through some touch of euill that agreeth not to our nature. This first sence of griefe is like to the first pricking of ones body: and is contrary to the first pleasure, which we receiue of some Good that is offered vnto vs, and is agreeable to our nature. So that as this pleasure, when it is confirmed, is turned into loue, so out of this first feeling of griefe, which I call offence, the other affections that are ioyned with griefe doe budde foorth afterwarde, namely, anger, hatred, enuy, indignation, reuenge, cruelty and such like. The euill that may offend vs, is whatsoeuer wee iudge to be contrary to vs and to our nature, as well in regard of the body as of the soule. For as

Of offence.

What euill
may offend vs

the body is offended by those euills which trouble the harmony and temperature thereof, and which bring griefe and hurt vnto it: so is it with the soule, and with all the powers, senses and affections thereof. For she may be offended in her imagination and fantasie, in her reason, in her will, and in her affections. Now because every one followeth his affections, or his naturall inclination, and not the right rule and iudgement of reason, it is an easie matter to offend and displease many, and that in many things, but not so easie to please them. For there is but one onely reason, or at leastwise it hath no great diuersity in it. But the naturall dispositions of men are infinite, and wonderfull diuers and disagreeing, yea cleane contrary one to another. And because there is nothing in all the life of man, in which both good and euill are not mingled together, or at leastwise some shew of of them, therefore also there is nothing that not may be taken two waies, either this or that way. Whereupon that which pleaseth some, displeaseth others: beside that the want of the true knowledge of things, and of examining thoroughly what good or euill is in every one of them, is the cause of this error that beguileth men so. But howsoeuer it be, we ought to be very wary that we offend no man by doing euill, and by turning aside from the duties of true charity. And that which offendeth, is so much the more grievous, as it pierceth more inward and deepe into the thing offended. For the chiefest part of any thing is that which is most inward. Wherefore that which entrencheth in so farre toucheth the quicke indeede, and so offendeth and hurteth. For this cause that offence and hurt is very grievous: but those offences that are in the will, are greatest of al. As for those that are in the reason, they are not so grievous: and those that are in the other senses, especially in the senses of the body, are lesse then they. Nay, we thinke not our selues offended at all, if our will be not offended. Therefore wee will suffer many things done by some, which we will not abide in others, according as wee esteeme them to be friends or enemies, and as wee are well or ill affectioned towards them. Likewise many thing please vs that are done or vttered by our selues, which would offend vs if they were spoken or done by others. And for asmuch as there is no offence but where there is sence and feeling, therefore they are soonest offended and most difficult to please that that are most tender and deliuate both of body and soule, whether they be so naturally, or through custome, or of weaknesse. And surely among all liuing creatures man is most testy and can suffer least. For he can beare with nothing, and himselfe is intolerable to all. Wherefore if all men generally be so hard to serue, no maruaile if there be nothing so well, so iustly and holily spoken that can please a whole people, or a great multitude. But some are so accustomed to contemne all things, that they are offended at every thing, & grieved without any iudgement or distinction. Yea, there are some to be found amongst them, that thinke it a point of great wisdom so to doe, and to like of nothing how well soeuer it be done. Now when men are led with such a froward & peeuisht affection, they are very carefull to enquire diligently into all things, but with an vnjust iudgement, to see if they can finde any thing to condemne: thinking thereby to shew their great wit, which notwithstanding none will commend but fooles and ignorant persons. For they must needs be so who admire such a kinde of people, whereas they ought thereby to be moued not onely to despise them, but also to hate and condemne them. For as we vse to speake in common prouerbe, That it is an easier matter to reprehend then to imitate, so it is easier for every one to condemne al, or to commend all indifferently, then to discern aright betweene the good and the euill, and to give a good iudgement therof: because there is none so ignorant, or blockish, or malicious, which cannot doe the first with ease, but the last is not so easily done but by men of good wits and vpright of heart. Now having saide, that of offence is the first sense and feeling of euill, let vs shew that it is not without certaine degrees, by which it ascendeth vp higher. The lowest degree then that is in it, is simply to turn aside from that which displeaseth it: and this degree may be called Dislike or Trouble. The next above that, is when offence waxeth hote in it selfe, and kindleth the heart in such sort, that all the body is moued therewith. And when offence is as it were shut vp, that it cannot range at will, then it turneth into rage, and offereth violence to it selfe, extending it selfe even vnto those that haue not offended it at al. For it is stirred vp, and waxeth sharpe in it selfe, and by this meane it increaseth more and more continually. So that in the end it is like to a mad dog which biteth as many as it meeteth withall. And although this affection doth then testifie sufficiently, that it fauoureth wholly of the corrupt nature of man, neuerthelesse if it wel ordered and did not exceede measure, it were commendable, so that we might iustly place it amongst the affections of nature being sounde, which ought to be the seeds of vertues in vs. For God hath given it vnto man, to the ende hee should presently withdrawe himselfe, as soone as hee perceiueth any euill, even at the first taste and touch of it, that so it may goe no farther, least through custome hee growe into a liking of euill, and afterward follow it with might and mayne. For if hee sodainely retire, as if he touched a serpent and feared to be bitten, hee will depart so farre from it that it cannot hurt him: but if hee stay in it and like it neuer so little, hee cannot withdraw himselfe in such due time, but that he shall feeble some hurt thereby. For euill is like to thornes, which a man cannot come neere vnto, or handle them, but hee shall be pricked: as likewise no man can touch pitch and not be defiled therewith. But the remedy to cure offence so farre forth as it is vicious, is the moderation of the heart, whereby it becommeth so deepe and so well tempered, that it is able with ease to swallow vp and to digest those troubles and offences, which others can in no wise beare or endure. But now that we know what this affection is, we may easily conceiue how it breedeth contempt. For contempt is an offence and displeasure conceived of some euill that cannot hurt, and thereupon is esteemed to be vile and abiect. So that it proceedeth of an euill whereof we are not afraid. For we vse not to despise them whom we feare, but them only of whom we make small account, because they haue not ability to hurt vs howsoeuer they want no good will. Therefore although we desire not to doe him good whom we despise, yet we will not hurt him, if there be in vs but onely a simple contempt of him. We thinke it enough for vs to mocke him, and to shew what small account we make of him, and what smal regard is to be had vnto him.

Hereof it is that proude persons are such great dispisers and mockers of others. For seeing they esteeme of none but of themselves, it cannot be but that they disdain others, & so consequently mocke them. For derision & mockerie follow contempt, and they are expressed by many outward signes, and by diuers kindes of behauiour, which oftentimes are hardlier borne withall and suffered, then greater euils and iniuries which men may receive: as indeed they are blowes and wounds, which pierce even vnto the heart and soule. Therefore contempt and mockerie engender commonly anger in them that cannot digest them with modestie and patience: as the true seruants of God doe, & followers of Iesu: Christ, who sustained so patiently all the contempts and reproches that were offered vnto him, that no euill word or voice euer came out of his mouth, whereby he gaue any signification or signe of wrath, but was alwaies quiet and dumbe, as it were a sheepe before her shearer, according as Esaies had foretolde. Which ought to bee vnto vs an example of all modellie and patience, to the end we may know how to bridle our anger and wrath in time conceiued against all them that offend, contemne and mocke vs. But let vs now consider of other affections, which we said were ioyned with griefe, and followed offence. And first let vs learne what anger is, what are the nature and effects of it, and for what vse it may serue man: and this we shall vnderstand of thee, ARAM.

Of anger, and of the vehemencie and violence thereof: of the difference that is betweene anger and rancour: of the affection of reuenge that accompanieth them: of the motions of the heart in anger, with the effects thereof: wherefore this affection is giuen to man, and to what vse it may serue him, Chap. 55.

Diuers opinions of the Philosophers touching the affections.

A*RAM*. There hath ben alwaies great contentions and disputations amongst the best learned of all the Philosophers, to know whether the affections and passions of the heart and soule were necessary to pricke forward and to helpe men to the effects of vertues, or otherwise hurtfull and contrary vnto them. Aristotle and all the Peripatetians maintained, that all the affections of the soule were not onely naturall, but giuen also by nature to great purpose: as among the rest, anger and choler, which serueth for a pricke to prouoke and stirre vp fortitude and generositie. And because vertue was a habite of that which is good and comely, yea the mediocritie of the affections, therefore it ought not in any sort to be without these motions, neither yet to be too much subiect to passion. For the priuation and want of desire would haue made the soule vnmoueable and without cheerefulness, euen in honest things: as ouer vehement desires altogether trouble it, and set it as it were beside it selfe. The Academikes and Stoikes contended hard against this opinion, alledging many great arguments against it: as this among the rest: That all is eyther vertue or vice, and that there is no meane betweene them: that one of these cannot be the cause of the other, seeing they are directly and in all things contrary, having nothing common betweene them, and therefore that vertue neuer proceeded of vice. And concerning Fortitude and Generositie, which were bredde in the heart by mature consultation & election of reason, that these vertues could by no meanes bee holpen by anger or choler, but rather troubled and hindered in their actions, because such passions did neuer vse any consultation but performed all things inconsiderately and at aduenture. There are many yet to be found amongst vs, that would take part with eyther opinion of these Philosophers, but vnlesse they study thoroughly the booke of nature, and haue the spirit of God for their master and teacher, they shall neuer be able to yeeld causes and certaine reasons of their resolution, nor of the wonderfull effects wrought by the powers of the soule, as we may learne by the sequel of our speech.

How it differeth from offence.

First then we must know, that Anger is a vehement motion of the heart, because it seeth those good things which it hath, to be contemned, wheras it iudgeth them not to be such as ought to be so lightiet by. And herein it thinks it selfe despised. For every one valueth himselfe according to the opiniõ of those good things which he iudgeth to be in himself: therefore there is no anger which cometh not of offence. But al offence is not anger. For offence is more general, & anger more special, albeit they are cõmonly confounded & takẽ one for another. But there are many things that dislike vs, with which notwithstanding we are not angry, because there is no contẽpt of vs ioyned with them. For oftentimes we are grieved by those things that haue neither sense nor vnderstanding, when some thing happeneth against our minde and offendeth vs: and it seemeth that we are prouoked to anger against them, but this is not anger properly, seeing there is nothing but simple offence without contempt of vs. Also it falleth out often, that our blood is heated, and our heart pricked forward and inflamed to doe some great worke, for the performance whereof it is requisite that it should be much moved, but this is onely a kindling of the heart without anger and offence, because it is not stirred vp thereunto by any euill. But when a man letteth loose the bridle vnto this affection in such sort, that hee accustometh himselfe thereunto, this vse and custome turneth it into rancour, which is an inueterate anger that hath taken roote in the heart. Now the better that a man thinkes of himselfe, the sooner hee is offended at every thing, and the readier hee is to bee moued to anger, as taking himselfe to be despised. This is a very vehement and violent affection. For it ouerthroweth very often the whole minde and soule, so that it forgetteth all right, iustice and equitie, all good will and amitie, and pardoneth not, no not women or children, neither yet kinsfolkes or friends. Therefore Salomon saith, That anger is cruell, and wrath is raging: but who can stand before enny? And Ecclesiasticus, Contend not with a cholerike man: for he esteemeth the shedding of blood, as a matter of nothing, and hee will fall vpon thee in place where there shall bee none to helpe thee.

Of rancour.

The violence of anger.

Prou. 27. 4.

Eccles. 3.

To be short, after that anger hath once got the bridle at will, the whole mind and iudgement is so blinded & caried headlong, that an angry man thinkes of nothing but of reuenge. insomuch that he forgetteth himselfe, and careth not what he doth, or what harm will light vpon himselfe in so doing, so that he may be auenged. And many times he will murmur against heaven and earth, and against al the creatures, because they are not moued to reuenge his quarrell: yea, which is worse, he despiseth God himselfe and waxeth wroth against him, blaspheming him, because he taketh not pleasure in seruing his reuenging minde. Which is as much as if he should spee against heaven: and therefore it is very necessary, that this spetle, proceeding from such a stinking mouth, should returne and fall backe vpon his owne face. And when this passion of anger is very vehement, it leadeth a man euen to furie and rage, and procureth vnto him not only many diseases, but oftentimes death it selfe. Therefore although we knew not what hurt this affection doth to the soule, yet the euil which it bringeth to the body, ought to be of sufficient force to turne vs from it. For it is a vice that hath woonderfull effects in the body, and such as are very vnbeseeing a man. For first of all when the heart is offended, the blood boyleth round about it, and the heart is swollen and puffed vp: whereupon followeth a continuall panting and trembling of the heart and breast. And when these burning flames and kindled spirits are ascended vp from the heart vnto the braine, then is anger come to this perfection. From hence commeth change of countenance, shaking of the lippes and of the whole visage, stopping of speech and such other terrible lookes to beholde, more meete for a beast then for a man. For this cause the Philosopher that counselled an angry man to beholde his face in a glasse, had reason so to doe. For hee that beholdeth his owne face and countenance when hee is in choler, should finde matter enough to be appeased. Now because anger is a grieve proceeding of the contempt of those good things that are in a man, who thinkes that it ought not to be so, therefore he desireth to shew that they are not lightly to be esteemed of, which he supposeth may bee done this way, by making his power knowne, especially in hurting. Whereupon this appetite of reuenge is engendered, which is common to anger with offence, hatred and enuy: so that anger is alwaies mingled with sorrow and with desire of reuenge. And indeed reuenge is a motion of the heart, whereby it doth not onely turne aside and withdrawe it selfe from that which offendeth, but laboureth withall either to repell it, or to overcome and vanquish it, and to punish him that is the cause of it. Wherefore we may note herein two motions, as there are two respects, namely, the one to eschew the euil that offendeth, and the other to pursue with great violence him that is the author thereof. Hereof it is, that some when they are angry become pale, because the blood retireth vnto the heart: and these are most couragious, and most dangerous. Others wax red, because the blood ascendeth vp to the head: therefore these are not so full of stomacke, nor so much to be feared, in respect of those causes, which were shewed before when we spake of Feare. But howsoeuer the difference is, yet in anger the blood doth not wholly goe backe into the heart, as it doth in feare and sorrow, but disperleth it selfe outwardly. For the heart is as if he stroue to go out of his hoste or campe, not vnlike to a Prince or Captaine that is desirous to march forward in battell array: whereupon he sendeth forth the blood and the spirits, as his men of warre, to repell the enemy: which is not done without great mouing and tumult, and much stirring in the heart, which setteth on fire, and inflameth the blood and spirits.

The fruits of anger.

What effect it hath in the body.

The fountain of the appetite of reuenge.

The cause of looking pale and red.

How anger troubleth the braine.

Whereupon it followeth, that by reason of this motion of the blood, and of the confusion of the spirits which ensue thereof, the actions and motions of all the members of the body are troubled. But the brain is chiefly offended, because that also is heated by the inflamed blood, and by those burning spirits which mount vpthither, by whose motion it is stirred vp and disturbed, as also by the sinewes which come euen to the heart. For how hot soeuer the heart and breast are or may be, yet man abideth alwaies still and quiet if the heate pearce not vp to the braine. For it falleth out herein as it doth with a drunken body, who is not said to be drunke, because he hath taken in store of Wine, except it ascend vp into his head, and trouble his braine and senses. Hereof it is, that vehement anger is often accompanied with frensinesse, and with the falling sicknesse. And because the heart being inflamed, the blood and spirits also are set on fire, they cause the whole body to tremble, yea the very bones themselves. For the blood that boileth in the breast, puffeth vp and thrusteth forward the Midriffe, whereupon it followeth, that the motions of angry men are very troublesome, like vnto those of drunkards. Now because there are many meanes to stirre men vp to anger and wrath, and seeing it is so dangerous a passion, it is very needfull for vs to haue many good remedies against it, as indeed there are many to be found.

The best remedy against anger.

Although we should not stand in need of so many, if we would onely consider who we are, and compare our selues with God, and marke narrowly how many waies we offend him daily, what causes we giue him to be bitterly incited and kindled with wrath against vs, and how he beareth with vs, turning his anger into pitie and compassion towards vs. For if we enter into this consideration, first we shall be greatly ashamed that we are angrie; secondly our anger will be easily appeased. For who can despise vs as we deserue, and moue vs to anger, seeing we despise God vnto whom we owe all honour and reuerence, and whom we ought to set at so high a price aboue all other things, that wee should esteeme all the world as nothing in respect of his value? And yet wee shew plainly, how farre wee are off from this, seeing we stand in so little awe to offend him, yea, are more afraid to displease men then him. Beside, we commit no offence against him, in which there is not great contempt of his Maiestie. Whereas if wee feared, loued and honoured him as wee ought to doe, wee should rather feare to offend him then to die. But there is nothing which wee care for lesse.

Wherefore, questionlesse before him, who is a terrible auenger of his contempt, wee are all lost, if hee should pursue vs in his anger, as we deserue, and as wee pursue others, and not change his anger into mercie. If wee consider well of these things, wee shall know what occasion wee haue to swell with pride like Toades, and to thinke so well of our selues as we doe, or to bee so soone kindled with choler against them that haue offended vs: we shall know what excellency and dignitie can be in vs that are but dust and filth, whereby we should be so soone prouoked when wee see our selues despised and wronged of others.

Moreover, when we know, that we are vtterly vndone, except God extend his grace and mercie towards vs, shall we not, in stead of anger and reuenge, bee ashamed to craue pardon of him, if we continue still to be angrie, and vse no pity and fauour towards them that haue offended vs, as we desire that God should shew fauour vnto vs? And indeede what cause haue we to hope for it vpon any other condition? for it is written, that the Lord will take vengeance of him that reuengeth himselfe and will obserue his offences narrowly. Forgiue thy neighbour his misdeed, and when thou praest, thy sins shalbe forgiven thee. Shall man keepe anger against man, & will he aske remission at the Lords hands? He wil take no pitie vpon his like, & shal he demand pardon for his sins? Seeing he that is but flesh keepeth his anger, & yet sueth vnto God for pardon, who will blot out his iniquities? But this ought not to be forgotten of vs, to cause vs to abstaine from all anger towards them that by offering vs iniurie prouoke vs therunto, namely, that we acknowledge them to be the scourges of God to chalice our faults, which are worthy of greater punishment.

Another remedy against anger.

Thus let vs alwaies looke to the first cause of our affliction, and to God who visiteth vs iustly (whatsoever the meanes are which he vseth) and not to second causes & to the next meanes, to the end that we doe not as dogs do, which runne after the stone throwne against them, that by biting it they may be reuenged of it, not looking vnto him that threw it. For if we consider that the blow giuen vnto vs commeth from God, we will let the stone goe, and not follow after it with anger and reuenge, but turne vnto God who threw it, not to stirre vp our selues to despise him, or to be auenged of him, but to craue for pardon & grace at his hands. And this is the right way which we are to take for the quenching of our choler, that so we may bridle our anger, and keepe our selues quiet.

Now for the ende of this matter, it remaineth that wee should know whether this affection

affection be altogether vicious, and wholly proceeding from our corrupt nature, or whether it haue within it any seed of vertue, as well as the rest. It is certaine, that it is given of God to man, to stirre him vp to the desire of excellent things, to the ende that when he seeth himselfe despised and reiected for base actions and abiect things, and is grieved for the same, he should endeauour to leaue and forsake them, and to addict himselfe to better and more noble things, which cannot be contemned, nor he despised in regard of them. And this kinde of anger is very good. For being angry in this sort, our anger is turned vpon our selues onely, to blame and reprehend our selues for our sloth and loosenesse, and for our other vices and imperfections: and by this meanes our anger should not be sinne, but being acceptable vnto God, it would be vnto vs a Schoolemaster, and as a spur to sollicite and perswade vs vnto Vertue, and to such things as beleeue vs, and that estate whereunto we are called.

If then we would be angry according to the will of God, let vs first bee angrie against our selues for our faults and imperfections: and when we haue iust occasion to whet our selues against others, let our anger be turned against their vices, not against their persons. And such an anger will shew zeale for the honour of God and the saluation of our neighbours. Now the sequel of our speech requireth, that we should speake of hatred and of enuie, which for the most part follow offence and anger. Let vs then heare ACHITO B discourse of these things.

Of Aatred, and of the nature and effects thereof: of a good kinde of Hatred, and of the remedy to cure the euill Hatred: of Enuy, and of the kindes and effects thereof: of the difference betweene good and euill Enuy. Chap. 56.

ACHITO B. Forasmuch as nature, wisdom and goodnesse teach, that men ought to be knit together by loue, as we haue scene heretofore, and that we are by the selfe same nature framed and fashioned thereunto, as we may learne by that which wee haue heard of the forme & disposition of the hart, we must needs confesse, that the spirit of man can bring forth nothing more vnworthy it selfe, then to suffer it selfe to be overcome of hatred and Enuy, which are so contrary to loue, that they comprehend vnder them all general iniustice and wickednes of men. For from these wilde plants nothing can proceede (by reason of the corruption of mans nature) but effects that drawe vs cleane contrary from wishing well to our neighbour. So that if we plucke out of our heart the cause of this naturall obligation concerning the succour we owe one to another, namely, Loue, what can bee either found or placed there but hardnes, inhumanity, cruelty, and all kind of barbarousnes, which are to be accompred and taken for monsters in mans nature. For how strange and monstrous a thing were it, to vncloath a mans heart of Loue, and to put vpon it hatred, extreame backbiting, bitterness and crueltie, which proceed all from one fountaine? Neuertheles we see, that men are inclined rather to Hatred, then to Loue: but let vs search out the cause thereof.

There are many that take Hatred to be an inueterate anger, because it is a habite of anger wherby the heart escheweth something as euill, and desireth to repel & driue it away. Wherefore this affection is directly contrary to loue, and so likewise is anger. For it is an offence rooted in the heart, which causeth it to with greatly his hurt by whom it taketh it selfe to be offended. Now because contempt doth often accompany hatred, and enuy is neuer without it, besides that it breedeth strife, contentions, manslaughter and murders, therefore in the holy Scriptures hatred is often taken for all these things. As for the vehement causes of hatred, they are in every one according as a man esteemeth of the things he hateth. Therefore proud and enuious persons are alwaies inclined very much to hatred. Some men also are of such a hatefull nature, that they scarce wish well to any body: and surely these are very diuillish natures. Some likewise are giuen thereunto of custome, which they haue gotten by reioicing at other mens harms. But the cause why it is easier for vs to hate then to loue, and why Hatred taketh deeper roots in our heart then loue, is because hatred findeth a better soile there, and a more apt foundation to be laide vpon, then loue doth, and that chiefly for two reasons. The first is the corruption of mans nature, which being left vnto it selfe, fauoureth more of the nature of Satan, who is hatefull, alyar, and enuious from the beginning, then then of the nature of God, who is loue, truth, and charity. Therefore Saint Iohn saith That Caine hated his brother & slew him, because he was of the deuill, & Abel was of God. This hatred will be alwaies in those that haue one and the same Father that Caine had, against all good men and children of God. The second is, because the infirmities of our nature will not permit vs to enioy any good things in this world, that are pure and of long continuance: and therefore they suffer vs to haue but a little sense and taste of them. But it is cleane contrarie in regard of euils. For they quickly finde whereupon to stay and to plant themselves within vs, and to spread their rootes so deepe and broad, that they cannot easily be plucked vp. Whereupon they are felt a great deale more, and continue longer in our heart and memorie. Not without cause then doe men say, that the pleasures, seruices, and good things done vnto vs are made of feathers, and therefore they are easily carried away by reason of their lightnesse: but offences, euils, and displeasures are made of lead, and therefore they abide in the bottome of the heart by reason of their weight. And forasmuch as loue proceedeth of that which is good, and hatred of euill, whether it be euill in truth, or in opinion onely, as euill is commonly greater and of longer continuance then Good, for the causes spoken of, so is it with Loue and Hatred, and with their rootes and long abode.

The fruits of Hatred.

Now of Hatred commeth backbiting and euill speaking, which being kindled, bringeth forth bitterness and cruelty: and as Loue whetteth a man on to doe well, so contrariwise Hatred turneth men aside from well doing, and prouoketh them to hurt. For this cause it soweth the seede of enmity, and laboureth craftily to cause the partie hated to fall into danger. For it desireth to hurt him, and to bring euill vpon him, either by it selfe or by another, secretly or openly. In a word, seeing it is wholly contrary to Loue, wee may without any long discourse know the nature thereof, by that which hath bene spoken of the nature of Loue, taking it cleane contrary thereunto. But let vs see whether the affection of hatred be altogether euill of it selfe, or whether a man may reape any profit thereby.

Of a good kind of Hatred.

Rom. 12.9.
Amos 5.15.

We may say of this as we did of anger, and of other affections already spoken of. For it is given to man to cause him to withdraw himselfe from all euill that may hurt him, to flee from it and to repell it as being contrarie vnto him. Therefore S. Paul saith, Hate that which is euill, and cleane to that which is good. For true and perfect hatred should hate nothing but that which is euill indeede, as true loue should loue that only which is good indeede. But contrariwise we commonly hate the Good and good men, and loue the Euill and the workers thereof. Besides, we are faulty in this, that instead of hating mens vices, we hate their persons. Wherefore it is needfull, that in this matter of Hatred, wee should put that in practise which we haue already said of Anger, namely, that we should aboue all things hate our owne vices, and that euill which is in vs and in ours. But we that practise the cleane contrarie, change Loue into Hatred, and hatred into loue. For when we support & beare with our owne vices, or with the vices of our friends and kinsmen, which are not to be suffered or borne withall, it seemeth that this tolleration proceedeth from the loue we beare either to our selues or to others: but it is farre otherwise. For if we loued our selues wel, and our neighbours as our selues, we would be carefull to remoue all hurtfull things farre from our soules and to furnish them with that which is conuenient and wholesome for them, & so likewise for our friends: whereas we procure vnto them that which turneth to their dishonour, hurt, & overthrow, by nourishing them in their vices through our dissembling and bearing with them. And thus much for that profit, which we may receiue by this affection of hatred, being well guided according vnto the will of God, and to a sound and reasonable nature.

How loue is turned into hatred.

Remedies against the euill kinde of hatred.

Now against the passion of euill Hatred, amongst a great number of remedies which may very well be applied thereunto, we haue two principall ones that are very good and profitable. The first remedy is, the example of the loue of God, and of Iesus Christ towards vs, of which we haue spoken already, with those holy Precepts which doe command Loue and forbid Hatred. The second remedy is, the contempt of all earthly things, and the regard that is to be had vnto the things that are Celestiall and Eternall. For if we shall set light by all mortall and corruptible things, and lift vp our hearts to higher things, we shall very easily breake off all hatred and enmity, neither will wee take any thing greatly to heart, but when wee see God offended.

Description of Enuy.

Diuers sorts of Enuy.

Now as concerning Enuy, that alwaies accompanieth hatred, it is an affection quite contrary to mercy, which is a sorrow conceived by reason of the miseries of another, whereas enuy is a griefe arising of others mens felicity. Therefore it doth naturally reioice at another mans harme, and is grieved at his good: so that according to the varietie of good things that that may befall other men, so there are diuers kinds of Enuy. For first, some are enuious, where other mens profit is so great that it hindreth theirs. There is also a kinde of enuy at the welfare of another, which albeit it neither hurt nor hinder vs, yet wee are grieved because the like is not befallen to vs, or not rather to vs, or not as well to vs as to another to whom it is hapned. And this is a spice of couetousnes. There is yet a third kind of Enuy, which maketh vs vnwilling that others should obtaine that good which we haue, or which we desire, or haue wished for but could not get it. And where the question is of those good things, which it seemeth we should enioy but do not, or which we think belong to vs, but are bestowed vpon others, then is our enuy greater, and may also bee called ieaiousie. Moreouer, there is a fourth kinde that is worst of all, to which the name of Enuy agreeth more properly, as being often bredde of the former kindes, when a man giueth them the bridle, & suffereth the to reigne too much ouer him. This enuy is a griefe conceived at anothers good without any regard of it owne profit, but onely because it iudgeth it selfe hurt when others receiue good or do good. And this is the very enuy of the Diuell & of his children: which is an affection that is mingled of hatred & of loy. For it hateth vertue, and reioyceth at vice; and at the prosperitie of the wicked. Contrariwise, it is grieved at the felicity of good men, and glad of their miseries. But what kinde soeuer of enuy is in a man, there is in him grief, and as it were a biting that gnaweth him, by reason that the heart in this affection shrinketh in as it were, and closeth vp it selfe at the good and benefite of another. So that sorrow is alwaies ioyned therewith. The goods against which enuy rusheth most, are such as are in greatest reputation amongst men, as honour & glory, in so much that it is more moued at the good renowne & praise giuen to men, in respect of the good things that are in the, then at the good things themselves, in regard of which men are honored & esteemed. For the enuious man careth not for the vertues that bring renowne and glory, but onely for the honour & glory which follow them as the shadow doth the body. For as much then as a proud man desireth still to be preferred before all, therefore he is more greedy of these goods, of honor and glory, then of true goods of which the other are but shadowes. Hereof it is, that a proud man is naturally enuious, because enuy springeth from such a desire of preferment: yea, it is commonly bred of pride. Yea, the farther a man is off from that which he would bee thought to be, and the lesse endued with those good things for which he would be honoured, the more enuious he is. But among all the good things against which enuy striveth most, & for which it is most stirred vp, those of the soule are the chiefest, because they are more excellent then those of the body, and such as neuer haue end. Therefore also the reputation & honor which men obtaine by their meanes abide with them continually. But the contrary falleth out in corporall and externall goods, as they that haue more narrow bounds. Wherefore, as they cannot grow to that greatnesse vnto which the other do, so their vse also is nothing so great and consequently the price and reputation that proceedeth from them is not so great. Therefore if the question be of honour and glory, no man of any good iudgement but will more willingly giue ouer that which may be gotten by corporall and outward things, then that which followeth knowledge, wisdom, vertue, and the other goodes of the soule. So that enuy may stand vs in steade of a witnes to testifie and shew vnto vs, which are the greatest goods of all, seeing it is alwaies busied about the highest, noblest, and most excellent Good. Now as there is no wicked affection, which carrieth not about, it owne torment to take vengeance therof by the iust iudgement of God, so this of enuy passeth all the rest in this respect. Therefore it was wel said of them that taught, that enuy is most iust, because of it selfe it is the same punishment to the enuious man, which it deserueth. For first, it is vile and seruile, because an enuious man knoweth this in himselfe, that he iudgeth the good things in an other to be greater and more excellent then his owne, or at leastwise, he feareth lest it should so come to passe. Therefore there is no affection in a man, which he dare lesse disclose then this of enuy: so that he receiueh lesse comfort in this then in any other. For by opening our heart to another wee receiue solace and comfort: whereas the enuious person iudgeth his affection of enuy to be so vile, that he dare not discover it, but hideth and concealeth it as much as he can. If he be angry or hate any one, he will declare it a great deale sooner. And albeit feare be thought to be dishonourable, yet will a man rather disclose this affection, then he will enuy. The like may be said of sorrow and of loy. But the enuious body is constrained to bite on his bridle, to chew and to deuoure his enuy within himselfe, and to looke vp his own miserie in the bottome of his heart, to the end it breake not forth and shewe it selfe, whereby the body receiueh great detriment. For it becommeth pale, wann, swart, and leane, the eies sinke into the head, the lookes are askew, and the whole countenance is disfigured. And within the heart the furies are enclosed, which giue him so small rest, that greater torment cannot be imagined. Therefore Salomon saith very well, That a sound heart is the life of the body: but enuy is the rotting of the bones. And Ecclesiasticus saith, That death is better then a bitter life: that enuy and wrath shorten the life, and that carefulnesse bringeth age before the time. To conclude, although all the euill affections trouble and corrupt the minde very much, yet none of them offendeth it so much as enuy doth. Which commeth not to passe so much because it selfe iudgeth or esteemeth good to bee euill, as because it desireth that others should so esteeme thereof. But howsoeuer this vice be very vile and infamous both to the body and soule, yet in this affection of enuy, we must put a difference betweene that part of it, which proceedeth from sound nature, as it was first giuen of God to man, and that which is in it through the corruption of nature. For there is a kinde of enuy which serueth vs instead of spurres to pricke vs forward, and to worke in vs a will and desire both to obtaine and to keepe great good things. And this enuy is very good, when we apply our selues to the true goods, and are not griued at the prosperity and vertues which we see in others, but are moued by their example to desire and to seeke after the selfe same goods, yea greater if the meanes be offered, provided that all bee referred to the glory of God, to our owne saluation, and to the profit of our neighbours. Vnto this kinde of Enuy Saint Paul exhorteth vs, when he writeth to the Corinthians, speaking of the diuersitie of gifts wrought by the spirit of God in his Church, Be enuious of the best gifts albeit in our vsuall translation it be Desire, yet the Greeke word signifieth to enuie: but the sense is in a manner all one. And the same Apostle speaking of the reliefe and collection made for the poore, saith, Achaia hath prepared a yeare agoe, and your zeale hath prouoked many: that is to say, the emulation and enuy, which they haue conceived by your example: and this was a good, holy, and Christian enuy. But if we seeke our owne glory, and in that respect are griued that others excell vs in vertues and in the gifts and graces of God, onely because we would haue that honour which they haue, and be equall with them, or aboue them, this is a peruerse and Satanicall affection, declaring euidently that we seeke our selues and our owne glory more then the glory of God. For if wee had respect to that which we ought, it would be all one to vs who were the instruments either our selues or others, so that God were glorified, and that were well done, which ought to be done. As for the euil sorts of enuy of which we haue spoken, they are placed by S. Paul amongst the worke of darkenesse and of the flesh, where he saith, that They which are defiled with them shall not inherite the kingdome of God. But forasmuch as in this discourse we placed Ielousie amongst the kindes of Enuy, and yet it is often taken in the good part, proceeding as it were of true loue, as Zeale also is bred thereof, it shall bee good for thee, AS ER, to beginne the daies Worke to morrow with a treatise of these two affections.

SER. The holy Scripture applying it self to the capacitie of mans vnderstanding, describeth mens affections oftentimes by those testimonies which their outward members affoord, conuincing them of vices rooted in their heart, by the carriage of their eies, of their eie-lids, of their forehead, and of their whole countenance. Which is to this ende chiefly, that when they know that men may reade one anothers face as it were in a Booke that which is covered and hidden in the heart, they should perswade themselves, that God soundeth and seeth more easily the most secret thoughts of their hearts, and that they can hide nothing from him. Likewise the holy spirit to con-descend to our rudenesse, and to teach vs to know GOD by our selues, not onely by our soule which we see not, but also by our body which we see, speaketh often of his high, infinite, and incomprehensible maiesty, as it were of a man, attributing vnto him eies, eares, a nose, a mouth, armes, legges, feete, hands, a heart, and bowelles. Moreouer albeit this pure, simple, and eternall essence be in no wise passionated with affections, yet the same heauenly word doth not only attribute vnto him wrath, reuenge, anger, ielousie and other affections, but doth oftentimes propound him vnto vs as an yrefull man, hauing the face, behaviour, & whole countenance of one greatly stirred vp to wrath & reuenge, yea, even to great fury. Which is done to this end, both, that by the knowledge which wee may haue of the nature of these affections whereunto we are enclined, and of the effects which they bring forth, and causes from whence they proceede, we should meditate the same things to bee in God when we offend him, and know what reward we are to looke for: and also to teach vs that right rule of all our affections which we haue in his diuine goodnesse.

Now if we remember what hath beene declared vnto vs of the nature of Loue, we heard that true and pure loue was without ielousie, and that this affection sprang of the loue of concupiscence: and yet it was tolde vs yesterday, that ielousie was placed among the kinds of enuy. Let vs then see what this affection is properly, and whether all ielousie be vicious.
 I vnderstand by ielousie, a feare which a man hath, least an other whome hee would not, should enioy something. This commeth to passe two waies, namely, either because wee our selues would enioy it alone, or else because wee would haue some other, to whome wee with the same thing, to enioy it alone: the reason heereof is, because wee iudge it hurtfull either to our selues or to those whom wee loue, if others should enioy it. As if the question were of some honour, or of some other good, which wee would haue to our selues alone, or for some one whom we loue, and should be grieued that an other enioyeth it, and thereupon enuie him, either because we are afraide he shall enioy it, or because he enioyeth it already, heerein appeareth enuie and euill ielousie, which bringeth with it great mischiefes. For as Saint Iames saith, From whence are warres and contentions among you? are they not hence, even of your lustes that fight in your members? yee lust, and haue not: yee enuy and are ielous, or haue indignation, and cannot obtaine: yee fight and warre, and gette nothing. Wherefore to a-uoyde this enuy and euill ielousie, wee must consider of what nature that Good is, which stirreth vs vp to this affection. For according to the nature thereof, our ielousie may bee either a vice or a vertue. For if the question be of some good thing, which belongeth in such sort to mee alone, or to any other whom I loue, that none may enioy it except it be iniustly, and to the dishonor of God, it is no euill ielousie if I feare least any should abuse it, or bee grieued when it falleth out so. If it concerneth some body whom I loue, who is abused by a nother to the displeasure of God, and to the dishonor and hurt of the party beloued, I haue yet greater occasion to feare, to be grieued, and even to be ielous both ouer my own Good, and ouer the good of the party beloued. And as I haue iust cause of ielousie in this case in that thing which properly belongeth vnto mee, so also I haue like occasion when an other iniustly enioyeth that Good which belongeth to him whom I loue, and of whome I ought to be carefull, and bee grieued when any reproach or wrong is offered vnto him.
 As for example: seeing the husband hath such an interest in his wife, & the wife in her husband, as no other either may or ought to haue the like, both of them haue iust cause to be ware that no other haue the fruition hereof but themselues, to take the matter heavily if it fall out otherwise, and to bee very much offended and full of indignation against him that should attempt any such thing. For that can not bee done, as not without the great disho-nour and dammage of the parties so knit together, so also not without the great disho-nour of GOD, whose lawe and covenant is thereby violated. On the other side, that mutuall loue which ought to be betwixt the husband and the wife, doth binde them to desire and to procure the honour and profit each of other, and to keepe backe all dishonour and hurt that may befall them. Wherefore both of them haue iust cause to be offended with those that seeke to procure any blemish in this respect. The like may be saide of fathers, mothers, and children, and of all that haue any charge ouer others, or that are linked together by friendship. But on the other side a man must beware, that he be not too suspicious, and that he carry not within himselfe matter of ielousie, and so torment himselfe and others without cause: as likewise he must bee very carefull, that he giue no occasion of ielousie to any other.

A good lesſe
for Princes & Pastours.

And thus you see how there may be a good ielousie, notwithstanding that in this case it be mingled with loue and anger. For Ielousie causeth the party that loueth, to be angry with him by whom that thing which he doth loue, receiveth any dishonour or detriment. Therefore this anger commeth of loue, which inciteth him to set himselfe against him that offendeth the thing beloued. So that these affections are alwaies commendable, arising of this cause, and being ruled according to that Zeale and Ielousie which the holy Scripture attributeth vnto GOD in regard of vs. For hee is called a ielous GOD not onely in regard of his honour and glory, which he will not haue giuen to any other besides himselfe, (and indeede all the creatures ioyned together are not able to diminish or to adde any thing therunto whatsoeuer they doe) but also because hee loueth vs, he is ielous of our saluation, and desireth to reserue vs wholly to himselfe, and to make vs partakers of his immortal blessednesse. Therefore he will not haue vs spoile him of his glory, and forsake his seruice, in regard of that hurt and dammage which should befall vs thereby. For he beareth that affection towards vs, which a good Father doth towards his children, who loueth them not for any profit comming to him thereby, but onely for their owne good, and because hee both will and ought to loue them. This loue then, which God beareth vnto vs, causeth him to be ielous ouer vs, when, through impiety and wickednesse of life, wee leaue him, and ioine our selues vnto his aduersarie the diuell. Whereupon hee doeth not onely become angry, but is full of indignation also, both against him and vs. For indignation is a griefe wrought in vs, when wee see some good thing befall to an vnworthy person, and him that is worthy, deprived thereof. This affection therefore proceedeth from the same roote from whence compassion springeth, namely, from the iudgement of that which is good, and from the loue thereof. But the diuersitie of both their obiects causeth them in some sort to be contrary affections: forasmuch as indignation is bred in regard of some good that hapeneth to one that is vnworthy of it, and compassion or pitie ariseth of some euill that befalleth or is procured to him that hath not deserued it. And of these contrary affections mingled together, a third affection is bred, which in holy Scripture is called Zeale and Ielousie, being taken in the good part.

Heereof it is, that the loue & compassion which God hath of his children, when he seeth them go about to bereaue themselves of that good which he wisheth them, and the indignation that he hath in regard of the good, which happeneth to the wicked in the accomplishment of their euill desires, (for to them euill is in steade of good) causeth him to be moued with ielousie and to be auenged thereof. For this cause the Prophet Ioel saith, Then will the Lord bee ielous ouer his land, and spare his people. And the prophet Esay, hauing declared to Ezechias the deliuerance of Ierusalem, and the succour which God wold send him against Senacherib, saith, That the zeale of the Lord of Hosts wil performe this. In like maner when the true children & seruants of God behold a confusion in stead of that order which the Lord wold haue obserued, & which he hath prescribed vnto his creatures, they are greatly moued in regard of that zeale, which they beare aswell towards God, as towards their neighbours. For zeale is nothing else but an indignation conceived in respect of those things, that are vnworthily done against him that is deare vnto vs, and whom wee loue. Therefore if we loue God and his Saints, if we loue the Common wealth, our Princes, our Parents, and all others whom we ought to loue, we will bee ielous for them, and cannot behold without indignation any thing done against them, that ought not to be. This Indignation and Ielousie will induce vs to set our selues earnestly against all iniustice, and to overthrow it with all our might. With this Ielousie Saint Paul was affected towards the Corinthians when he wrote thus vnto them, I am Ielous ouer you with godly ielousie: for I haue prepared you for one husband, to present you as a pure virgine vnto Christ.

This kind of Zeale is very requisite in all the true seruants of God, but chiefly in them that haue any publike charge, whether it be in the Church or in the Common wealth. For except they be endued with great zeale towards the glory of the Maiesty of God, towards iustice and all vertues, they will neuer haue that care which they ought either of the honour and seruice of God, or of publike benefite, or to reprove, correct and punish vices, or lastly to maintaine good discipline, vpright iustice, and good conuersation, in such sort as becommeth them. For this cause hath God giuen to the nature of man, this affection of Zeale and Indignation for the communion that ought to be in the societie of men, to the ende there should bee a right and indifferent distribution of all good things, so that none of them should light vpon the vnworthy that vse them ill, but to such as deserue serue them and know how to vse them aright.

Now when these affections are thus ruled, they are very good and profitable : but commonly they are abused vnto vice. For Indignation is quickly bred of Enuy, which being vniust, is also of a corrupt and bad iudgement, so that an enuious body thinketh that whatsoeuer good thing an other hath befallen vnto him, he is vnworthy of it. And so in like manner the Zeale that is without true knowledge, bringeth forth most pernicious effects. For it proceedeth from a loue which iudgeth not aright of the thing that mooueth it, but esteemeth it to be euill and worthy of hatred, whereas it is good and worthy of loue. Of this Zeale Saint Paul speaketh when hee saith of the Iewes, I beare them record, that they haue the zeale of God, but not according to knowledge. For being deceiued in their iudgement, and calling themselues defenders and louers of the Lawe of G O D, they persecuted the Gospel, (which was the accomplishment of the Lawe) and also them that beleueed in Iesus Christ : insomuch that the very Zeale was through their ignorance turned into Cruelty and Tyranny, which is a very dangerous zeale, and ought most carefully to bee shunned of vs, as that whereinto the best minded men of all doe commonly fall, when they are blinded with ignorance : as the Apostle Saint Paul propoundeth himselfe in this case for an example before he was conuerted. For he freely confesseth, that he was a blasphemer, a persecutor, and an oppressor, but he did it ignorantly, and through vn-beliefe.

Rom. 10. 2.

1. Tim. 1. 13.
Act. 26. 10. 11.

There hath beene many such, not onely amongst the Iewes, but euen amongst the Heathen. For albeit their Religion was altogether superstitious and idolatrous, yet they alwaies maintained and defended it with very great zeale, persecuting such as professed Christianitie among them, and condemning them as the vilest and most detestable men vpon the earth. But if the Lord be greatly offended when as we beare hatred and enuy against any body, wee cannot doubt but that this doth likewise displease him, when wee commit these things, being blinded with ignorance : and that he is carried with greater indignation against vs, when we maliciously cloake these vices with a false title of zeale, of religion, and of his glory, thereby to reuenge our selues, and to exercise our cruelties much more easily. But let vs now proceed to consider of other affections of the heart, and first of Reuenge, Cruelty, and Rage. And because Reuenge is appointed to punish offences, and euery vice findeth a Iudge within it selfe, we wil speak also of the affection of Shame which commonly followeth euery vile act. It belongeth therefore to thee, A M A N A, to intreat of this matter.

Of Reuenge, Cruelty, and Rage. and what agreement there is among them : what Shame and Blushing is, and why God hath placed these affections in man : and of the good and euill that is in them. Chap. 58.

A M A N A. If euery one might be a Iudge in his own cause, & execute his own decrees, the malice of men doth declare sufficiently, that there would be no iustice obserued in the world, but robbery publicly put in practice, insomuch as the strongest would alwaies carry away the spoile. For that blind loue, which euery one beareth towards himselfe, causeth vs that we cannot see clearly either into our owne, or into other mens affaires, so that wee are alwaies more ready to doe wrong to others, then to depart from any thing of our owne. Euen so, if wee might be suffered to reuenge those iniuries, which oftentimes without cause we suppose we haue receiued, it is certaine we would obserue neither measure nor meane, but suffering our selues to be guided by the passion of anger & wrath, we would fall into more then brutish cruelty and rage. For as God hath reserued vengeance to himselfe, and promised to recompence it, so no man carrieth that minde to do it iustly that is in him, neither indeed can any : because it is the spirit of a man that offreth iniury to another, whereas the body is but the instrument of the mind, and as it were a sword vnto it, which the spirit manageth and causeth to cutte. Whereupon it followeth, that the party offended cannot reuenge himselfe of his chiefe and greatest enemy. For God onely is able to take vengeance of the soule, and to throw it together with the body into hell fire. Moreover when we think to hurt the body of our enemy, which is but the executioner of the euil disposition of his spirit, we hurt our owne soule, making it guiltie of the iudgement of God, who forbideth all reuenge, and commandeth vs to possesse our soules in patience, and neuer to requite euill for euill, but to wait the Lords leisure, being assuredly perswaded that he will saue and deliuer vs.

What re-
uenge is,

Now look what the affection receiueeth and embraceth, the same doth it desire to returne and send backe againe where it did receiue it, whether it be good or euill. Therefore as a good affection both wisheth and doth well to him of whom it receiueeth good will and beneficence: so a naughty affection desireth to returne euill receiued, vnto him of whom e it hath receiued it. For this cause when the heart is wounded with griefe by any one, it desireth to returne the like to him that hath hurt it, and to rebite him of whom it is bitten. This affection is a desire of reuenge, which being put in execution, is reuenge accomplished: namely, when we cause him that hath offended vs to suffer that punishment, which in our iudgement he hath deserued. This punishment is to damne him either in soule or in body, or in his goods, yea, sometimes by all the meanes that may be. And when power to reuenge is wanting, there are some that fall into outrageous speeches, into horrible and execrable cursings, crying out for vengeance either at Gods hand, or of some other that can performe it. Every offence therefore that ingendreth hatred, anger, enuy or indignation, bringeth with it a desire of reuenge, which is to render euill for euill, and to requite griefe receiued with the like againe.

What rage is.

And when the offence is growne to that passe, that nothing can assuage the extremity thereof, nor stay it from breaking forth into reuenge and hurting by al meanes that may be, then is this Reuenge turned into Rage. For a man in such a case is not much vnlike to a mad dog. For because reuenge cannot take that effect which it would haue, it vexeth and closeth vp as it were the heart, bringing great griefe and great torment to the whole body, so that a man so affected is as if his heart and body were ready to burst asunder.

Of Cruelty.

Cruelty.

Now, when the heart is hardened with Reuenge, it is turned into Cruelty, which is a priuation of pitie & compassion. For when Offence and Anger are set on fire, they exclude al good thoughtes out of the minde, and perswade to all kinde of Cruelty, of which there are three degrees. For there are some that procure it, who neuerthelesse would not execute it themselves. There are others that execute it. Besides, there is a third kinde of Cruelty, when we faile in performing our duty towards them that are in necessitie, whom wee both ought and might helpe and succour, whether this come of euill will or through negligence. For thereby we shew that we are without pittie and compassion. Hereof followeth inhumanitie, which is as if we should lay aside all humane affection and be transformed into brute beasts. Therefore wee may well conclude, that all priuate Reuenge proceeding of enuy, or of hatred, or of anger, is vicious and forbidden by God, who commandeth vs to render good for euill, and not euill for euill. For hee hath ordained the meanes, whereby he will haue vengeance executed among men. Therefore hee hath appointed Magistrates to execute it according to his Law, and following his ordinance, not with any euill affection, but with iust indignation proceeding from loue, and from true zeale of iustice.

How Magistrates ought to punish.

For to punish the wicked is a very acceptable sacrifice, so that there bee no intermingling of our own passions withall, and that wee exercise not our enuies, rancours, and reuenges vnder the name and title of Iustice and of the glory of God. For if wee doe so, wee cease to exercise the punishments and corrections of the Lord, and put our owne in practise. Wee must therefore follow his example. For hee suffereth not euill to goe unpunished, if men auoide not punishment by his grace and mercy, and by those meanes which he hath appointed for the obtaining thereof. Therefore it is often said of the wicked in the Scripture, that GOD will returne into their bosome the euill which they haue done: and his children and seruants desire him also to performe the same. But when he doth it, he is not mooued with any euill affection, but onely with the loue he beareth to iustice and vertue, & to his children, and with pittie and compassion towards them in regarde of the iniuries done vnto them. And as himselfe commeth in iudgement to take vengeance, so he would haue them that supply his place among men, vnto whom he hath committed the sword for the defence of the good and punishment of euill doers, to follow his example. But whether they doe so or no, there is no sinne that can auoide punishment, and that findeth not a Iudge euen in him that committed it, to take vengeance thereof, by meanes of the affections, which God hath placed in man to that end. Among which Shame occupieth a place, which we ought well to consider.

With what affection God punisheth offenders.

Concerning this affection, there are some that are ashamed in regarde of some feare of

of dishonour, of which there followeth no damage: or in respect of some griefe or perturbation of the soule, arising of somethings that seeme to bring some dishonour with them. Forasmuch therefore as Shame is a feare of dishonour, it is of great force in them that loue honour. For the more they loue it, the more doe they feare dishonour, which is the contrary thereof, as a very great euill. And for this cause there is in Shame not onely a feare of villanie, but indignation also, after the committing of some fault. For hee that is faulty, chafeth, and is angrie with himselfe, because of the dishonour he receiueth through his offence. And this kinde of Shame is simplest and lightest, and may bee called Blushing, being very common especially in children and virgins. Now forasmuch as heerein the spirits withdraw themselves vnto the heart, as vnto a center, and presently as it were in the same instant returne backe againe, the face is painted with a vermillion colour, which is very pleasant and comely, namely, in that age and in those persons. Therefore is this colour rightly called the colour of vertue. For God hath placed this affection of shame in the nature of men, to the end it should bee vnto them as a bridle to stay them from committing vile thinges, and as a Iudge and Reuenger to punish them after they haue done such things. Therefore also there is yet another kinde of shame more vehement, which approacheth neere vnto the affection of anger, and is mingled with wrath and feare. For it is a motion of the heart, in which he that feeleth himselfe guilty of any dishonest crime or act, is angrie with himselfe for the same, and punisheth and reuengeth himselfe vpon himselfe: & with all feareth the iudgements of others, & the rebuke and dishonour that may come vnto him for it. For as we haue heard already, God hath placed in the nature of man sundry affectiōs, of which some are sweet & pleasant, to the end they should be vnto vs as it were spurs vnto vertue: others are bitter & vnpleasaunt, that they might be vnto vs in stead of punishments, and that the griefe which they bring might teach vs to know more cleerely what diuersitie there is betweene vertue and vice, and what difference we ought to put between good and euill deeds. Therefore there is not a worse thing in man, nor any disease more dangerous to the soule then impudency, which is wholly contrary to Shame and blushing. For whosoever is once past all shame, he hath no care at all of his honour, much lesse of the honour of GOD. Hereof it is that the holy Ghost by the Prophets doth greatly accuse the impudency of the wicked, saying vnto them by way of reproach, that they had whoores foreheads, and would not be ashamed: that they were impudent children and stiffe hearted, and that they did glory in their wickednesse after they had done euill, in steade of being ashamed and amending their faults. Now whereas we said, that Shame painteth the face with a vermillion colour, we are to know, that the passions & affectiōs of the soule breed great change in our bodies, as they that moue the spirits and the naturall heat, by opening and shutting vp of the heart: whereby the spirits are either enlarged or restrained from it.

Thus it cometh to passe, that the colour of the face is changed, it being a property of the heart to set in it certaine marks and signes of the affectiōs that are in it, as we haue already heard. Therefore doth shame paint the cheekes with rednesse, because the danger that springeth of feare is of that nature, that the heart standeth in need of help to repel & driue it away, namely, of that heat that retireth backe vnto it. Now forasmuch as there is perturbation in Shame, by reason of the opinion and feare of dishonour and blame, heat is drawne vp to the head, & so from thence it is dispersed ouer the face. And although Shame doth not trouble the heart and mind so much as feare doth, yet doth it confound the head, and causeth it oftentimes to forget what it thought & was purposed to haue done. As we see it sometimes in very wise and skilfull men, when they are to speake or to do something before personages or companies whom they reuerence. And this is incident for the most part to such as are most modest, and to them that presume least of themselves, who indeed cannot heare their owne praises without shame and blushing, such is their nature & modesty: or else it is because their hearts are very little, which maketh them also fearefull.

Now although too much shamefastnesse, when it is causelesse, is worthy of blame, because it often keepeth them that are overtaken therewith from doing many good things, and from imploying the gifts which they haue receiued of God as it becometh them: yet is it more praiseworthy then impudencie, which as it maketh men altogether shamelesse and brazenfaced, so it usually accompanieth proud and arrogant persons. For it is cleane contrary to modesty. Seeing therefore we learne, that shame is a feare of dishonour and blame, & of doing that that might procure it, we must take good heede that we iudge aright of that which is to be accounted vile and dishonest, and of that which may bring vnto vs honour or dishonour, praise or dispraise. For our nature beeing full of darkenesse through sinne that reigneth in it, our naturall iudgement is not so intire and vpright as it ought to be, to iudge well either of that which is truly honest, and which bringeth with it honor and commendation, or otherwise of the contrary vnto it. Whereupon it commeth to passe, that we oftentimes take one for another, & so light vpon that, which we least sought for or desired. Therefore let vs know and learne this, that there is nothing honest but vertue, nor any thing dishonest but vice: and that as nothing is more beautifull and of greater renoune then vertue: so nothing is more ill fauoured, dishonourable and infamous then vice. But forasmuch as there is great diuersitie of opinions, what is to be accounted honest and dishonest, what vertue, what vice, what praise what dispraise, let vs learne to frame our iudgement out of the law and word of God, which is the rule of all iustice and truth. Otherwise it will come to passe, that we shall be oftner ashamed of well doing then of euil doing, and of vertue then of vice; which were a vile shame, and such a one as that we ought to be greatly ashamed therof. For in well doing we must neuer be afraide of that shame, which the wicked thinke to bring vpon vs, but rather account it honourable and glorious. Yea themselues shall be ashamed and confounded when their vices and vile actions shall be discovered by our honesty & vertue: whereas if we ioyne with them, we shall cause them to be voide of shame when they do ill, yea, they will boast and vaunt of it before vs. But enough of this matter. Now forasmuch as arrogant and proude persons are farthest off from vsing aright any of these affections of the heart, of which we haue hitherto discoursed, especially of shame, I am of opinion that we are to looke into the nature and effects of the passion of pride. Therefore ARAM, this shall be the subiect of thy discourse.

Shame of

Of Pride, with the consideration thereof as well in nature entire, as corrupted: of the originall thereof, and of such as are most enclined therewnto: what vices accompany it, how great a poison it is, and what remedy there is for it. Chap. 59.

ARAM. There is nothing more easie then for a man to deceiue himselfe. For looke what a man earnestly desireth, he suposeth it is already as it were come to passe, or at least hee promiseth to himselfe that he shall easily obtaine it. But oftentimes things fall out otherwisethen men looke or hope for. Now the chiefe cause of their error herein is that presumption, which commonly they haue of their owne wisdom and vertue, whereby they are lift vp with vaine confidence and puffed vp with pride. For when men are carried with an inordinate and blinde loue of themselves, they are soone perswaded that there is nothing in them worthy to be despised, yea they thinke that their ignorance is wisdom: insomuch that knowing nothing, they suppose they know all things, and hauing no dexterity to performe one commendable worke, they presume very inconsiderately to set their hand to euery great matter. But the more care and diligence they bestow, beeing led with a desire to shew great skil, and thinking to win honour and renoune, so much the more they discover their ignorance and blockishnes, purchasing to themselves shame & infamie. Now the truth of God teacheth vs to consider otherwise of our selues, namely, that we want both sound vnderstanding, and strength also to accomplish any good thing. Which knowledge ought to keep vs backe from all presumption, and ouerweening of our owne wisdom and strength, and take from vs all matter of pride and glory, to leade vs into modesty and humility. This rule we ought to follow if wee will attaine to the white of good iudgement and well doing.

The causes
why men de-ceiue themselues.

Now as shame and confusion is bred of some vile and dishonest fact, as we haue heard, so vice fetcheth his beginning from pride. I call pride a puffing vp of the soule and heart, proceeding from the opinion of some excellent good thing in vs more then in others, whereby a man is in estimation and honour, whether this good thing bee present, past, or to come. But we are to consider of two fountains and first causes of this inflammation & affection of the heart, namely of one that proceedeth from nature pure and intire, & of another that commeth from nature as it is corrupted. So that we may boldly say, that there is a kinde of pride which is no vice but a vertue, or at leastwise the seede of vertue. For there was no

vicious or euill thing in the first nature as it was created of God, but euery thing in it was vertuous, and the seed of vertue, as we haue already shewed in the former discourses already made by vs. Wherefore that natural pride of man, being such as he should haue bin if he had continued in his first nature, would be an excellent vertue, and as it were the mother of all the rest; whereas now it is the most vgly and monstrous vice that can be found in the whole nature of man corrupted, by meanes of which it is become the father of all vices and sinnes. For seeing GOD hath done this honor to man aboue all other bodily creatures, as to create him in regard of his soule, of a celestially and diuine nature (for which cause the very Heathen affirme that mankinde is of the linage and parentage of God) he would not haue him ignorant of the excellency of his being, and of those great and wonderfull benefites, which he hath received of him in his creation, and of which hee hath made him partaker chiefly for three causes. The first, to this end that knowing what grace and honour God his Creatour hath bestowed vpon him, he might bee moued continually to acknowledge and honour him as it becommeth him. The second, to the end that knowing the excellency of his nature, and of the stocke from whence he came, hee should loue himselfe in God his Creatour, and in him thinke himselfe worthy of true goodes, even of the greatest and most excellent that may bee, namely of heavenly and eternall goodes: and that hee should know that hee was created for them, and that through the knowledge and consideration thereof hee might bee prouoked to wish for and to desire them with great courage. The third, that by this meanes hee might feare to degenerate from so high and noble a linage as that is from whence he is descended, and to fall from so high a degree of honour and dignitie into dishonour and shame, and to loose those excellent goodes whereunto he was allotted, if he committed any thing vnbecoming so noble and so excellent a nature as was the nature of God according to the image of which hee was created. This then is that holy pride, which ought naturally to remaine in man, and whereby he might well haue desired to bee like vnto GOD, especially in goodnesse, and that by those onely meanes by which the Lord would haue him bee brought vnto this similitude, and which himselfe had taught him: namely obedience, and that so farre as was agreeable and meete for his nature. But our first parentes giuing eare to him, who first degenerated from this holy pride, vnder colour of being equall not to the goodnesse but to the power and greatnesse of God, were soone perswaded to beleue the promise, which this liar had made vnto them of a farre greater and more excellent estate, then was that wherein God hath created them: insomuch that their humility & obedience whereby they were vnited & conioyned in great glory with God, was turned into arrogancy and disobedience. Whereupon doubting of the trueth of Gods word, they harkened to the Diuelles counsell, propounded vnto themselves the selfe same meanes and degrees to make themselves equall with God their Creatour, which this wretch and his angels had taken before, and whereby he fell from the highest estate of glory to the bottomlesse gulfe of misery. And this is that bastardy and earthly pride that is entred into mans nature, of which it is saide That pride is the original of sinne, and he that hath it shall powre out abomination, till at last be ouerthrowne. And a little after: Pride was not created in men, neither writh in the generation of women. And indeede God hath made man of a milde and communicable nature apt to society, and to liue with company not solitarily as sauage beastes vse to doe. Therefore there is nothing more contrary to his nature; and to that ende for which hee was created, then this vicious pride, whereby he is so puffed vp and swelleth in such sort, as if he were of some other nature and condition then humane, and as though hee meant to liue in some other estate and degree then of a man. By which doing he degenerateth from the first nature in which he was created: wheerupon Ecclesiasticus concludeth, That pride is hateful before God and man. Now the more arrogant and proude a man is, the more ignorant may he be said to be of true goods, & such as are eternall; & whereas he should wish for and long after these, his whole affection is turned to the desire of worldly glory and of earthly things. Which desire proceedeth from that inconsiderate loue that euery one beareth towards himselfe, which keepeth a man from the knowledge of himselfe. For if hee knewe himselfe wel, he might see in himselfe nothing but such matter as should cause him to abase and to humble himselfe, not to be puffed vp & to presume of himselfe in any respect. Hereupon it followeth, that they are naturally most inclined to pride, which are most ignorant, most rude, most abject, most inconsiderate, most hasty & headstrong. For they that are skillful and wise, sharpe witted, moderate & well staied, who looke into & take a view of themselues; and know well what is within them, such men vnderstand and are able to iudge very well, that there is nothing in man that should cause him either to swell or to be blowne vp with pride. Therefore we commonly see, that they which haue most excellent vertues in them, that haue greatest gifts of God, and could finde in themselves most matter of pride, are notwithstanding most modest and most humble. And contrariwise the greatest blockheads, and such as are most vnapt to euery good thing, most destitute of all good and excellent gifts of nature, are for the most part the loftiest and most proud: so that a man may well say of them that they are proude peasants, especially when they are blowne vp like bladders with some winde of prosperity, when their noses are perfumed, or their eyes dimmed with some smoke of honor, or worldly wealth. Many other causes of pride might be noted in the nature of man. For those that are of a hot and burning nature, as cholerike persons, are more subiect to this vice then many others, and that chiefly for two reasons. For holding of the nature of fire, which alwaies ascendeth vpward, if they follow their naturall inclination, they will take also of the nature thereof, aspiring continually vnto high matters. And as the fire is light, quicke and violent, so will their iudgement and all their affections be, which will carry them away headlong and greatly trouble them. It is very requisite therefore that water should be cast vpon this fire. Now as pride breedeth arrogancie, so enuy, ill will, anger, rancour, and desire of reuenge, doe follow and accompany it, together with impatience, indignation, selfe loue, obstinacie, and other such like vices. For a proud person waxeth enuious at the good of another, as if hee thought himselfe onely worthy, or as if he accounted all greatnesse in others a hinderance to his owne. And because he supposeth that he is neuer so well esteemed of as he deserueth, he waxeth very angry being desirous to reuenge himselfe if there be any meanes. Besides, to the end hee might alwaies seeme to be better then others, he neuer ceaseth boasting and bragging. For pride being nothing els but winde that puffeth vp the heart (euen as fire causeth water to swell and to send forth great waumes) if the proud man should not finde some issue for this winde, he would burst asunder. Therefore he speaketh big, he chideth and threatneth, thundreth and lighteneth, and waxeth so insolent, that both for his words and deeds hee becommeth intollerable vnto al. And because he cannot giue place to any, if he stand in contention for any thing, he holdeth his opinion with invincible obstinacy: insomuch that no authoritie whatsoever no truth how apparantly soeuer it bee laid before him, no benefit or profit shall be able to turne him from that which he hath once imagined. For his desire to be preferred before all, and in all matters, is so hot and feruent, that he feareth nothing more then to be accounted inferiour in any one matter to any other body whosoever he be. And this causeth him also to be vnteachable & vnapt to learne. For by reason of his pride, he is ashamed to learne. Besides, the ambitio & insatiable desire of glory that is in him, causeth him that he cannot suffer any admonition, but continueth resolute in that which he hath once taken hold of. And he is so farre from suffering patiently, that any man should condemne him, or any word or deed of his, that he will haue his vices taken for vertues, and looketh to be commended for them. Yea some are so passionate, and carried away with so great impatience and furious indignation, that they storme and rage not only against men, but also against God, euen so far forth as to despise & blaspheme him openly. For the ignorance & inconsideratnes that engendreth pride is so blockish and rash, that it giueth vs no leisure to consider of and to iudge what good things are in vs, neither from whence they come, or who it is that giueth them, or in what maner, or for what reason. To be short, God commeth not at all into our thought, neither do we attribute any thing vnto any other besides our selues. And although many proud persons dissemble these damnable affections, & dare not oftentimes lay their hearts so open, but rather think there is no such matter in them, neuertheless it is so in truth and in effect, so that all men would iudge them to be such, if they were able to see and know as God seeth & knoweth. Moreouer, we are to note, that pride is such a vice, that it is a harder matter for a man to bee at peace and concord therewith, then any other whatsoever. Whereupon Salomon saith, That only by pride doth man make contention. Yea there is alwaies strife & dissention amongst the proud themselves, when euery one desireth to be preferred one before another, and cannot. As for humbling and abasing themselves, there is no talke of that, vnlesse they draw a litle backward that they may the better leape forward, and debase themselves, that they may ascend vp higher. And as for friendship, a proud man hath neuer any in him that is true and sound, but onely that which is counterfeite and fained towards them that submit themselves vnto him through flatterie. But that which is most dangerous in pride, is when it is bred of humility, of modesty, and of vertue, Pride bred of vertue. For there are many, who considering their owne modestie and other vertues, and condemning pride and other vices, are delighted therewith after an insolent maner, and are puffed vp with pride thereby. Whereby we see what windings and slippery turnings are in that olde serpent the Father of pride, into how many fashions he changeth himselfe, and in what maner he hath infected and poysoned our heart. For he hath brought it to this passe, that as venomous beasts turne at they cate, how good soeuer it be, into venime, so the proud man turneth all his thoughts, words and deeds into pride. For he draweth and referreth euery thing to his owne honor and glory: and therefore S. Chrysostome very aptly compareth Vaine glory to a Moth. For as the Moth marreth and consumeth that cloth in which it is bredde, so vaine glory sometime springeth of vertue, and afterward corrupteth it. For there is no vertue so excellent, which is not turned into vice and made abominable before GOD, so soone as it is mingled therewith. A similitude.

Seeing then pride is such an horrible monster, as that which breedeth and bringeth forth so many other monsters, we ought to seek diligently after al remedies for it that may possibly be had, whereby it may be tamed and kept vnder, and so our soules cured of such a dangerous disease and plague. Now forasmuch as it proceedeth of ignorance and of inconsideratenesse, and through the want of the due knowledge of GOD and of our selues, wee must redresse A remedy against pride. this euill by the vertues contrary to these vices, namely by the true knowledge of God, of his word, and of our selues.

Which we shall obtaine if he deale so graciously with vs as to fill vs with his holy Spirit, and to giue vs an humble heart, that renouncing all pride and all arrogancy, we may learne to walke in his feare, and in all obedience to his holy will, so that we wholly consecrate our selues vnto him both in bodie, soule, and spirit, in Will, heart and all our affections. Now hauing spoken sufficiently of that matter into which we fell whilest wee handled the second belly, which God hath placed in man for the lodging of the vitall parts, and namely of the heart, which is the seate of the affections, it remaineth, that we consider of the third belly, which is the seate of the naturall powers and vertues of the soule: of which thou shalt begin now to discourse, ACHITO B.

Of the naturall powers of the Soule, & what sundry vertues they haue in the nourishment of the body, of their order and offices: of their agreement and necessary vse: where the Vegetatiue soule is placed in the body, and what vertue it hath to augment the same. Chap. 60.

ACHITO B. The disposition & placing of the principal parts of our body & of the noblest members thereof, is a goodly school, wherein we may learn, how much more careful we ought to be of heauen then of the earth, and of the spirit then of the body. We haue already heard, how the internall parts of man were divided into three bellies & lodgings, of which the two former, namely the braine and the heart, together with the vertues, offices and works of the soule in them, haue bin declared vnto vs. It remaineth that we consider of the last lodging of the body, which properly beareth the name of belly, & which is the seate of these naturall powers and vertues of the soule, which we call Vegetatiue and nourishing, and is diuided into 3, kinds, namely, into the vertue of nourishing, of augmenting or growing, Three kinds of the Vegetatiue facultie in the soule. A profitable meditation. and of engendring. Now when we see this order and disposition in our nature, we ought seriously to thinke, that seeing GOD hath placed the heart between the head and this belly, the Vitall vertue of the soule between the Animall and Nutritiue, and the will between the vnderstanding and the most sensuall part in vs, therefore the heart, affections, & will ought to looke alwaies on high, & not downward, to the end they should ioyne to the most noble, celestiall and diuine part, and not to that which is most base, sensual, and earthly. Whereunto that also ought to induce and leade vs, which we learned before of the agreement between the highest and middlemost of these principall & more noble parts of the body, vnto which this last is inferiour in all kinde of excellency, beauty and delight.

The belly of which we are now to discourse, containeth all the members & instruments that serue for nourishment and generation: whereupon it is termed the Kitchen and Nursery of the body, and the seminary & wellspring of mankind. But before we enter into a particular particular consideration of these members and instruments, wee are to looke into the naturall powers of the Vegetative soule that is in them. And first we will note, that which wee speake of elsewhere, of the office of heate and moisture in the nature of the body, that as moisture keepeth heate within it, so heate drinketh and eateth vp moisture as much as it may, digesting and dispelling it by the vertue & action of it owne nature. Now whilest this moisture is thus digested by the heate, there is a separation made of that which is profitable in the body, from that which is superfluous, & consequently hurtfull to the body. That which is profitable for it, is the iuyce and humour that agreeth with it, in regard of the similitude & likeness that is between them. Whereupon it followeth, that all moisture that is greatly diuerse or contrary to the body, is hurtfull for it, as also dry matter, which likewise hurteth the health and life thereof. So that this vertue of the soule, which we call naturall, or otherwise Vegetative, and which comprehendeth vnder it the vertue of nourishing, of augmenting, and of engendring (every of which hauing sixe other tending all to one end as wee heard already) this vertue I say, causeth that which is profitable for the nourishment of the body, first to be distributed vnto the members, and then to be turned into the bodily sustenance of the liuing creature, because that vertue and power of the soule doth embrace and receiue it: acknowledging it already to be a part of the body. Therefore the vertue of drawing nourishment that is in the soule, hath for an helper the vertue of retaining and keeping, vntill there be a conuenient change thereof made by the facultie, and power of digesting, and as it were dressing of it.

For otherwise the attractive and retentive power, were to small purpose. Now when the meat is digested, so much of it as is pure must be separated from that which is impure, by the vertue of purging; & that which is impure, must be deliuered ouer to the expulsive vertue to be cast out, and the rest which is pure to the vertue of distributing, after which the vertue of incorporating executeth his office and duty.

Thus you see how all these particular vertues, seruing to the generall vertue of nourishing doeth their duties one after another according to that order, which nature hath assigned them. For except this agreement and order were kept, there would be great confusion, and the body could not receiue his due nourishment. Therefore doth one of them attend vpon and helpe another, yea all of them tend to one and the same end by diuers means. For after the meate is receiued, attracted and retained, it must be digested before it be separated: so that the expulsive vertue is to attend vpon this separation and distinction. Neither can the attractive or drawing vertue doe his office well, vnlesse the body be first emptie: neyther the vertue of concocting or preparing, if the body be not purged of the meate receiued before. And if any of these vertues doth not his duty, the residue are made more dull, slow and languishing. For there is such agreement betwixt them, and they are by such equall proportion tempered throughout the whole body, that nothing can befall any one of them, but the residue will feele it.

Neither can that which is wanting in one be supplied by an other. For GOD having assigned to every one his proper office, they deale not one in anothers affaires, but every one abideth in his own office, and goeth not beyound his appointed bounds and limites: as the like is to be seen in the printing house and amongst them that stamp money. For if the compositor faile in setting of his letters, the Printer that putteth ynke vpon the forms, doth not correct the faults of the Compositor. And if the Printer doth not distribute his ynke well, he that draweth the sheets from the presse correcteth not his fault. For every one hath his office apart, with which only he medleth. So likewise in Coyne, if hee that prepareth and fineth the mettall faile in his duty, he that cutteth it in pieces will correct nothing, but deuised it as it is deliuered to him. Then he that maketh it flat, that it may bee fit for him that stampeth it, doth nothing but that which is committed to his charge: and if he that stampeth it, findeth it not so flat or so round as it ought to be, yet doth he nothing but marke it, and so leaueth it as he found it.

Moreouer, we are to note well, how God giueth vs even in our nature, a goodly instruction concerning that order and concord that ought to be among vs all, by doing every one his duty, and helping each other so farre as we may. For we may learne three principall points in that order, which GOD hath set betweene vertues of the Vegetative soule for the nourishing of the body, which serue greatlie for the preservation of humane society. First, how every one ought to behaue himselfe in his office, and not leave others to performe that worke which is enioyned him. Secondlie, howe euerie one of vs ought ought to keepe his ranke and order, not making ouer much hast nor beeing to slacke, and without any confusion of offices, or vsurping any thing of that which belongeth to others. Thirdly, the consideration of those inconueniences which may befall euery common wealth and society of men, if this order be not well kept and obserued. For the like will happen vnto it, that doth to a body, which is not nourished as it ought to bee, and in which the naturall vertues doe not their duty, as I haue declared. For from thence proceedeth all the confusion that is in the life of man, and all those miseries which wee dayly see therein.

Concerning the seates of these vertues of the nourishing soule mentioned by vs, wee are to know, that although they bee greater and more apparant in some parts then in others, yet they are spread throughout the whole body, but after a diuerse manner. For in perfect liuing creatures, the concoction of the meate is first made in the stomacke, that so it may be prepared for the liuer: the second is made in the liuer, that it may bee turned into blood: the third is in all the members, that it may be changed into their substance. So that there is no other end or stay in the body, of concocting, and consequently of purging the meate, and of casting out that which is superfluous. For the heate doth continually warme, and as it were seeth the moysture: neither is there any meate so pure, which hath not alwaies some excrements and superfluties, that are to be separate and eiected.

Heereof it is, that the whole body of liuing creatures is as it were bored through, and hath diuers pipes to the end there might be more open passages for the auoyding of these excrements according to that purging which is done day and night by the parts appoynted thereto, as we haue already touched it, speaking of those members whereby such purging is performed after a diuers manner, especially when wee spake of the braine. Now besides that purging which is vnder the arme-pits and in the groyne, wee see how the thinnest excrements voyde at euery part of the body, as we may iudge by that filth which dayly is seene in the head, hands, feete and in all the rest of the body. For wee cannot bulie our selues so much in washing and cleansing all the parts and members of the body, but still we may finde somewhat to wash & to make cleane. Therefore we stand in neede of daily nourishment, that whatsoeuer diminisheth continually from vs, may from time to time be restored and made good againe. But this vertue of nourishing, is the first and simplest of all the naturall vertues of the Vegetatiue soule. For there are two others necessary for the life and preservation of liuing creatures, of which we haue already spoken, namely the power of augmenting and that other of engendring. So that liuing creatures are not onely nourished by that foode which they receiue, but they growe bigger and begette their like. For there is no liuing creature that hath a bodie, but it groweth vp vntill it come to a certaine greatnesse and measure. For this cause the vertue of augmenting and growing was added to the nourishing vertue: and the vertue of engendering to them both, but so as they differ in maine poyntes. For first, although the vertues of nourishing and of augmenting agree in this, that they are both given to euery liuing creature, yet they differ heerein, that the vertue of nourishing continueth alwaies so long as the creature liueth, euen from the beginning of it vnto the end. But the vertue of growing greater, although it beginne with the other, yet hath it a set time limited, wherein it stayeth: and as before the creature waxed bigger and increased in greatnesse and vigour, so after it commeth to the appointed time, it beginneth to fall and to diminish, and as it were to retire backe, and to retrain it selfe. And as for the vertue of engendering, it differeth from both the other, first in that it is not given so generally to all liuing creatures as they are, and then in that it beginneth not so soone. For it commeth then when the liuing creature through nourishment and groweth, hath attained to those vertues that are necessarie for generation.

Besides, it hath this common with the vertue of augmentation, that it hath certaine limites and boundes, vnto which after it is once come, it weakeneth and in the ende decayeth vtterly. Wherein it differeth from the nourishing vertue. Now the vertue of growing greater hath as many other particular vertues vnder it for the execution of it owne office, as the vertue of nourishing hath according as was touched before. Whereby we learne, that bodies growe not greater, neither augment by the heaping vp of much matter outwardly applied, as when a house is set vp, wee see timber ioyned to timber, and stone to stone in the building of it; but this is done by the same hidden and secrete arte and cunning in nature, whereby wee are nourished. For in this point there is no difference betweene the vertue of nourishing, and that of augmenting, but only heerein that, in nourishment the meate is turned into the substance of the body, and in augmenting, the foode being thus turned, doth from within stretch forth the quantity of the body outwardly. And so this vertue of augmenting dependeth of the nourishing vertue. For meate nourisheth as it is a substance with qualities meete for nourishment, and augmenteth by reason of the quantie it hath. For this cause hath God created the bodies of living creatures with such a substance, that as they have sundry passages and holes in them like to sponges to the end to purge by them, so hee would that the substance they receive by their foode might passe by the same holes, that they might augment and grow greater. So that all of them have their pores and little holes albeit they appeare not to the eie, whereby nourishment entreth and extendeth it selfe in greatnes, length, and thickenesse. The consideration hereof hath caused some skilfull men, to place mettals and stones in the ranke of living creatures, because they grow in the earth, as the bodies of plants and living creatures doe. Neither is their opinion without some shew of reason. For we know that they grow and increase and that inwardly: which seemeth not to be done without drawing vnto themselves some inward nourishment, as living creatures vse to doe. Besides they have also their pores and passages to stretch forth and augment themselves by. Notwithstanding all this there is greater reason to place them in the ranke of those natures and creatures, which augment and grow greater, by adding and ioyning of matter vnto them, as wee see fountaines and rivers to increase: and so likewise fire. Which albeit it seemeth to be nourished & augmented with that matter which is put vnto it, yet is it not nourished as living creatures are by meanes of that foode which they receive. For they have their bounds of growing set them which they cannot passe, as we see the like also in plants: but fire hath no limits, as that which alwayes increaseth, as long as it findeth any matter to burne.

Whereby we may conclude, that naturall heate in man or in other living creatures, is not the cause of their nourishing and groweth, but onely the instrument: and that the true cause, in regarde of second causes, is in the soule next after God, who is the first cause of all things, yea the cause of causes. Therefore it is hee that hath allotted out to every man the terme first of his life and groweth, and then of his declining and death: so that according as he will either prolong or shorten our life, and cause vs to encrease or diminish, so he disposeth the second causes, and those meanes whereby he will bring it to passe. Now we must consider what instruments the soule useth to execute in the bodie of man, her naturall works of nourishing and augmenting it (of which we have now spoken) and after what manner shee useth them. First then we will looke into the ventricle and stomacke, and see what figure, what Orifices, and filaments it hath. This matter then, A S E R, belongeth to thee to intreate of.

What instruments the Soule useth in the body about the naturall worke of nourishing and augmenting: of the Ventricle or stomacke, and of the figure, Orifices, and Filaments it hath: of the coates of the stomacke, and of what substance and nature it is: of the causes of hunger, and appetite: of the inferiour Orifice. Chap. 61.

ASER. We should be very happy if, we knew how to follow that order in all our doings which God hath set downe in all his workes, and wherof he giueth nature vnto vs for a Mistresse. But if the simplicitie of our vnderstanding bee not able to attaine so high wisdom, at the least we may know how farre short euery one of vs commeth of our duty, and from whence proceedeth all the confusion that is in the life of man, and all those miseries which we commonly beholde. On the other side, nothing could hinder vs were it not a voluntary and malicious ignorance, in that we consider not, what a meruailous and excellent Workemaster, God the Creator sheweth himselfe to bee, in this part of the soule wherof our present discourses are, and in that order which he hath set therein, and in those vertues which he hath bestowed vpon it. For his worke is so excellent, worthy of so great admiration, that no wisdom or power whatsoever is able so much as to imitate it. Wherefore we are to account it a very great and noble blessing, to haue onely some knowledge of it. For there will be alwaies enough whereto maruile greatly, and namely in the consideration of those instruments, which the soule useth in the nourishment & groweth of bodies, as we shall know in the sequēle of our discourses.

Therefore as heretofore we haue handled and spoken of the diuers powers of the soule, and of those instruments it hath in regard of the Animall and vitall parts, as of the braine, heart, head, and other externall members of the body, so now we are to consider of the internall instruments, which serue the naturall powers of the soule. And first, it hath the liquors and humours of the body tempered together by a certaine Law and reason of the Creatour that created them. Secondly, the other instruments of the soule, are those members both externall and internall, which are framed and haue their seuerall proportion, euery one as neede requireth, for the office assigned vnto them by God their Creatour. For before the soule bee cloathed with the body, these instruments are fashioned and made fit for it by nature in those things wherein it could doe nothing of it selfe. For the soule cannot create her body. But after that God hath created the body for it, and that by his appointment nature hath disposed and fitted the same soule, so farre forth as is requisite, before it can shew what vertue it hath, and settle it selfe to worke in the body; then is shee left to doe that which shee is able to performe by the powers of her presence, and to exercise her selfe therein, beginning alwayes at the least and basest of her offices, before shee apply her selfe to the chiefest, by displaying her principall powers. For whilest the childe is in his mothers belly, the soule practiseth vpon it her Vegetatiue and nourishing vertue by which it is nourished and groweth in greatnesse, as wee see the like in plants. And when it is borne, it receiveth besides from the soule the power of moouing and of sence, as wee see beasts haue: and last of all by little and little the soule displayeth her other principall vertues. But to speake of our matter subiect, and to handle particularly those instruments of the soule, which she vseth in the nourishing and augmenting of the bodie, wee will beginne at the Ventricle, commonly called the stomacke.

Now because this name is vsed diuersly, we are to note, that the Physicians, who distinguish the partes of the body more exactly and properly, apply this name of stomacke more specially to the vpper mouth of it, and call the whole by the name of Ventricle, whereof wee will speake anone. Oftentimes also they take the stomacke for the whole passage and pipe, called Oesophagus or the throte: but commonly the whole Ventricle is called by that name. Therefore I will vse it indifferently, thereby to apply my selfe the better to the vsuall manner of speaking. Wee are to know then first of all, that amongst all the members seruing to nourishment, GOD hath appointed this to be the first, as that which receiveth the meate and drinke sent vnto it by the throte. And to the ende wee may the better know the providence of GOD, in the offices and commodities of this member, I will first speake somewhat of the figure and forme therof, then of the situation of it, and last of all, of the substance of it. The figure of it is rounde and long much like to a bagge-pipe, as that which beeing somewhat larger at the bottome, and arising vpperwardes towards the left side, groweth narrower by little and little. For seeing it was to occupie the whole space that is betwixt the liuer and the spleene, it was requisite that it shoulde be long, to the ende it might not trouble that place which is assigned vnto them, but giue them place. Likewise it was requisite that it shoulde be round, both because the round forme is most capable, and also because it will not so easily be broken and marred as other formes will be.

Vnto the stomacke is ioyned this narrow pipe called Oesophagus, to the end it might receiue into it thereby, all kindes of meate and drinke, as we haue declared when wee spake of the pipes in the throte, & of meates & drinckes. For this cause there are two mouthes or dories in the stomacke, called Orifices, of which the one is called the higher Orifice or mouth because it is vppermost, and the other for the same reason is called the lower Orifice. The first is to receiue the meate that is sent to the stomacke by the Oesophagus. And this is that which the Physicians call by the proper name of stomacke, as wee heard before, although commonly it is called the heart. For when wee feele any weakenesse there, or any delire to vomite, wee commonly say that wee are ill at the heart, or that something lyeth vpon our heart. But this sence of griefe is not at the heart, but in that part of the Ventricle, which is called the vppermost Orifice or stomacke, whose seate and place is on the left side neere to the backe-bone. And this Orifice or mouth of the stomacke, is a great deale more large then the nethermost, because the meate is oftentimes not well chewed, besides many great and harde morsels that are swallowed now and then. this part is very sensible, because there is the originall and place of appetite, by reason of those nerues of which it is chiefly made, that grow together like vnto nets. Heereof wee may note this, that the prouidence of God hath so well provided for all the members and instruments of nourishment, that there is not one of them, but it hath some small sinew to giue it sence, whereby it may feele and perceiue what humours are hurtfull vnto it, that by the griefe which it receiueth, men may be moued to haue recourse to such remedies as are able to releue it.

But to returne to our matter, we are to know, that the vpper Orifice hath the Midriffe ioyned vnto it, which is in steade of a doore to close and shutte it vp, that when it is full of meates and drinckes, they should not ascend vp againe by the throate. Concerning the nethermost Orifice it is both by the Greeke and Latine Writers called by a name that signifieth a Doore-keeper, being made to let out the meate concocted in the Ventricle together with the superfluties and excrements. Therefore also it is narrower then the vpper Orifice, and compassed about with a certaine kernelly flesh, to the end that nothing should passe by which were not well digested before, and that by meanes of the mouth of it made in the manner of a ring. It is situated on the right side vnder the hollownesse of the liuer, a little lower then the other Orifice. But it is not at the very bottome of the Ventricle, but a little higher, to the end the foode being retained and kept at the botome, might bee heated and digested there. So that after the stomacke hath received into it the meate and drinke, both these doores as well aboue as beneath are shut, that the heate within might be retained and kept close. For this cause there are certaine filaments or small stringes, of which some are direct and straight, hauing in them a maruailous secret vertue of nature to draw vnto them: others are ouerthwart, and passe cleane crosse the former through certaine little corners that lie long-wise. Thei office is to close vp the vpper part from the body of the stomacke. Besides, there are other crooked filaments, which through oblique corners passe alongst the sides of both the other: and these, because they close the whole body of the stomacke, haue power of retaining, and serue to shut vp the mouth of the stomacke. So that these filaments or threedes in regard of their office, may bee compared to the stringes of a purse whereby it is shut. And because the stomacke, being closed and shut vp, digesteth the meate a great deale better then if it were gaping and wide open, therefore nature hath provided in this sort. Wherein we see it resembleth a pot set to seething, which retaineth the heate, and seetheth that which it containeth better when it is close couered, then when it is without a couer.

Now we are further to know, that the stomacke is made of two coates or skins one within an other, consisting partly of a fleshy, & partly of a sinewy substance. The innermost is fuller of sinewes & thicker, hauing straight filaments within, wherewith as it were with fingers, it draweth the meate downward: and without, it hath certaine oblique filaments, which compasse it about, and serue to holde it in. The outward coate, which is more fleshy, hath ouerthwart filaments that serue for expulsion. For when the stomacke is sometime overcharged with meate, so that it is not able to embrace & keepe it for digestion, the by means of the expulsive vertue, it driueth out that which is superfluous, & prouoketh a man to vomite, to the end it be not filled through the waight & burthen of the meate it beareth. For this cause the throate is a pipe appointed for the moouing of things vp and downe, not hauing any attractive force in it, but being onely a meere way and place of passage, through which meates and drinckes passe to and fro as neede requireth.

Concerning the seate of the stomacke, it is placed in the middest of the body betweene the liuer and the splene, and that in such sort that the liuer embraceth & warmeth it on the right side, and the splene doth the like on the left side. As for the substance of it, it is of the nature of sinewes, that is cold and dry. For it is very conuenient it should be so, first, because of the sence and feeling, that it might be inticed by such things as agree with it, reiecting al others: secondly, in regarde of appetite, that it might bee the greater and of more efficacie. Moreover, it was requisite that it should be of such matter, to the end it might be the harder, and receiue the lesse hurt from the hardnesse and sharpnes of meates. And besides the naturall heate which it hath of it selfe, it is heated also by the neighbour parts, to the end it may the better performe that duty that lieth vpon it. For this cause it hath on the right side the liuer, which is vnto it in steade of a boyling pot or cauldron: and on the left side it hath the splene for the same purpose: the muscles of the chine bone are behinde it, and before is the skinne commonly called the Kell. Likewise as the heart is not far from it so the midriffe lying ouer it, doth greatly heate it by continuall motion. Whereby we see, how the prouidence of God hath well fenced and cloathed it on all sides, that it might haue as much heate as is needfull for it. Touching this skinne called the Kell, it is a double coate or covering, spreading it selfe wholly ouer the intralles, being in fashion like to a purse, by reason that it is double and wouen like to a nette, consisting of fatte, of veines, of arteries, and of a skinne. Moreouer, the stomacke is warmed by the spirits that enter into it in great abundance, by reason that it is knit vnto the neighbour parts by veines and arteries. Now because it serueth to the nutritiue facultie, the naturall vertue thereof is to desire foode, the sense and feeling of which appetite is in the vpper Orifice, into which many sinewes are wouen that come downe from the braine. Therefore when the members of the body being empty desire nourishment, and labour to draw it from the veines, and the veines from the liuer, and the liuer from the stomacke, and the stomacke from the Orifice, then is there a certaine contraction & wrinckling as it were of the Orifice, by reason of the veines that sucke it. In which contraction and gathering together of the stomacks mouth, there is by meanes of the nerues a kinde of sence and griefe, which wee call hunger, whereby liuing creatures are stirred vp to seeke after foode and nourishment. I make no repetition here of that which hath bene spoken before, namely, of the drawing, retaining, altering, and expulsiue vertues of the Vegetatiue soule. For by our discourses we easily vnderstand, how every one of them doth his duty both in the stomacke and liuer, and in all the other members of the body. But the altering vertue is the chiefe, whose office is to change in the stomacke, and to conuert into iuyce and liquor, that meate which it hath receiued.

This liquor is called by the Physicians Chylus, which is a Greeke word, and resembleth the creme of a ptisane: it is concocted in the stomacke, vntill it be so wel prepared that it may be sent vnto the liuer. Which concoction is first & principally made by the naturall vertue of the stomacke, as it appeareth in this, that euery stomackedoth after a wonderful manner embrace and warme al the meate which it receiue, even as the whole wombe embraceth her burthen and fruite vntill it come to ripenes: & when the time of birth is come, the expulsiue vertue thereof driueth it forth. So fareth it with the meate in the stomacke, excepting this difference, that the stomacke needeth not so long a time to finish his worke in, as the wombe doth. Afterward this naturall vertue of the stomacke, is holpen and warmed by those meanes before declared. And when the stomacke hath finished this first concoction, whereby the meate receiued is so dulle prepared that it may be sent into the liuer, then the lower Orifice and doore called the Porter, openeth it selfe, and sendeth this liquor into the intralles and bowelles, which are ordained as well to receiue it, as to purge forth the superfluities and extrements. Therefore, AMANA, thy speech shall be of these, that so we may goe forward with our matter of those instruments of the vegetatiue soule, which she vseth in her naturall workes.

Of the intralles and bowelles, and of their names and offices: of the nature of the three smaller guts, and of the other three that are greater: of the instructions which we may learne by these things. Chap. 62

A*MANA*. If there were no other reason but this, that the poorest and basest persons among men are the creatures of GOD, and created after his image and likeness, as well as the richest, mightiest, and highest in dignities and honours, and that as well the one as the other, are members of the body of mankind; it were enough to withhold vs from contemning any person, of what condition, estate or quality soeuer he be, so that his vocation be of GOD, and profitable for mankind. For in contemning any creature and his estate, GOD who created him and ordained his vocation, is contemned and iniured thereby, considering that he is his worke, which cannot be mocked, but the workemaster that framed it must needs be scorned. Besides, we are to consider, that many of them that are taken to be the vildest and basest persons, are a great deale more profitable and necessarie, and so likewise their callings and offices, then many others that are in greater reputation, and more honourable according to mans iudgement, who notwithstanding might more easily be spared, then those of whom there is lesse accompt and reckoning made.

The poore
soit are not to be contem-ned.

The like may be saide of the vse of the members of our bodies, and of the necessitie and neede which we haue of them, that are accompted most vile and abiect, which albeit they

The necessity of the bowels be lesse honourable then the rest, yet are they more necessary for this life of ours, then many others that are a great deale more noble and more excellent. For wee may liue without eyes, without eares, without hands, without feete, and without many other goodly members : but not without the intralles and bowelles, which are but the sinkes and wide-draughts of our bodies, although there be but one of them wanting. For there is not one of them but is profitable, yea necessarie for vs, inso much that no other can doe that office which lyeth vpon it : the Lord hauing so disposed it, that every one of them must discharge his owne office by himselve.

The number and names of the guttes. Of these intralles and guts there are fixe in number, neere vnto the stomacke, namely, three small and three great ones, being all of a round and hollow figure, according to the greatnesse and thickenesse of euery one of them. They are called the instruments of distribution and purgation, because they distribute the foode, and send forth the superfluities and excrements. Now to containe all these in their place, they are couered and wrapped about together with the other entralles of the naturall parts, with two coats or coverings, namely, with that which is called the Kel, wherof mention was made in the former discourse and which couereth the bowelles, stretching it selfe euen to the priuy parts : so that it executeth the same office vnto them, that it doth vnto the stomacke, as wee were giuen to vnderstand.

Of the Peritone or inner rine of the belly ioyned to the kall. The vses of it.

Besides, there is an other coate or skinne called Peritone, because it is spread round about the lower belly, and enuironeth the stomacke, the bowelles, the kall, the liuer, the spleene, and the kidneis : in a word, it couereth all the members from the midriffe downe to the sharebone. The vse of this is great. For first, it serueth for a covering to couer all the members : then it serueth also for the muscles that are laide vpon them. Moreouer, it causeth the superfluities of drie meates to descend more speedily. Fourthly, it keepeth the stomacke and bowels that they swell not easily : and fiftly, it knitteth together and conioyneth all the members within it, as we haue seene how the other parts of the body are separated and clothed with skinnes and membranes. For this cause it is framed and fashioned like to an egge, and hath his beginning from the ligaments, which binde together the turning ioints of the reines, and is knit vnto them. So that the vse of it is to tie and knit vnto the backe the members of the inferiour belly. Now concerning the intralles and bowels, although they bee vnited to the stomacke, and so ioynly follow each other, they differ in figure, in situation, and in offices. True it is, that their substance differeth little from that of the stomack. For they are of a certain whitish flesh, hauing no blood in any of them : neither is there any other difference, but onely in this, that the bigger guts are more full and fat, the smaller are otherwise. Again, they haue all this in common together, that they are made of two coates, which God hath giuen them for the greater preservation of them, and of the life of living creatures. For oftentimes vlcers and sores breed, chiefly when some great inflammation hath gone before, so that they putrifie and fret, and one of the coats be spoiled. Neuerthelesse a man may liue by the other that contineth sound and dischargeth well enough all his duties.

The substance of the bowels

The bowels are made of two coates.

Of the three small guts.

Of their names. The duodene or stomacke gut.

The hungry gut.

Now forasmuch as they are instruments appointed for the purging of the body, the fibres or little strings both of the inner and vtter coates, are all in a manner crosse wise, except some few intermingled longwise, to the end that the purging might be moderated in such sort, as that it neither be too much nor too little. The three smaller are placed vppermost, which because they were made that the meat being turned into liquor might be conueyed through them, therefore it was requisite they should be so slender, and that chiefly for two causes. The first, to the ende the passage might be more easie : the other, because that in the very passage some concoction is made of the liquor and foode : so that they are the sooner warmed, by reason of their slender and thinne making. Now concerning the name and peculiar office of euery one : the first is called Duodene, because of the length of it, which is without any folding or turning. It is as it were a part of the stomacke hanging down, or as a changing of the stomacke into a gut, being twelue fingers long, whereupon it was so called by the ancient Physicians, although now there is none found of that length. It beginneth at the porter of the stomacke, and is so seated besides the liuer, that looke where that leaueth, and the other following (called the hungry gut) beginneth, there is a passage from the bladder of gall, and to bring the yellow humor thither called choller, to the ende it might helpe forward the meate, and make cleane the gut. The second, called the hungry gut, is so termed, because it holdeth but a little food in regard of the other following, so that it may be said after a sort to fast : whereof there are three causes. The first is, the great great number of Meseraicall veines and arteries, which are in greater number about that gut then about the rest. Whereupon they sucke out more speedily the liquor and food which passeth through that, then if they were fewer in number. The second cause is, because the liuer, which is neere to that gut, doth likewise drawe nourishment from it, which is sooner done then from the rest that are farther off. The third is, the falling downe of the cholerike humour into it, which intermedleth not it selfe with the liquor and foode, but glideth downe by the side of this gut vnto that which is called Colon, to the end it may thrust forward the excrements and purge the humours: which it performeth because it is sharpe and biting. Now by reason it continually prouoketh this gut to expulsion, it falleth out to be more empty then the residue.

Then followeth the third smal intralle called Ileus by the Gracians, both because it hath many foldings, as also for the manifold knitting of it to the Mesenterium from whence sundry dry veines come into this. The hungry gut and this haue both one office: onely heerein they differ, that the hungry Gut is sooner sucked then this, which retaineth a longer time that liquor and foode that it receiue. For this cause it is of a greater length, and hath more foldings and turnings, to the ende it may the better concoct the liquor, and be tempering with the foode the longer time: whereby it shall not neede to bee filled, and stuffed presently with other meates. And herein we haue to note the good forecast of nature. For if we were presently to returne againe to the Table after we had taken our meate, we should doe nothing all our life time but eate and drinke. Therefore some of the ancient Philosophers haue in this respect acknowledged the prouidence of God, saying that these foldings, plites, and windings, were made to this ende, that men might not liue ignorantly as beasts that are destitute of all knowledge: which would follow vndoubtedly, if they were of necessitie to attend alwaies vpon the belly.

Now let vs speake of the other three great Guts, which follow the small ones. These then are lower, more fleshy and thicke, because their chiefe office is to receiue the excrements of the aboue named Guts, and to reaine the same vntill the iust time come to send them forth: even as it is the office of the three former to distribute the liquor and foode by the Miseraicall veines. The first of these great ones is called the blinde Gut, because that being large and great, it hath but one way, both to receiue in, and to let out the matter receiued whereupon it is commonly called by some the Sack or Budget Gut. His office is to receiue the excrements from the last lesser Gut: & hauing drawne out some nourishment from them to cast forth the rest to the other Gut called Colon. For this cause the doores and holes of these three last Guts, concur well together in a hollow place.

Now because this blind Gut is wide & round, & hath many foldings, among other things it standeth in steade of an other stomacke, to keepe and to preserue meate in it against some want and necessitie to come, and to distribute it to the neighbour members after a long hunger. Whereunto the Gut called Colon doth also helpe, both by reason of the capacitie of it, as for the oblique situation thereof, as also because it keepeth within it foode and nourishment. Concerning the name of it, the Greeke word from whence it is taken signifieth Gain, because it is greater and more capable then any of the rest: or else it may signifie as a man would say Cut, because it is as it were cut into sundrie holes and hath diuers turnings. For it receiue the excrements, and to ende they should not passe away by and by, it sendeth them by little and little through straight passages. The cholerike humour descendeth out of the hungry Gut into this, whereby the dirt is both coloured and driven forth.

Of this Gut called Colon, the Colicke passion taketh the name: as the Ileaca passion doth of the Gut Ileon. Now because this gut is puffed vp more then any of the rest, and is very painefull to them that haue it stopped, it hath certaine straight threds woven amongst the ouerthwart Fibres, which strengthen the coates and skinned thereof to the end they should not breake or cracke, when they are blowne vp and strained. Whereby we see againe how the counsell of Gods prouidence hath notably provided for all things, whose excellent maiestie hath not despised these most base, earthly and brute parts.

Now it remaineth that we should consider of the third Gut, called the straight Gut. For although it proceede from the Gut Colon, yet it differeth from it both in place and figure and is called the Straight Gut, because of the straightnesse of it. Some call it the Fatte Gut, because it is passing fatte in beasts. It reacheth vnto the very fundament at the ende whereof is placed a Muscle, being fashioned round like to a Ring,

The vse of it. Gut is to keepe in, and to retaine ventositie and excrements vntill nature please: to this end that expulsion of them might not be made vpon euery occasion, and in euery place indifferently, against our wils, and contrary to naturall and ciuill honesty. For the vse of the straight Gut is to carry and throw forth cleane out of the body the filth, dregs, and grossest excrements thereof, being such as are altogether vnprofitable and hurtfull to the body. Now for as much as it is the lowest gut and most burthened, by reason that it must hold all the grosse excrements of whatsoever entred into the body by the mouth, and is oftentimes very much blowne and stretched vp, therefore the diuine prouidence hath giuen vnto it more thredes and fibres of all sorts then to any of the rest, and hath made it strong and able to beare the charge. So likewise his heauenly counsaile hath provided, that amongst all the members of the body, those should bee strongest, that haue the greatest burthen and streesse to beare. And for this cause also this straight gutte hath this muscle, which the Philistions call Sphincter, being taken from a Greeke word that signifieth to restraine and close vp, because it is an instrument of voluntarie motion, that openeth and shutteth as we will, when neede requireth.

Now for the ende of this speech, if wee consider well of those parts whereof wee haue spoken, we shall find that we carry about with vs sundrie sorts of sinkes, which are oftentimes ill fauouredly looked vnto. And this ought to put vs in minde of our infirmities and of those goodly shops wee haue in our bodies full of stinking drugges, which ought to take from vs all matter of pride. Moreover wee may learne here, that which was spoken of in the beginning of this discourse, namely, the vse of these members, and the necessitie of the basest and lesse comely parts. Therefore if there were no other respect to be had but this of necessity, we ought to be so far from despising them, especially the workmaster that hath made and disposed them, as that we ought rather thereby to acknowledge his great prouidence, and the care he hath had of vs, seeing it hath pleased him even from the high degree of his maiestie, to provide for the least and last necessities and infirmities of our bodies. So likewise by admiring his so great bounty and goodnesse towards vs, wee haue good occasion by his example, to do the like one towards another, in the performance of all dueties appertaining to a holy and true friendship. Now that we may prosecute our matter subiect, let vs looke into the other naturall powers of the soule. First let vs consider of the Mesenterie, of the Meseraicall veines, of the sweete bread, of the liuer, and of their natures and offices. The handling of these things belong to thee. ARAM.

Of the Mesentarie and Mesareon: of the meseraicall veines, of the Pancreas or sweet bread, and of their nature and office: of the liuer, and of his nature and office: of the rootes, bodies and branches of the veines: of their names and vses, and of the similitude betweene them and the arteries.

Chap. 63.

ARAM. When wee consider how the prouidence of God of reacheth so farre vnto those things that are profitable and necessarie in our bodies, that it forgetteth not, neither omitteth the least thing that is in them: wee should bee very blinde of vnderstanding, if wee doubted that our God provided not as well for all things that are profitable and necessarie for our soules, for the spirituall foode and growth of them, and for their perfect purging and saluation. For albeit there is no superfluitie or excrement, in that spirituall foode wherewith the soule is nourished, yet is it requisit and needfull, that the soule bee purged from those excrements and filthinesse of sinne, wherewith the diuel hath infected and filled it. And so indeed is it purged in Iesus Christ, who hath washed and clenfed vs from our sinnes by his blood, and doth daily purge by his holy spirit, and by those meanes which hee hath ordeined in his Church. Therefore I am out of doubt, that God meant to put men in minde of these things, by the order and necessitie which he hath appointed in the nature of their bodies, both in regard of their foode, and of their nourishment: and that we shal alwaies finde good & holy instructions for the soule, by considering the nature and office of euery part of the body. Let vs then consider of other instruments of

of the naturall power of the soule, then hitherto we haue spoken of.

After the entrals and guts, the Mesenterie followeth, which is placed in the midst of them, whereupon it is so called of the Græcians, as if you would say, dwelling in the midst of the guts. And because it is caried and lift vp into the middle of al these vessels, it is also called by some Mesareon, which name signifieth the selfe same thing in Greeke. Others take Mesareon to be the highest part of the Mesentary, which is also called Calcreas by the Græcians, because the flesh of it is very pleasant to eat, according as the name giueth vs to vnderstand. So that it is no entrall or gut, but a coat and foulded covering in the midst of them: or rather a thicke white flew of a snowie & kernelly substance, that beareth fat, distinguishing the entrals, and knitting them vnto the backe. But it was chiefly created to beare vp and sustaine the Meseraicall veines and arteries, with the sinewes that are in that member: which because they are in danger of breaking, through the vehement motions of the body & such other accidents, therefore the prouidence of God would not haue them with a foundation, prop & defence to countergard them. For this cause he hath fortified and fastened the branches and diuisions of the veines, by such a member & instrument, which serueth in stead of a band & stay both to the great & little ones. Besides, this action and vse also is to fasten and keepe the entralls euery one in his place, and to conuey vnto the liuer by the meseraicall veines, that are called the hands thereof, that liquor which the Grecians call Chylus, of which we haue already spoken. For as the bodies of trees haue their roots, which spread abroad in the earth to draw nourishment from thence, euen so there are branches dispersed throughout the Mesentery, and deriued from the liuer veine, which are ioyned to the bowels, as it were small rootes to draw foode, being much like to haire or cobwebbes. These branches or small rootes are the Meseraicall veines, so called, because they are placed in the vpper part of that member and instrument that is called Mesareon, whereof I spake euen now. Their office and nature is to draw & suck out nourishment from the guttes, and to carry it to the liuer, from whence they haue all their beginning, as appeareth by Anatomic, howsoeuer there are that think, that some of them come not from thence. The flesh of the Mesentery is kernelly and fatty, not onely seruing in stead of a munition and defence, as hath bin said, but also to moisten the entralls and guts, and to preserue the heate both of the bowels and veines. So likewise the arteries are ioyned to the veines, to giue them heate, and to the guts also to concoct the liquor and nourishment. Besides, the nerves and sinewes there, serue to giue sense to the guts. There is moreouer a kernelly flesh, which the phisitions call Pancreas, because he doth wholly resemble flesh, as the Greeke name importeth. It is placed in hollow part of the liuer, that it might be as it were a cushion vnto it, and a perseruer of the diuided parts thereof, by filling the void places that are between the stomake, the liuer and the spleene, to the end it may vphold and protect the Meseraicall veines, and keepe every thing from breaking either by falles or by violent motions. Now touching the liuer, it is a very noble member. For it is the principallest member of all the naturall parts, and the chiefest instrument belonging to the vegetatiue and nourishing power of the soule. It is the first of the nobler parts that is made perfect, when the childe is framed in the mothers wombe, it is the author, shop, and forge of the blood, the original & fountaine of the veines. Therefore the substance of it is a soft & red flesh, like to blood newly pressed out and clodded, Neuerlesse in it owne nature it is perfect flesh, hauing sundry different veines dispersed throughout as it were threedes, and arteries also ioyned vnto the for their refreshing. Now after the stomack hath finished the first concoction of meat, and turned it into liquor as it hath bin declared vnto vs, the second is made in the liuer, after it hath received this liquor so prepared by the stomack & guts as we said, and turned it into blood. This concoction is perfect in the small veins, that are dispersed throughout the body of the liuer. And because God hath ioyned this office to this member, he hath compounded it of such a flesh & matter, as hath given vnto it this proper & peculiar vertue, to conuert into blood that food and nourishment that is brought vnto it, to the end it may be the instrument of the generation of that thing wherwith the body is nourished. Hauing thus transformed the liquor received, it maketh it red like vnto it selfe: as contrariwise, blood is made white in the breasts of womā, both by reaso of their nature & substance, as also for other causes touched by vs. The temperature of the liuer is hot & moist, such as becometh the blood and concoction it hath to perform, which is like to boiled meat. Now for asmuch as this instrument & member is the chiefest in the kitching of mans body, God hath giuen vnto it such a nature & property, as if there were in it a harth, a table, a knife, & a wagoner, as some name the, hauing regard to the diuers actions therof, & to the sundry degrees of concoction made therein. They call the first actiō or degree of concoction by the name of a harth, because it serueth to heat the foode, as a harth doth in a kitching. The second is called a table, namely, when the food beginneth to gather it self together in the liuer, & is there placed as it were vpon a table to be sent vnto the members. The third action hath the name of a knife giuen vnto it, because it diuideth & maketh a separatiō of the humors. And the fourth is as it were the wagoner, because there is the carriage and conueiance of all from thence into the hollow veine. For the naturall vertues and powers gouerne the humors very wel, conducting and leading thē to their due places. For this cause the liuer is the fountaine of blood, & the spring of all the vaines by which it is distributed throughout the body as the hart is the fountaine of the vital spirits, & the originall of the arteries, whereby the spirits necessary for the body are conueied into it, as the blood from the liuer. Wherefore euen as the arteries are a kind of vains to carry & to distribute the aire, breath, & vitall spirits: so likewise the vaines proceeding frō the liuer, are ordained to distribute the blood into all parts of the body. These two are linked together with such a neere alliance & agreemēt, that the vaines administer matter to the vital spirit, which is engendred in the hart of the purest & most spirituall blood as the spirit likewise helpeth the blood by his heat in the arteries. Therefore they haue mouths ioyning each to other, to the end the spirit, as it were a little flame, may receiue nourishment out of the veins, & that the veines may draw spirit & heat from the arteries. For as we haue already touched, our life is much like to a flame in a lampe, that receiue food from the oile put into the lampe, euen so the vital spirit, which is as a flame within vs, draweth & taketh nourishment from the veins. Wherein we haue a goodly example of that mutuall society, which we ought to haue one towards another in this life. Now of those veins that deriue their original frō the liuer, there are 2. principall ones that are very great, of which the others are but as it were branches, that from the liuer spread themselves vpwards & downwards through all the parts of the body. These two veins coming out of the liuer take their beginning from many little veins, which being as it were their roots, ioyne together afterward into two trunks or great bodies, that diuide themselves againe into diuers boughs & branches, whereof some are greater and some lesser, after the maner of trees. The first is called the Port veine, because it is as it were the doore of the liuer out of which it proceedeth, being placed in the hollow part thereof. The vse and profit of it is to receiue nourishment prepared by the stomach & guts, & then to keep it vntil the liuer hath turned it vnto pure blood, for to send it afterward to all the body by the other great veine called the Cave or hollow veine. And this proceeds from the outside of the liuer, resembling the body of a tree, and diuiding it selfe into two great branches, of which the lesser ascendeth vnto the vitall and animall parts, & to the ends of them, and the bigger branch descendeth down alongst the hinder part of the liuer, vpon that part of the chine bone that is between the kidneys, & so goeth to those parts that are contained vnder them. Forasmuch therefore as the arteries & veines are the principall instrumēt, whereby the soule giveth life vnto the body, some learned men expound that of the vital & naturall parts, which Salomon speaks of the siluer coard not lengthned, of the golden ewer broken, of the pitcher broken at the well, & of the wheele broken at the cisterne. We haue already spoken of the siluer chaine and of the golden ewer, when wee discoursed of the chine bone of the backe, and of the marrow of it. Touching the residue, they vnderstand by the well the liuer, which is the fountaine of blood: & by the pitcher, the veins because they are the vessels whereby the blood is taken out of the liuer & drawne thence, that it may be distributed to all the body: and by the cisterne is vnderstood the heart, and by the wheele, the head. For we may already perceiue by that which we haue already said of the heart, how seruiceable the liuer is vnto it, considering that the heart is the fountaine of the vitall spirits and the originall of the arteries, (as the liuer of the blood and of the veins) and that the vitall spirits are engendred in the heart of the purest and most spirituall blood, which it draweth and receiue from the liuer. Moreover, these vitall spirits are by means of the heart sent vnto the braine and the head, to serue the animall powers that haue their places and instruments there, and to serue all the senses as well spirituall as corporall. Therefore the head is aptly compared to a wheele, both for the roundnesse of it: as also because it draweth and receiue the vitall spirits from the heart, which sendeth thē vnto it as the water is drawne from his fountaine, well, or cisterne by means of the wheele. Further, as it is a needefull, that there should be a coard to reach from the wheelle downe to the well, and a pitcher or bucket at the end of the coard to draw water withall.

so the arteries reaching from the heart vp to the head, are like to the coarde and pitcher, whereby the braine draweth vitall spirites from the heart. For the great arterie, called Aorta Of the artery Aorta. by the Physicians, which commeth out of the heart, and is diuided into two great branches, of which the one goeth vpward, to carry the vitall spirit to the superiour parts, and the other downeward to doe the like below, forasmuch as it ioyneth vnto the heart, may be taken for the pitcher that draweth from thence the vitall spirits, as from a well; and the branch that ascendeth vpward may be taken for the coard ioyned vnto the wheele.

The like may be seene in the liuer. For the great veines of it are as it were the pitcher, & the veines that ascend vp vnto the head, as likewise the arteries, are the coarde that draweth vp the blood from out of the liuer. If then we ioyne that which we haue already heard of the siluer chaine or coarde, and of the golden ewer, with that which wee speake now of the pitcher and of the well, of the wheele, and of the cisterne, we may well be assured, that Salomon hath most wisely comprehended in so small a number of wordes, all the internall parts of the body, and all the powers both animall, vitall and naturall, together with all the instruments which they haue in the body and in the members thereof. For first behold the braine signified by the golden ewer: then the pith of the chine bone and the chine bone it selfe by the siluer coard; next, the liuer by the well, which hath also his pitcher: and lastly, the heart which is signified by the cisterne. As for that particularly spoken of the pitcher and wheele broken, which draw water out of the well and cisterne, it is all one as if he had said, that when the fountaine of blood in the liuer waxeth dry and decayeth, the wheele above, namely, the head, is broken, because all the senses both exterior and interior and the animall vertues faile in the body. For the soule wanteth sound instruments to giue life, motion, and sense vnto it, they being worn and consumed by those meanes and causes, which we shall vnderstand hereafter. But to follow our purpose, and not to depart from the matter, we must intreate of the nature of blood, and of other humours in the body, and of their diuersitie and nature. This then ACHITO B. shall be the matter subiect of thy discourse.

Of the blood and of other humours in the body: of their diuersitie and nature, and of the agreement they haue with the elements: of the similitude that is betweene the great garden of this great world, and that of the little world, touching the nourishment of things contained and preserued in them. Chap. 64.

ACHITO B. If in many of our discourses we saw great testimonies of the image of the great world in man, the matter we haue now to handle wil set before our eyes such as are most cleere and euident. For looke how the sea is as it were the great fountain & womb of all waters, and of the floods and riuers that issue out of them to water the whole earth: so likewise the liuer is as it were the fountaine of the blood and veines, which are like to brookes and riuers, to carry and distribute the blood throughout the whole body, to the end that all the parts of it might be moistened, soaked, and nourished according to their severall natures. So that the liuer in mans body, and in man, who is the little world, is as the sea in the great world, and the veines are like to the floods and riuers. Neither are the parts of the body by this means moistned, watred, & norished with blood onely, but also with all the other humors, wherwith it is tempred, & without which the body can not liue. For the blood carieth al the rest with it. But that we may the better vnderstand this matter, & what is the proper nature of blood, we must first know what a humor is, and how many kinds of it there are. A similitude.

We vnderstand by a Humour, a liquide and running body into which the foode is conuerted in the liuer, to this end that bodies might be nourished and preserued by them. And as there are foure elements of which our bodies are compounded, so there are foure sorts of humors answerable to their natures, being all mingled together with the blood: as we may see by experience in blood let out of ones body. For vppermost we see as it were a little skim like to the skoure or working of new wine, or of other wine whē it is powred forth. Next we may see as it were small streames of water mingled with the blood. And in the bottome is seene a blacker and thicker humor, like to the lees of wine in a wine vessell. So that if we know how to consider wisely of these things, it wil be easie for vs to vnderstand the distinction What a humor is.

Of the nature of blood.

of these sundry humours, and their nature. Now concerning the first of them, we are to know that the proper nature of blood is to be hot and moist; wherein it answereth to the nature of the aire. It is remperate, sweet, and fatty, as also the best and chiefest part of nourishment. For albeit all the other humours doe nourish likewise, and are carried of the blood, neuer thelesse that humour which is properly called blood, is the chiefest part of nourishment. For it is requisite that nourishment should be sweet, or at leastwise tempred with sweete liquor.

Of the cholericke humor.

Next, that thin skim which is scene on the top of it, resembling the floure of wine, is that humour that is called yellow choler, or the cholericke humour which is hot and dry, of a bitter taste, and answering to the nature of fire, which is of the same nature. For it is bred of ticke humor.

the hottest and driest parts of that liquor, in which the nourishment of the body consisteth, when through their great heat they boyle together. Moreover, those small streams of water, which we see mingled in the blood, proceede of the flegmaticke humour that is cold and moist, like to water of whose nature it holdeth. For this humour is in part concocted for the turning of it into blood, but not wholly perfected. Hereof it cometh that the colour of it remaineth white, much like to water, and without taste, or as some affirme, it is somewhat brackish, but not fatty. Lastly, the blacke humour and most earthy, which looketh like the very bottome of a deepe, red, and thicke wine, or like the lees in a vessell full of wine or oyle, is the melancholike humour, or as some terme it, blacke choller, being colde and dry like to the earth, with which it hath some agreement, & of taste somewhat sharpe.

Of the melancholicke humour.

The agreement betwixt the humours
and the elements.

Now in this diuersity of these humours mingled altogether with the blood two things are worthy to be well marked. First the agreement & conformity which they haue with al the elements of which the body of man is compounded: so that each of them hath his proper element agreeable to his nature, to the end they may nourish and preserue al the parts of the body, according to the nature of the elements of which they hold. The other point is, not on ly the disagreement but euen the manifest contrariety that is betweene all these humors, as ther is betwixt the elements: & again the vnion that appears to be between the in the midst of this contrariety, as the like is among the elements, whose nature they follow. Moreover we see, that between light & darknes, day & night, colde & heate, drynes & moisture, between the diuers & contrary seasons of the yeere, besides sundry other such contrarieties that are in nature, and in all other things, I say betweene these so contrary, God frameth notwithstanding such a wonderful concord, tempering and knitting them in such sort one with another, that they are so far frō defacing & destroying each other, as contrariwise they could not possibly be preserued, except they were tied together with such a knot & coniunction.

How the humours and elements agree
in places.

Now beside that which we haue here spoken of the nature of these humors, we haue further to note, that they do not on ly agree with the elements in qualities, but also in regard of their places in mans body, I meane in the whole masse and distribution of the blood, and in the coniunction they haue together, euen as the elements haue their places each after other. For as the fire of it owne nature is light, & therefore laboreth alwaies to ascēd vpwārd, to attaine to his naturall place: so the cholericke humour, which ageeth with the nature therof, occupieth the highest place among the humors mingled with the blood, as we may perceiue by that that hath beene already spoken of the floure and skim of blood, according to that comparison which wee made betwixt blood and wine. The like may bee saide of the rest. For as the aire is lightest next to the fire, and the neere element vnto it and to the rest of the celestiall fires: so the blood properly so called, keepeth the place of the aire among the humors of the body. For it is not so light as the fire, nor so heauie as the water or the earth. And so consequently the flegmaticke and melancholike humors occupy the lower places according to their degrees, as the water, and the earth doe in this great world. For this cause all these humors besides their common offices & effects, haue others more specially agreeable to their nature, as (God willing) wee will declare hereafter. And namely, the flegmaticke humor that holdeth of the nature of the water, is to be considered of. For as in this great visible world, there are waters both aboue and beneath, I mean those that are contained and retained within the clouds in the aire, and those that are in the sea and in riuers, kept within their bounds assigned them for their course: so the like is to be found in the little world, which is man.

Nowe hitherto haue wee learned, how the water and the other humors are carried with the blood throughout the body, as well vpwārd as downeward, by meanes of the veines which water all the partes of it, how high or lowe soeuer they be, and therewithall carry vnto them their foode and nourishment. And this agreeth fitly to the wonderful derfull worke of Gods providence in nature, which, of the vapours arising out of the earth, gathereth the cloudes together, and these like to sponges sucke vp vapours from the waters of which themselves are engendred, and which afterward they carry about (as it were in chariots) to distribute them into all quarters of the world, according as it shall please God to dispose of them, by sending his blessing vpon the earth by the meanes of raine, where, with being watred, it nourisheth all those herbes, trees, plants, and fruits which it bringeth forth not onely for the sustenance of men, but also of beasts. Let vs then imagine before vs a garden wherein is infinite variety of trees and plants of all sorts, and that this garden it watred either by raine from heauen, or by pipes & conduites wherby the water is brought thither and dispersed in all places thereof. We shall see that in this great diuersitie of nature, there is but one and the same nourishment for them all, and but one place. And albeit the liquor that affoordeth this nourishment to so many sorts of plants be but one; neuertheless it is conuerted into the nature of all those things which it nourisheth, so that the nature of it is changed according to the distinct property of each of them. For there are plants and herbes of all qualities, and of all tastes and colours. Some are hote, others cold, some drie, others moist, either in the first, or second, or third, or fourth degree, or else are tempered and intermingled according to their severall natures. As for their tastes, some are sweete, others sharpe, or bitter, or of no certaine taste. In a word, there are of all kindes of tastes, both simple and compound. And yet the humour or liquor is but one that receiueth all these qualities, as in wormewood it becommeth bitter, and in the Vine or Figge-tree sweet. And if the herbes be either for foode, or for Physicke, or of a poisonfull nature, the same may be said of the humour that nourisheth them. The like is seene also in colours. Neither doe we obserue all this by experience onely in some great diuersitie of trees, and of all sorts of plants, but euen in each of them severally. For I pray you what difference is there in euery herbe, or in euery severall tree, I meane between the roote and the stalke, the body and the branches, the boughes and the leaues, the flowers, seeds and fruits? And yet all these sundry parts receiue nourishment from one Mother, and from one and the same substance and liquor. Moreouer we see that as man, and all other liuing creatures, haue their heart in the middest of their bodies which is the fountaine of life, so all trees, herbes, and plants haue their heart in the midst of them according to their nature, without which they could not liue. For we call their heart the inward part, within which their pith remaineth, which is vnto them as the heart is to liuing and sensible creatures. Whereupon we haue further to note in regard of those herbes that haue weake stalkes, especially hollow ones, or such as haue straws instead of stalke, that the providence of God hath giuen vnto them knots, seuered as it were into sundry small knees which are vnto them in place of their stomacke, & of their nutritiue members to retaine their nourishment the longer, & to concoct it the better, as also to strengthen the thereby. And this we may evidently see in all sorts of corne & pulse. Euen so doth nature, or rather the prince thereof worke in a mans body, which is as it were a garden that hath a soule. Wherein the Creator of this whole frame sheweth himselfe no lesse wonderfull, nay rather much more then in this great garden of the whole earth, & of the great world, of both which he is the Gardener that watereth them, to nourish all the fruits they bring forth, & to cause the to grow. For from whence proceede, or are nourished the bones, gristles, ligaments, sinews, arteries, veines, flesh, kernels, fat, together with all the other parts of which the body is compounded? May not the like be said of the eies & of their coats & humors, of their eares, nose, tongue, teeth, belly, stomacke, guts, liuer, spleene, kidneis, & of al the other bowels, & inward parts? And if we come to the hands & feet, & to the other outward members, & to all the other parts called instrumentall, & distinguished according to their office, we shal find that only through the alteration of their food into liquor, they all receiue such nourishment as is proper to each of them. Yet notwithstanding one & the same substance is offred to so many sundry members, being made familiar & of the same nature with that part vnto which it is ioined. For if it go to the eies, it becometh of the same temperament, that the nerves and spirits belonging to the sight are of, which bring the faculty and vertue of seeing vnto the eies: as likewise it is of the same temperament with the coats & humors of which the eies are compounded, being diuided and distributed to each sundry part by a naturall property inherent in them. The like is done in the eares, and in other members and instruments of the corporall senses, and in all the other parts of the body, euen to the very nailes and haire thereof. Wherein truly we see wonderfull alterations, and a most admirable worke of Gods providence, whether it be considered considered in the whole earth, and in this great world, or in man, who is the little world. Now for the sequels of our speech, before we come to speake of the speciall offices and effects of the three humors ioyned with the blood, of which we haue beere spoken, wee are to consider besides this distribution made of the nourishment by meanes of the veines, as it hath beene told vs, of another meane by which these humors, and especially the flegmatike, ascend vp vnto the braine: whereby it commeth to passe that in man, as well as in the great world, there are waters aboue and below, which are the cause that mans life swimmeth in the midst of a great danger. Also wee are to know why the soule and the blood are often taken each for other, and to be instructed in the temperature of the humors, necessarily belonging to the body for health and life thereof: as likewise to consider of the causes of health and sicknesse, and of life and death. But this shall be for to morrow, when thou ASER, shalt vndertake the discourse of these things, so farre forth as is requisite for vs to know.

Of the vapours that ascend vp to the braine, and of the waters and cloudes contained therein, and in what perils men are thereby: why the soule and blood are put one for another: of the temperature of the humors necessarie for the health and life of the body: of the causes of health and of diseases, and of life and death.

Chap. 65.

ASER. It is the saying of an ancient Philosopher, that they which saile vpon the water, are not aboue two or three fingers breadth distant from death: namely, so farre off as the thicknesse of the planks and timber of the Ship is, in which they are caried into the Sea. For if that timber were taken from vnder them, they cannot auoide drowning vnlesse they can swimme like fishes. But not to saile on the Sea, or vpon a lake or riuer to approach neere to death, wee haue it a great deale neerer vs when wee carry about vs infinite causes and meanes, whereby we are euery houre in danger of stifling, and as it were of drowning, and that both waking and sleeping, eating and drinking, within doores, and without, at all times, and in all places wherefoeuer wee become. Insomuch that of what estate and disposition soeuer men are, wee are oftentimes astonished to heare tidings of a mans death, sooner then of his sicknesse, whom wee saw not long before, meery, cheerefull and in good health.

Vapours ascending vp to the braine.

Watry clouds
in the braine.

Now we may learne some chiefe causes hereof by this daies handling of that matter Subiect, which was yesterday propounded to bee discoursed vpon. And first wee must know, that besides the distribution of the humors together with the blood into all parts of the body by the veines, & that for the causes before learned, there is yet another meane whereby these humors, especially the flegmaticke humor, which is of the nature of the water, ascend vp vnto the braine by reason of vapours arising vpward out of the stomack, like to the vapour of a pot seething on the fire with liquor in it, and like vapours that ascend vp from the earth into the aire, of which raine is engendred. Now when these vapours are come vp to the braine, they returne to their naturall place, and into the nature of those humors of which they were bred, as the vapours that are held in the aire turne againe into the same nature of water of which they came. Therefore as the waters are contained within the cloudes in the region of the aire allotted vnto them, so is it withour braine which is of a cold nature, and of a spongie substance fit for that purpose. So that we alwaies carry within it as it were cloudes full of water, and of other humors that distill and runned downe continually by the members and passages, which God hath appointed to that ende, as wee haue already heard. And these places albeit they serue especially to purge feuerall humors;

as hath bene tolde vs, yet oftentimes they voide them altogether, both by reason of their mingling and coniunction, as of their ouer great abondance. Yea many times they are so plentifull, namely, the flegmaticke humour, that because the braine cannot sufficiently discharge it selfe of them by the ordinarie way, these humours ouerflow on all sides where. soeuer they can finde any vent and issue, euen as when a thundering cloude bursteth asunder. So that the water runneth not down as it were a milde and gentle raine, but as mighty flood that bringeth great ruines with it, or as a riuer passing his ordinary course, breaketh downe both banke and wall, and ouerfloweth euery where. Therefore wee may well say, that many times we haue floods of water enclosed within our heads & braines, when wee neuer thinke of it, nor yet consider in what danger we are. Which the more secret and vnknowne it is vnto vs, the more perillous it is, and greatlier to be feared, especially considering it is so neere vs, and that we haue fewer meanes to auoide it, as we haue daily examples in many, who being in health and mery, are suddenly choaked by Catarrhes, which like to floods of waters, runne downwards, as the very name deriued from the Græcians doth import as much: or by some sodaine Apoplexie, how healthy soeuer before they seemed to be. Others also there are, who if they be not presently choked with such floods frō the brain, yet they are taken with palsies, lameness, and impotency in all their members, or at leastwise in some of them, as if some water flood had carried them away, so that nothing had been saued but the bare life, and that more fraile and miserable then death it selfe. I speak not of gowty persons, who although they be not assaulted with such great & vehement floods of waters, and with euill and superfluous humours, so that some few drops only (of which they are so called) fall vpon some parts of them, yet are they greatly tormented and constrained to crie out, and that oftentimes in extreme distresse. Which consideration ought to stirre vs vp to know wherein our life and preservation thereof consisteth, and of whom we hold it. And on the other side, although wee had no examples of floods and inundations of waters, of earthquakes, and such other iudgements of God whereby he punisheth men, neuertheless these waterfloods which we alwaies carry about vs, ought to admonish and induce vs to feare him, to call vpon him by praier, and day and night, yea houely to recommend our life vnto him seeing he can take it from vs by stopping our breath, yea by a very small matter: or at least depriue vs of all motion and sense, as though our bodies had neither soule nor life in them, but were like to poore dead carcases. For the doing hereof he needeth not to thunder or lighten from heauen against vs, but only to cause a small shoure of water to powre downe from our head, which is the highest, the goodliest and most noble part of all the body, and as it were the heauen of the litle world: or if it please him to cause a few drops only to distil downe vpon the sinewes and ioints, it will torment men more grievously then if they were in some continuall torture, as the dayly songs of such gowtie persons do testifie who are impatient and voide of the feare of God. Now besides this profitable aduertisement, which euery one may take by that which hath bin here vttered, we ought on the other side to consider the providence and goodnes of God towards men, in that as hee holdeth vp in the aire and cloudes, the water that hangeth ouer vs, not suffering them to break downe vpon vs all at once to ouerwhelme all the earth by them, with all the beastes and other creatures contained in it, but distributeth them by good & iust measure, so dealeth he with the humours that ascend vp continually, and are kept in our braine, where they haue their vessels to retaine them in, as it were in sponges, which yeeld forth water according as they are either loosened, or restrained and closed together. And as for that which is said of the testimony which we haue of the frailty of our life, appearing in the principall and most noble part of our body, as the like was shewed vs before in that instruction, which we learned by the office that God assigned to our lungs, and to the passages allotted by him for the taking in and letting out of the aire: so we haue a very notable lesson in the consideration of the liuer and of the blood, of which that is the forge and fountaine, and of the distribution thereof into all the parts and members of the body by meanes of the veines, as wee heard yesterday. For as a man may iudge by outward appearance that the life of man consisteth in breath, and that he giueth vp both soule & life when he dieth, as it were in going vp the last gaspe: so it seemeth also that it is placed in the blood, as that which goeth as it were with the blood, so that when the blood is drawne out of a mans body, the life also may seeme to be drawne out therewithall. Hereupon as the soule is oftentimes in the holy Scripture put for the life, because it giueth life to the body, so it is also put for the blood, and the blood likewise called soule, because it is the instrument and meanes whereby the soule giueth life: and when the Lord forbiddeth his people to eat the flesh with his soule, that is the blood thereof. Whereby his meaning is to teach men to abhorre the effusion of mans blood & therefore he saith further, I will require your blood, even the blood of your soules. Wherefore he that sheedeth blood, doth as much as if he drew the soule out of the body. Now forasmuch as the blood is so necessary vnto life, we are likewise to vnderstand, that as it is either pure and sound, or vnpure and corrupted, so is it disposed either to health or sicknes, and to life or death. For as the naturall life of man consisteth especially in heat and moisture, so a man may easily iudge, that as euery thing is bred by meanes of them, chiefly living and sensible creatures, so nothing can bee preserved in this bodily life without these two qualities, that are proper to ayre and to blood, as wee haue already heard. But these qualities must be so tempered, that there be no excessse on either side. And for this cause

mors necessary.

The causes of health and of sicknesse.

G O D would haue all the humors to be mingled together with the blood, that so it might be tempered as is requisit for the life of man. For if it be too hote and drie, or too moist and cold, it cannot doe that office, for the performance whereof it is ordeined: but in steade of bringing health and life, it will breed diseases, and in the ende cause death. For naturall death commeth onely of diseases, amongst which olde age is to be reckoned, which is an incurable sicknesse that lasteth vntill death. Neither doe diseases proceede but onely of the distemperature that is in mens bodies, and in the humours of which they are compounded. For as long as the are in a good, moderate, and proportionable temper, and are distributed to all the parts of the body, according as neede requireth, so that none of them exceedeth, then is there an equality in all the body, which doth not onely preserve it in life, but in health and good disposition. For there is the like concord and harmony betweene these humours, that is betweene the parts of a good consort of Musicke agreeing well together, or of an instrument of Musicke well tuned, from which you shall heare nothing but pleasant melodie. Whereas if all the parts thereof agree not well together, there will be no muscical harmony, but onely a very vnpleasant discord. The like may be said of all the concords and discords that may fall out in the humours of our bodies.

Sin the cause of all the discord in the

And therefore God had so tempered them in the first creation of man, and was requisite, so that hee would haue preserved him in a perpetuall life, if by true obedience hee had alwaies beene knit and vnited vnto God his Creatour. But since man fell at variance with G O D through sinne, all this goodly concord, which God had placed not onely in mans body, but also betweene the rest of his creatures, hath beene troubled and turned into discord by meanes of sinne. So that all this goodly temperature and harmony of the humours in which mans body was created, was dissolved, and broken asunder, and that in such sort that it was neuer since found and perfect in any man, of how good constitution soeuer it hath beene. For euery in the best complexions there is alwaies some defect or excessse in some of the humors: so that if there were no other cause, yet no body could naturally be immortall. For alwaies in the ende the excessse or defect that is in it would cause it to decay, and finally bring it to corruption. But besides this, there are so many other wants and superfluities throughout the whole life of man, whereby this euill already become naturall, is so much augmented, that there die moe without comparison of ordinarie diseases and of violent death, then of olde age and naturall death: and all this by meanes of sinne.

of death.

Therefore we may well conclude, that health is the effect and fruit of peace and concord between all the parts & humors of mans body, and so consequently is life: as contrariwise, sicknesse and death proceede of discord, dissention & war between them. For as concord bringeth peace, and peace all good things with it, so contrariwise, discord breedeth warre, and warre a heaped measure of all miseries and euils. Wherefore a sound body of a good constitution is like the body of a whole people and societie, that hath the members agreeing well together, so that euery one keepeth his ranke, not hurting one another. But a sick and diseased body is like to the body of a mutinous and seditious people, that breaketh the order it ought to keepe, and goeth beyond the appointed bounds. Therefore wee haue a goodly image of peace, and of that peaceable life whereunto men are created and borne, in the disposition and the temperature of the humors and members of our body, whereby we ought to learue what great account we are to make of peace, amitie and concord, and how we ought to hate and abhorre all warre, discord and dissention, seeing the one is as it were health and life, and the other as diseases and death. Now let vs see the vse and profit, the particular

ticular and speciall properties of the humours ioyned with the blood : and what vessels are assigned vnto them, together with their nature and offices. It belongeth to thee, AMANA, to handle this matter.

Of the vses and commodities of the humours ioyned with the blood, and what vessels are assigned vnto them in the body, and of their nature and offices : and first of the cholerike humorr, of the gall and vessell thereof: next of the melancholike humour and of the spleene: then of the flegmatike humorr, and of the kidneis and other vessels, which it hath to purge by. Chap. 66.

AMANA. As we ought to labour to cut off all discord, and to nourish all concord, that we may enioy peace and those benefits that proceed thereof: so we must be very careful to preserve all the parts of our body in such a temperature, as may keepe the in a harmony and concord, that we may live in health. For this cause as God hath tempered all the humors one with an other, so he hath assigned to every one his proper place and seate, both to withdraw it selfe therein, and to performe the office enioyned vnto it, and also to purge and cleanse it selfe, and to discharge the body of superfluities and corruptions that otherwise might hurt it. Now we have already heard, how he hath assigned the liuer to bee the seate of the blood, because he hath appointed the blood to water all the body, and to give life and nourishment vnto it, out of which also the vitall spirits arise, as small and milde windes proceede out of rivers and fountaines.

As for the cholerike humour, it is ioyned with the blood for the concoction of humors that abound, and to awake and stirre vp the body least it become heavy, sleepy and dull, as also to penetrate and open the passages when it goeth with the blood, and therewithall to nourish those members that agree with the nature of it, as the lungs with whose nourishment cholerike blood doth better agree then any other. Whereby it appeareth evidently, that this humour holdeth of the nature of fire, which giueth vnto it this quickenesse and verue. And because it is hote and drie, it serueth also to temper the moisture of the blood, and to meete withall cold that might come vnto it, and helpeth to preserve it in his naturall heate. Now for as much as it is not all carried and distributed with the blood, but the greatest part of it remaineth for other vses, God hath assigned a vessell vnto it, into which it retireth and is contained therein so far forth as is requisite. The end hereof is, that the blood should not be infected with too much choler mingled therewith, as also that it might descend into the guts, by those passages that are giuen vnto it to that purpose to bee voided by them, and to prouoke them to discharge those excrements which they receiue, and so to purge the whole body. For this cause there is a bladder in fashion like to a long Peare, placed vnder the middest of the Liuer, about the hollow part of the right side of it, within which it is halfe hidden. This bladder is the vessell into which that yellow humour withdraweth it selfe, and is contained therein which we call Gall. And as this bladder hath his filaments and threds, both to draw vnto it and to retaine, as also to expell forth, so it hath two branches comming out of the necke of it, the one xward to draw away the cholerike humor in the purifying of the blood, the other downewards towards the guttes to carry this humour vnto them, both for the thrusting forward of nourishment, and for the casting forth of the excrements. For it was necessary, that the great abundance of this humor should retire into some place in the purging of the blood: and therefore it was as requisite that it should haue a fit vessell to retire into, wherein it was not to remaine vnprofitable. For beside the vses already spoken of, it serueth not only to cleanse all the guts of ordure, but also to heat the liuer, and to hinder the putrefaction of the blood. Besides, experience sufficiently sheweth, how needfull it is that the blood should haue such a vessell wherewith to purge it selfe. For when the passages thereof are stopped, great diseases follow thereupon, as inflammation of the liuer, and the dropsie, but especially the yellow laundies. For when this humour is not duely separated from the blood, so that it is not purged thereof as nature requireth, then doth it beginne to corrupt: whereupon it cannot send such food to the members as is necessary for them, but that which is corrupted by this gall, whereby they are driven out of their naturall disposition. And this wee may see chiefly in the yellowe laundies iaundies by reason of this yellowe and bitter humor, that maketh the body yellowe, into which it is disperfed by meanes of the veines, in steed of being nourished with good blood. The like may bee sayde of the melancholike humor, which is as it were the lees of the blood. For if the blood be corrupted and infected, great inconueniences ensue thereof vnto the whole body, through which this humor is disperfed after the same manner that the cholericke humor is: inlomuch as it becommeth blacke thereby, as the cholericke humor maketh it yellowe, and for the like cause, breeding the like disease, the difference of humours onely excepted. Now because we haue not in our vsuall speech a speciall name to declare this difference, this disease is commonly called the blacke iaundies. Therefore God hath assigned the spleene for a seate to this black humor, which being placed on the left side containeth this humor in it: hauing proper pipes and passages, both to draw from the liuer this dregges of the blood, and also to communicate the same vnto the stomack, thereby to prouoke appetite, as likewise to purge it selfe by diuers meanes. The chiefe vse of it is to receiue the grosse and muddy blood, and to that end there is a great veine, which being the pipe of this blood, goeth from the Port veine to the spleene, which is nourished with the best of it, and concocteth the abundance of this humor. Therefore God hath created it with such a flesh as is meete and apt for that office: and further hath holpen it with certaine arteries, whereby it is heated and made warme. And when it hath taken so much of this grosse blood to nourish it selfe withall as is requisite, the rest is partly retained still, and partly thrust out and sent to the bottome of the stomacke, by a veine seruing for the same purpose, to the end that from thence this humor may be voided out of the body.

Now when these veines are stoppt, dangerous diseases follow thereupon, chiefly, when this happeneth to the first veine whereof I spake euen now. For when the liuer is not purged, his whole office is hindered, and it selfe decayeth by little and little, by retayning still the excrements thereof: from whence the vapours ascending vp to the braine trouble it very much, and cause it to fall into very strange & foolish conceiptes. And when the body is burthened with this humor, it causeth that man to be very melancholike, and sadde, and many times bringeth that yrkesomenesse vpon him that hee desireth nothing but death. It was very requisite therefore, that God should giue both a vessell and passages to this humor, which is not without his great commodities, if it be tempered and distributed as it ought to be. For it serueth to stay and to retaine the floating spirites, which arise out of the blood, least if they should be made more pure and subtil, then is expedient for the bodie, they vanish and passe away altogether. It is profitable also to thicken the blood, and to helpe to restraine and keepe it from running ouerlastily: besides, it nourisheth therewithall the melancholike members, which holde most of the nature of that humor, as namely, the bones and the spleene.

Likewise, the driness both of this and of the cholericke humor standeth the blood in some steade: and the coldnesse thereof serueth to coole and moderate the heat of the blood, and of the cholerike humor. As for the flegmaticke humor, which is also called Pituita, it is not without his commodities. For first, it is the matter wherof the blood is made, when it is by little and little concocted better: it mittigateth the heate of the blood, and is vnto it in place of nourishment, and in steade of a bridle to restraine the burning and deuouring heate thereof from present consuming of all. Besides, it keepeth the blood from being too thicke and drie: and being carried with the blood, it nourisheth the flegmaticke and cold members, such as the braine is. And as the other humours ioyned with the blood, haue their superfluities and vessels to keepe them in and to purge them, so is it with this.

For this humor is not onely carried with the blood to keepe it from ouermuch thickenesse, that it may the better passe through the veines: but there proceedeth also from the whole masse of blood, an excrement like to very thinnewater which by reason of the thinnesse of it, can no way be profitable to the body. For it is a water that differeth as much from blood, and from the flegmaticke humor ioyned with it, as whay doth from milke when the Butter and Cheefe with all the substance that can bee had from it is drawne out of it. For it is like to sweate, with which it hath some resemblance. Therefore it hath his proper place assigned vnto it in the Kidneis, which drawe to themselves the watrish matter from the blood, thereby purging it from water that would corrupt it; and fill the Veines in steade of good blood: as wee see it in the dropsie, which

which bloweth vp the body that is stuffed with water in stead of good nourishment which by the veines it should draw from the blood, if the liuer were well affected, and if all the other parts that ought to help it, did well performe their duties. And to the end, that the Kidneies may the better doe their dutie, God hath not onely created two, but hath so placed them by his prouidence, that the right kidney is higher then the left, so that they doe their duties one after another. For if they wrought both together, if they were both in one place, & if both drew vnto themselves with equal force, in stead of mutual help, they would greatly hinder each other: which inconuenience the prouidence of God doth very well meet with. And as all the inward parts, of which we haue hitherto spoken, haue their pipes both to draw from the liuer that humor that is meet for them, and to send it where neede requireth, and also for to purge themselves: euen so the kidneies haue their passages apt & meet for the performance of all these things. For first they haue Emulgent veines, so called Emulgent because they draw this waterish superfluity, as a child sucketh milke out of the breast, and haueing receiued this water seperated from the blood, they send it vnto the kidneies. It is true, that a little blood passeth together with it to nourish the kidneies withal, with which there is some yellow choller mingled, that serueth afterward to help expulsion, and the water being coloured therewith, is made yellow and brackish, and then it is rightly called Vrine. Now after the kidneies haue drawne from the liuer this water, whereby the blood is purged, and themselves also in part nourished with some little of the blood, and that by meanes of the veines and passages giuen vnto them for that purpose, they haue two other passages, called Vreteres, or Vrine pipes, whereby they purge and discharge themselves of that water that is called Vrine, after the blood is wholly seperated from it. This done, these pipes send the water vnto the bladder, which is a vessell meet for the receipt thereof, and which doth as it were distill the same by litle and litle through these pipes that enter into the bladder, both on the right side and on the left. Moreouer the bladder hath a neck and passage neere to the vrine pipes, wherby it dischargeth it selfe of this humour, after it hath kept the same a while, voiding it forth of the body as a superfluous excrement. For if this were not so, after the body were full of this water ouerflowing in it, not onely many parts and members would be broken, but also men should be stifled, by reason of the compression & contraction of the Midriffe. I speake not here of the stone which we carry in our kidneies, or of that which oftentimes breedeth both in the Kidneies and in the bladder, I meane of such stones as bake there as it were in a Tile kill, or potters fornace. I omit al the passions of the kidneies, and the extreame paines proceeding from thence, which are further instructions vnto vs of our infirmities and miseries, and of the frailty of mans life: but th handling of these things properly belongeth to the Physicians I wil only adde to that which I haue spoken of the necke of the bladder, where the Vinary pipes end, that the hole thereof is full of wreathings and turnings, to the end it may the better holde and keep in the water. And for this cause also it hath a muskle, as wel as the fundament, to open and to shut, & to yeeld and retaine the vrine according to natures will, euen as it is with the other excrements that are purged by the bowels. We propound these things as it were a generall Anatomy of the body, because if I should lay them open at large and by peece meale, each member hath in it sufficient whereof to make a great booke. For as I haue already declared, the artificiall workmanship of mans body is incredible and incomprehensible, if a man consider all the parts of it. For there is nothing, be it neuer so smal, but the work of it is very marueilous, the vse great, & so fitted to the purpose as cannot possibly be better. But we need not discoure more particularly of the composition and nature of mans body, and of the parts of it, seeing our inteut is not to become Physicians, but in some sort naturall diuines, by learning to know the prouidence of God in his works, especially in our creation, composition, nourishment and preservation, that we may glorifie him in them, as becommeth vs. Now in all that we haue hitherto propounded of the foure naturall humors of the body, we haue spoken of them according as naturallly they are, and ought to be without corruption, and such as are necessary for the life of man. But forasmuch as they are of great vertue and power in regard of the affections & maners of men, whether they abide in their right nature, or whether they be corrupted, we must speake somewhat of their corruption, and of the hurt that commeth thereby, not onely to the life and health of the bodie, but also to that of the soule considering withall what are the fundrie naturall temperaments of men. Marke therefore ARAM, what you haue to say vnto vs concerning this matter.

Of the names whereby the humours of the body are commonly called, with the causes wherefore: of the comparison betweene the corruption and temperature of the humours of the body, and betweene the manners and affections of the Soule: of the meanes whereby the humours corrupt, and of the Feuers and diseases engendred thereby: of the sundry naturall temperatures in every one. Chap. 67.

What communion ought to be among men.

ARAM. The nourishment of mans body hath many degrees, & passeth through many pipes and vessels, before it be perfect and converted by true generation into the proper substance of every member whether it is carried, as we may iudge by that which we haue already heard to this purpose. But there is such an accord betweene all the members of the body, whereby every one executeth his office, and such a communion of all their powers, that each member keepeth his ranke and order, neither doth any one retaine and keepe to it selfe more nourishment then is requisite, but sendeth as much as is needfull vnto therest, even vnto the nayles, and haire and vttermoſt excrements. Now if through some defect or corruption falling out in their nature, any of them breake the order of this equall distribution, a common detriment seizeth vpon the whole body, and vpon all the members generally, so that those parts also taste of the hurt, that offered wrong vnto the residue. For they can not liue alone, nor without helpe from others. The like is seene in the Common wealth, and in the members thereof. For what is the cause that some are ready to burst for fatnesse and multitudines of meates, whereas others are empty and die of hunger? that some haue so much wealth, that they are greatly troubled therewith and others are so poore? Nay, what is the cause of all the confusion in the world, but that every one taketh to himselfe, and no such equality and communion is obserued, as becommeth the estate of every one; Wherefore as sundry diseases are bred in mans body whereby in the end it is vtterly ouerthrowne, when there is no such communion between, the members thereof, nor any such distribution of the nourishment as there ought to be: so is it with the body of the Common wealth, when some oppresse others, and when every one hath not that that belongeth vnto him. For: first there followeth great confusion, and of confusion, subuersion, as diseases follow faults committed by the members, and after diseases death it selfe.

The cause of mens ingratitude.

Now the infinite number of infirmities and ordinary diseases, whereby moe violent deaths are procured then naturall, by reason of the defects and excesses brought in by sinne into the whole life of man, causeth men to speake diuersely of the foure humours of the body, necessary for the preservation and nourishment thereof. For they are more often taken for the vices and excesses, whereby they are corrupted, then for the true naturall humours, which are the chiefe instruments of the soule, whereby it giuerh life and nourishment to the body. The cause whereof, as I thinke, is because men doe sooner and more easily perceiue and marke what is euill and hurtfull vnto them, then that which breedeth their good and profit. And indeed it falleth out commonly, that they know not the good things they haue vntill they haue lost them, or else are become hurtfull vnto them. No marueile then if they know not from whence these good things come, or of whom they haue receiued them & so become ingratefull towards GOD. Wherefore let vs not wonder when God withdraw eth them from vs, or suffreth them to corrupt and to be spoiled that they might hurt vs instead of helping vs, to the end that by this means wee might learne to acknowledge that good which before wee knew not, and not to despise it when wee haue it, I meane that wee should learne this by the euill that succeedeth after wee haue lost the good. For we are such schollers as cannot otherwise imprint in our minds those good thinges which God bestoweth vpon vs, but by being deprived of them, and by our own hurt.

Hereof it is that we alwayes learne to our owne cost, as we say, because we can not conceiue so well, as we ought to doe of the free goodnesse of God. Nay, it were well if all could learne a right by their owne harmes. For there are but few that profit thereby as they ought. How many are there that in steede of amendment, waxe through the chastisements of God? But in the meane time our vsuall manner of speaking teacheth vs, that men haue more knowledge of corrupt humours that hurt them, then of the good ones that nourish them, and continue in their naturall soundnesse, seeing their names are more often taken in the euill part then in the good. Now when wee spake before of these humours in the body, it was as they are and ought to bee naturall, and such as beeing voyde of corruption, are necessary for the life of man. And forasmuch as they are of great force in regard of the affections and manners of men, whether they abide in their owne nature, or whether they be corrupted, we will speake somewhat more of their corruption, and of those hurtes which they bring to the health and life of the body: afterward we will consider of their effects in the soule. But we must here call to mind what we heard before of the agreement betweene the manners and affections of the soule, and the temperature of the body and how the one serueth the other. Whereby wee may gather, that it is so with the affections in regard of the soule, as it is with the naturall humours in regard of the bodie. For according as these humours are well or ill tempered, so is the body well or ill affected: & according as they increase or diminish, so the health of a man is more sound and stedfast, or more crasie and inconstant, and so ready to turne into more grievous and dangerous diseases. The like may bee said of the stayednes or vnstayednes of the affections of the soule, and of the spirituall health and diseases thereof. For this cause, if we ought to be so carefull to reduce our body to a good temperature when there is any defect: and being so, to preserve it in the same estate still, and so likewise for the equality and agreement that ought to be between the humors from whence it commeth, so that we desire to obtaine health when we are sicke, and to keep it wel when we haue it, then ought we to be much more carefull for the temperature and moderation of the affections of the soule, and of the spirituall health that proceedeth thereof. And therefore in the corruption of the bodily humors, we are to consider diligently, of the corruption of manners, and of the affections of the soule. For there is great agreement betweene the one and the other.

The agreement betweene the manners and humors of the body.

But to come to the chiefe point of this present speech, we are first to note, that the naturall humors corrupt two manner of waies, when they leaue the order of nature & change their natural properties. For that commeth vnto them, either because their proper substance degenerateth without any mixture of other humors, or through the mixture of some other vicious and corrupt humor. Now how much the more requisite the humor is, and necessary for the body of man being in his naturall soundnes, so much the more hurtfull is it when it is corrupted. Therefore forasmuch as the blood, which is properly so called amongst the humors of the body, is more conuenient, apt and necessary for the life thereof, then any of the rest, as hath bin declared vnto vs, it followeth that the corruption thereof is more dangerous then of any other humor.

By what means the naturall humors corrupt

Now it degenerateth from his owne substance when (the dores being shut) it putrifieth within the veines, and is tyned into a certaine cholericke humor, not naturall but corrupted: whereupon the continuall Feuer ariseth. Besides, it corrupteth after another manner, namely, through the mixture of some other humor, as when the first masse of blood is corrupted through the aboundance of a raw humour that is not well digested in the liuer, whereof the dropsie followeth, as likewise the yellow jaundies is bred of the blood corrupted through too great aboundance of the chollericke humour.

The originall of Feuers and other diseases

In like manner the flegmaticke humour is corrupted in his substance, when it overfloweth and giueth vpward in mens bodies, and continueth rawe for want of good concoction and digestion: it being sometimes more thin, and sometimes more thicke. From hence commeth spittle, snattinesse of the nose, catharres, and distillations, and oftentimes vomiting, when it is grosse and thicke. Besides this flegmaticke humour corrupteth through the mixture of the colericke or melancholicke humor: and then it waxeth salt or sharp, according to the humor that is mingled therewith. And as the continual feuer is bred of blood corrupted in substance, so the quotidian ague proceedeth of the corruption of the flegmaticke humor. As for the cholericke humor it degenerateth of it selfe, when it burneth & is turned into a vicious melancholike humour that is like ashes, thick & biting. And because this alteration groweth by little and little, either by reason of age or of violent motions in them that are naturally very cholericke, it cometh to passe that such persons are in their old age subiect to a furious kind of anger. On the other side, this colericke humor corrupteth when it is mingled with some other humor, as when it is mixed with flegme, which as it is either more thin, or thicker, so is the colour of the choller more or lesse yellow, pale, or greene.

The corruption of the flegmaticke humor.

Of the cholericke humor

greene. The like may be said of the mixture of all the other humours.

From whence
all sorts of agues proceed.

Now as the tertian ague, I meane the right and perfect tertian, is engendred of the cholerike humour corrupted in his substance: so the bastard tertian is bred of the same humour, when it is mixed with a vicious and corrupt flegmaticke humour. And truly this is very strange, that the corruption of every feuerall humour doth in this sort breed sundry kinds of agues according to the diuersitie of the humors. For as there are foure sundry sorts of humors, so there are foure kinds of ordinary agues that haue their feuerall relations to each of these humours. So that as the continuall feuer is bred of blood corrupted, and the quotidian of flegme, and the tertian of the cholerike humour, so the quartane proceedeth of the melancholike humour corrupted.

The corruption of the melancholike humours.

From whence
commeth.

Now besides these ordinary feuers, there are others mingled and compounded, according as the putrified humours of which they are bred, are mingled and compounded together. From hence spring demy and double tertians, and quartanes and such like. And sometime one and the same man shall haue sundry sorts of feuers in one disease, according to the diuersitie & abundance of corrupt humors that are in him. We may say as much of al other diseases that are bred of corrupt humors, according as they are either simpler, or more mingled and compounded. Therefore as the other humours corrupt in such sort as wee heard before, so when the melancholike humor putrifieth, either it burneth of it selfe, or else by the mixture of other humors, in so much as it waxeth grosse and biting, and holdeth of the nature of ashes.

Now when a body subiect to choler, flegme, or blood waxeth melancholike, that man by reason the fumes cannot euaporate and get out, falleth into frenesies and mad fits, and those of diuers sorts. For as the melancholike humour is mixed, either with blood, or with flegme or with choler, so is the melancholike person more or lesse merry or sadde, heauy or lighter, colder or hotter, and his fits and furies either more moderate, or more vehement and violent. But howsoeuer it be, we see by daily experience, that there are many sorts of melancholike persons, of mad, senselesse and furious people. And besides the mixture of vicious humours, we must consider also the sundry naturall temperaments of every one. For as we see that wines are diuersly tempered according to the variety of countries, lands, and aire where they grew, and that albeit they are alwayes wine, yet there is great difference in the one from the other, both in substance, nourishment, colour, smell, vertue and strength: euen so is it with the humours of the body. For the same humours are more pure, or more moderate, or more noble and exquisite in some then in others, according to the nature of their bodies, and not onely of their own, but also of their parents bodies from whence they were deriued. For children commonly take much after their parents. I speake nothing of that which the temperament may take of the heauens, and of all the celestiall bodies, and chiefly of the special grace of GOD, the prince of nature, who ruleth ouer al temperaments, and complexions. But it is time, that following our purpose, we consider what effects the humors haue towards the soule, and that we looke into the diuersities of the temperatures and complexions of men, according vnto the nature of those humors that raigne most in them, and to that disposition which naturallly they doe worke in them either to vertues or vices. This we shall learne of thee ACHITO B.

Of the diuers temperatures and complexions of men; according to the nature of humours that beare most sway in them: of the disposition whereunto they are naturallly moued by them either to vertues or vices: of the meanes to correct the vices and defects that may be in our naturall inclinations. Chap. 68.

Three chiefe workers of mens actions.

A*CHITO B.* It is not without great shew of reason, that the Phylosophers made three principles and beginnings that affect mens actions, namely, powers, habits, or qualities, & affections, or passions. For we see plainly by experience, of how great force these things are in man so long as he liueth. Concerning powers, they come to vs by nature, and are effective principles of all actions both good & bad, yea by them we knowe in children, during their young yeares, the signes and tokens of some vertue or vice, that will raigne most in them afterwards, which we commonly call, Inclination or Disposition. The passions and affections likewise naturall in vs, being forcible prickes to prouoke men to embrace either good or euill, whereof wee haue already spoken sufficiently. As for the habites or qualities, they are accidentall in man, as they that are gotten by a long and continuall custome of doing good or euill, whereupon also they take the names of good or euill habits. Now we commonly see some to be naturally enclined to one vertue and not to another, or to one vice and not to another. For it seemeth sometimes that nature hath bred some to be temperate, others to be liberall, and contrariwise. And when a man endued with naturall powers tending to good, obtaineth qualities answerable thereupon, he is worthy of commendation, because vnto his inclination he hath added greater helpe, namely, care, and study, by meanes whereof he is come to some perfection. So likewise he that naturally being borne impotent, attaineth to those vertues that are contrary to his impotency, deserueth greater praise, because fighting as it were with nature, he remaineth conqueror ouer himselfe, and becommeth vertuous with greater difficulty. But contrariwise, if a man that is naturally ill disposed to some particular vice, doth adde further a habite to his badde inclination, he is worthy of blame, because he hath not resisted euill, but pleasing himselfe therein hath made it greater. As likewise he that hath excellent graces & gifts of nature to do well, & suffreth them to vanish away through his negligence & custome in euill, is much more to be blamed because that voluntarily he suffret himselfe to be overcome of vice.

He speaks of such goodnes & vertues as were so esteemed of by the heathen that knew not their naturall corruption.

But we must consider of these things somewhat higher, & by the selfe same reason iudge of the naturall temperaments, which in the former speech we heard were diuers in euery one. For we ought to acknowledge one God, Prince, & author of nature, who ruleth in all and ouer all. Therefore as he hath appropriated to the soule those instruments, which he hath giuen vnto it in the body, to work in them & by them: so himselfe disposeth & ordreth those instruments, which he wil vse among men, yea euen from their mothers womb, as it is written of the Prophet Jeremy, & of the Apostle S. Paul whom our Saviour also a chose an instrument to beare his name before the Gentiles, & Kings, and childeen of Israell. No doubt, therefore considering the agreement which we haue heard is in the affections of the soule with the temperature of the body, but that the more temperate the complections of euery mans body is, and the neerer it approacheth to the perfectest temperature, the more quiet and moderate, the more gracious and comely will his affections and manners be naturally, yea all his gestures and whole behaviour. True it is, as we haue elsewhere touched, that no body is so framed, or hath such an harmony and equalitie throughout, but there is some disagreement & inequality. But we account those natures to be well tempered, which approach neere to the perfect temperature: and as euery humour ruleth more or lesse in euery one, so he is called either sanguine, or flegmaticke, or cholerike, or melancholike. Againe, as the other humours beare sway next vnto the principall, so is a man saide to be either flegmaticke sanguine, or cholerike sanguine, or melancholike sanguine. The like may be said of the other humours according to their temperature, as also of the affections which haue some agreement with them. Heereof it is, that when there is excessse of the flegmaticke humour in men, their natures are commonly slouthfull, they shunne labour and giue themselves to bodily pleasures, they loue dainties, and delicate meates and drinckes, they are tender and effeminate, and cleane contrarie to stowt and valiant men. And if there be excessse of the cholerike humour, their natures are easily prouoked and stirred vp to wrath: but their anger is as fire of thornes, that beeing soone kindled and making a great noise, is by and by quenched againe. Their gestures also are more quicke and vehement, & their hastinesse is commonly foolish and turbulent: they bable much, and are like to vessels full of holes, vnable to hold in and keepe any secret matter: they are fierce in assailing, but inconstant in sustaining the assault, in some sort resembling the nature of dogges, which bark and bite if they can, and afterward flie away. And if there be excessse of the melancholike humor, the natures of such are sad, still, hard to please, suspicious conceited, obstinate; some more and some lesse. And if the cholerike and melancholike humours be corrupte and mingled together, their natures become monstrous, proud, full of enuy, fraud, subtilities, venomous and poisonfull, hatefull and diabolically.

almost to the same ende, touching the meanes whereby euill spirits might trouble the imagination, fantasie and mindes of men. We may say as much of the humours of the body, whose motions and nature they know very well. Whereby they can so much the more easily abuse them in their damnable worke and will, as wee may iudge by the example of him that was possessed and lunaticke, of whom the Euangelists make mention, and whom they call by those two names. And by that which they wrote of him, it seemeth that he was subiect to the falling sickenes, that returneth oftentimes according to the course of the moone, which naturally hath great affinitie with the humors, and great power over them. And therefore it is very likely, that the euill spirit which tormented this poore lunatik, watched the occasions of his disease to afflict him the more, & to cause him to fall either in the fire or in the water, as he did indeed, thereby to worke his death if he could. Which example sheweth vnto vs what is the malice of the Deuill, what pleasure he taketh in hurting of men, what meanes and what occasion he seeketh for, and maketh choise of, and what access vnto vs we may offer him through our corrupt nature, through our vices and sinnes, and through our inclinations and manners that are naturally euill and peruerse, if God letteth him loose the bridle by his iust iudgement: seeing he spareth not the little children, as it appeareth in that which is written of him, of whom we spake euen now. For this cause we ought to take good heede, that we giue not our common enemy those occasions that he seeketh to haue from vs, to the ende that he abuse vs not, nor anything that is ours, and which God hath bestowed vpon vs. This is the reason why the consideration of our temperature, complexion, and naturall inclination is very necessarie for vs: because the knowledge hereof affordeth vnto many good instructions that may stand vs in great stead throughout our whole life, as wel for the preseruatiō of the health of our bodies, as for the rule and government of our affections and manners; as also in regard of the familiarity and acquaintance which we haue one from another. For through the contemplation hereof we may know not onely the causes of health and sickenesse, of the life and death of the body but also of that of the soule. For as the good humours corrupt in our bodies, according as wee heard, and breede in them sundry diseases which finally leade them vnto death: euen so by meanes of sinne all those good and naturall affections, which ought to be the seedes of vertues in vs, are corrupted and turne into vices, that are the diseases of the soule, and bring vnto it the second and eternall death: as contrariwise vertues are the health and life thereof.

But as God hath provided corporall medicines for the body, so he hath prepared spirituall Phisicke for the soule against all the diseases thereof. Therefore when we consider with our selues vnto what vices we are inclined by nature, we must labour to correct, and bridle them, and to quench such inclinations, as much as wee can, through sobriety, vigilancy, and continuall practise to the contrary: least wee nourish and encrease them, when as wee ought to diminish and wholly to abolish them. For the common prouerb is not without reason, that Education passeth nature, or that it is another nature. We see by experience what Education and instruction are able to doe both to goodnesse and vice, according as they are either good or euill. For as there is no nature so good, which cannot be corrupted and peruered through euill education and teaching: so there is none so vicious and euill, which cannot, at the least in some measure, (through the helpe and grace of God) bee corrected and amended by good education, instruction, and discipline. And because conuersation and familiarity are of great efficacy in this point, wee are diligently to consider with what persons and natures wee acquaint our selues, and bee carefull to eschew such natures as are vicious, proud, fierce, enniuous, hatefull, malicious, suspicious, disloyall, and traiterous, as well in regard of the corruption of maners wherewith we may be infected by them, as also in respect of other harmes that may befall vs, by reason they are vsociable natures or at the least very difficult to conuerse withall, being indeed such as towards whome no man can beare any true loue or firme friendship. But when wee haue vsed all the diligence wee can possible about these things, the chiefeest point wherein the whole consisteth, is this, that wee haue recourse to Iesus Christ the eternall Sonne of GOD, to the ende that by his holy Spirit, hee would correct, repress, and quench in vs all the vicious affections and disordered motions, that we haue contrary to his holy will: according to that promise which is made vnto vs, wherein it is said, that If fathers knew how to giue good gifts to their children and such things as are necessarie for them, much more will our heavenly Father giue his holy Spirit to them that aske of him. And this is the true meanes wee ought to keepe for the correcting of these vices and defects defectes, that are in our naturall inclinations. Now wee have spoken sufficiently of those things which concerne the naturall powers of the soule, in respect of the nourishment and groweth of the body, & of those instruments which it hath in the same for the performance of her actions. It remaineth now that we consider what effects it hath in generation. First then ASER, thou shalt handle the resturatrion and reparation of all natures by that vertue and power of Generation that is in them, and namely, in man: to the end we may after proceede with those other points that concerne this matter.

*Of the restauration and reparation of all natures created by the Generative power power and vertue that is in them, and namely, in man: what Generation is,
and what the Generative power of the foule is: what the seede is,
and how Generation proceedeth of strength and of infirmity. Chap. 69.*

A*SER*. When Salomon saith in the Psalme entituled with his name, Except the Lord build the house, they that build, labour in vaine, we must not thinke that by the building whereof he speaketh, he vnderstandeth a frame of stone & wood to make a lodging and dwelling place of it, but he respecteth specially that building that consisteth of houses and families, throghe the generation of children, and their good education & instruction: as himself shew explainely when by and by after he saith in the same Psalm, Behold, children are an inheritance from the Lorde, and the fruite of the wombe are reward. Whereby wee haue a sure testimonie, as in many other places of the Scripture, that we must acknowledge the Generation of children to come from God, and not from nature, and the fruitfulness and barrenesse both of men and women.

By our former speeches wee may learne what was the creation of the first man and first woman, with the lawfull coniunction betwixt them, by meanes whereof God would haue mankind preferred and multiplied by good order, and not by a brutish confusion, such as is amongst the beasts. Now it remaineth, that following the order of our discourses, we speak of generation, whereby wee shall know the vertue that God gaue for that purpose to our first parents, when he said vnto them, Bring forth fruite and multiply, and fill the earth. Which hath had such power and vertue, that from thence haue issued all the men, women, and children, that haue bene since the beginning of world, that are now, and that shall bee vnto the end thereof. The like also proceeded from the blessing which God gaue not onely to all other liuing creatures, but also to all herbs and plants. For we haue already heard, how after the liuing body is growne vp to his full vigor and strength, it beginneth then by little and little to faile, and to tend vnto death, whereby in the end it falleth away altogether. For according vnto that comparison and similitude, which hath bene already propounded vnto vs of a lamp, the flame whereof cannot be ioyned still with the weake except there bee some cleauing moisture to knit the parts together: so there is in a liuing body a certaine humidity that holdeth of the nature of the aire, which moisture is very good, & is dispersed throughout the whole body, hauing his propagation of the seede, and ioyning together all the parts of the body. This is commonly called the Radical humour, because it is as it were the roote of life, and hath the celestiall and quickening heate brought immediatly and directly vnto it: so that when this moisture is extinguished, the heate also vanissheth, & fadeth away. And looke as the heate drinketh vp and consumeth by little and little this humidity so doth the heate it selfe diminish and languish away, because his food faileth that is in the moisture: euen as the flame, lesseneth and loseth his vigor, as the oyle, or tallow, or wax faileth in a lamp, or in a candle. And although this radical humidity be nourished by the ordinary food which the body dayly receiveth, neuertheles, for asmuch as that nourishment which euery member receiveth, is not so pure nor so fit, nor so natural as the radical humor it selfe neither can wholly restore that which diminisheth and consumeth thereof, it must needs be that life would faile in proceesse of time, by reason that neither the vigor of the hear, nor the purenesse of his nourishment containeth sound and entire. For the same thing agreeth to this radical humor, which we see by experience in wine, which so long as it is pure and in his naturall strength, doeth easily turne a little water into it owne nature, so that it cannot be perceived that there is any water at all in it. But if we continue still powring in of water at all in it. But if ye continue still powring in of water and mingling it therewith, it will weaken by litle and little, and alwaies loose of his pure substance, so that in the end it will be no better then water. And thus the radicall humour and the naturall heate destroy one an other. For the humour that is gotten by sustenance differeth much from Radicall that was consumed by naturall heate. Whereupon it followeth also, that this naturall heate hath not so good & pure nourishment as before, so that it must needs grow weaker & being thus weakened, it hath lesse vertue to concoct wel, and to turne that humour into nourishment wherewith it ought to be mainetained. By this meanes it commeth to passe, that the radicall humiditie and naturall heat faile and perish both together. Whereby we may easily vnderstand why mens bodies abide not alwaies in their strength, but faile & waxe olde, and so death followeth olde age. Wee haue already spoken somewhat before both of the length and shortnesse of mans life, and of naturall and violent death: but wee will speake more fully of them heereafter, God willing.

What is
ture.

Genes. 1.

Now we are to consider, how the providence of God hath provided for this defect of nature through that vertue of Generation, which by his blessing hee hath given vnto it, and whereof I spake euen now, to the ende, that the whole race and seuerall kindes of thinges created should not perish. Whereupon wee may well say, that that nature which hath this vertue, is no other thing then the blessing of God, whereunto all honour is to be given. For as GOD hath created all things by his mightie word, so by the selfe same word hee hath created and placed in the first kindes of the creatures that he hath created, those seedes whereby he would haue euery one preferred both in the whole and in his seuerall kinde. And therefore as in blessing the earth after hee had created it, and commanding it to bring forth herbs, trees, and plants with their fruites according to their kindes, hee did therewithall endue it with vertue to doeso, as it hath alwaies done so hitherto, doeth so daily, and will doe so to the end of the world: euen so it is with that blessing which he hath given to all the plants, and to all liuing creatures, and namely, to man and woman, and with that commandement which he hath given them to growe, to multiply and to fill the earth. Wherefore wee ought without ceasing to consider and to contemplate God the Creatour in the generation of all things, and principally in that of man, as if behold him daily pursuing his worke of creation. For although hee worke now by other meanes then hee did in the first creation of the whole frame, yet hee is no lesse now the Creator of al men and of all other creatures that grow daily in the world by generation, then hee was of the first man and first creatures, which hee created of nothing in the beginning. For hee created vs all in Adam and Eue, and shut vs vp as it were in a store-house, or in a spring or fountaine, or as in one stocke of mankinde, out of which hee produceth men continually.

Genes. 1.

Genes. 1.

Genes. 1.

What Generation is.

What the generative power is.

Wherefore we ought diligently to consider of this worke of God, and of this vertue which he hath given to Nature by his word and blessing to ingender like, and to encrease the whole race and kinde thereof. For this cause as it is the office of Nature in the beginning to nourish bodies, and then to cause them to encrease and augment: so in the end it is her duty to preserve the seuerall kindes of things as long as she may, by Generation of the like. Whereby it appeareth, that Generation is a worke of liuing creatures after they are come to their growth and vigour, as wee see the like also in plants themselves. For in the beginning of the Spring all their vertue is in their root, and from thence it commeth after into the boughes and leaues, next into the floure and fruite, and lastly into the seede, which being sown, another plant is brought forth like vnto the first. Wherefore wee may say, that the generative vertue is a power in liuing creatures that engendereth his like, being ordained for the preservation of the same kinde. So that wee must diligently meditate and often set before our eyes this goodly order of nature, according whereunto the nourishing facultie is first given to the soule for the preservation of euery particular: next, the power to cause it to grow and to augment to a iust and sufficient greatnesse: and lastly, the generative vertue whereby the kinde is preserved. For albeit the order that is throughout the whole course of nature be an euident testimony, that neither the world nor any thing therein, standeth vpon chance or fortune, yet among others this is most singular & excellent, in that the same kindes of all things abide continually, & that euery one begetteth and multiplieth his like, without any maner of confusion amongst them: which could not be eschewed, if so be that creatures were bred and borne at aduenture, without the counsell and providence of their Creator, and of him that wrought such a worke.

Now

Now we are to vnderstand, that the seede is a body that hath in it selfe a Vegetatiue soule which body in Generation is turned into another like to that from which it is taken: and because nourishing, growing, and engendering are the effects of foode and sustenance, they are contained vnder the name of a vegetatiue soule, which is a faculty and power, and not onely conuerteth food into the substance of the liuing body, for the good thereof, and by that conuersion augmenteth it, that it may attaine to a conuenient bignesse, but also engendreth an other body of the same forme and kinde. And therefore after that this vegetatiue power hath done that duty which it ought to performe about the growth of the liuing body, then hath it time & means enough to gather together into a smal roome many of those qualities that keep the soule in the administration of the body, out of which it can soone draw and engender a like kinde, so far forth as the qualities of the matter will be able to beare. For when they are repugnant to the qualities meete for that kinde, whatsoeuer commeth thereof degenerateth, as we see it in the earth, when in steade of wheat, whereof it receiueth the seede, it bringeth forth darnell, or some other beards of an other nature, and as we see it also in monsters, that are borne both of women and of other lining creatures. For there are in many countries, (namely, in Sicilia, and in the kingdome of Naples, and in Flaunders, as many Authours worthy of credite haue testified) women in whom haue bin bred oftentimes sundry kinds of beasts in stead of children, & sometimes together with the child either liuing or dead. Which thing commeth to passe in such women as abound with euill humors, that are putrified and corrupted, either by reason of the aire, or of bad meate, or of excesse in eating: as in such bodies wherein wormes, and such other filthinesse breedeth. The Astrologians refer this vnto constellations, as they do al other things. I leaue the secret iudgements & punishments of God, wherby such things may come to passe, neuertheles these things ought to admonish women to pray vnto God, to recommend themselves to him, and to be sober. The moone calues in the wombe, which falleth out often, proceed also of the like causes. In like manner it falleth out oftentimes that the kind degenerateth through corruption of the seede.

What seed is.

What is meant by a Vegetatiue soule.

Of the cause of monsters.

But to go on forward with our matter of the generation of liuing creatures, & namely, man, we must know that forasmuch as the male hath naturally more heat in him then the female, he is also by nature the chiefest in the Generatio. For this cause when the holy Scriptures speake of mankinde, it is ordinarily comprehended vnder the name of man. And when mention is made of his generation, they speake as though all proceeded onely from man: as when Malachie speaking of his creation saith, Did not he make one? and wherefore one? because he sought a goodly seede. And Saint Paul, He hath made (saith he) of one blood, all mankinde. Neuerthelesse GOD hath put in nature such a temperature betweene the male and female, that if both their natures were altogether alike, there could be no Generation. For it consisteth in force and infirmities. But the wisdom of God hath so well provided as that it knoweth how to draw strength out of weakenes, so that the one can do nothing without the other in generation, because he hath so willed and ordained it.

Malach. 2. 15.

Now I leaue to thee, AMANA, to discourse vnto vs more particularly of such things as are most worthy to be noted in this maruailous worke of God, and of the principall cause why he hath giuen to man the Generatiue power.

Of the powers of the Generatiue vertue, and of their offices: of the principall cause why God gaue to man the power of Generation: in what sense the reines are taken for the seate of Generation: how wee ought rightly to consider of the generation of man. Chap. 70.

A*MANA*. As noueltie causeth a man through the error of iudgement, to thinke that rare things are greater & more worthy of admiration: so most men imaginethose matters to be small and not worthy to be wondered at, which fall out dayly before their eyes. But ignorance is the cause of both these effects. For as a man admireth that which he neuer knew could be performed, so he maketh no reckoning of that thing which he vually beholdeth, because he hath alwaies bin ignorant of the secrets of nature, or rather of his Authour and Creatour, who appeareth wonderfull in the least of his workes, even in the very Ant of

Two effects of ignorance.

Pismire.

Pis mire. This selfe same ignorance is the cause that so few contemplate as they ought the forme and fashion of their being, or that giue due glory to him who daily bringeth them in to the world by such wonderfull workmanship. Neither it is possible that men should giue such glory to GOD as they ought, except they esteeme all those workes which he effecteth daily amongst them, to bee so many miracles worthy admiration, which way soeuer they turne their eies. Moreouer let them know, that what measure of knowledge soeuer they are able to get of his workes, yet that which they doe know is very little, yea, almost nothing, in regard of that wherof they are ignorant: euen in that which concerneth their creation and generation.

Of the similitude that is in generation.

From whence the seede commeth.

The feuerall vertues of the generatiue power.

The chiefe cause why the generatiue power was giuen to man.

Now following that which we haue already heard touching this matter, we are to consider a maruailous prouidence of God, in the similitude that is betweene the creature engendering, and that which proceedeth from it. Wherby the way we may obserue this, that there is greater resemblance in the Generation of plants then in that of liuing creatures, & more in that of beastes, then that in of men: forasmuch as plants are voide of imagination, and that imagination which is in beastes is more firme and staied then that which is in men, because our mindes are more floting and vnsable. But it is wonderfull to consider what great similitude there is, insomuch as we comonly see, that the infirmities of some mebers in the parents are founde also in their children: and that oftentimes they expresse their very looks, countenances, and gestures. Which also may serue for a further confirmation of that which we haue already touched, concerning the agreement of euilles with the complexion & temperature of the humours of mens bodies. Againe, it appeareth by the strength or weakenes that is founde to be as wel childre as in their fathers & mothers that the seede of which they are begotten descended not onely from the braine, as some haue thought, but that it is also taken from all the other members, and from all parts of the body. And because it is a profitable superfluitie taken from the nourishment of the blood scattered throughout the whole bodie after the fourth digestion, it hath peculiar vessels in the bodie, some to drawe it, others to perfect and preferue it for generation, and some to expell it out. And as this expulsive vertue is necessarie in Generation on the behalfe of the male, so in regarde of the female it is requisite that there should bee a vertue to containe and preferue, and secondly to chaunge, mingle, and temper it with the womans seede, so far forth as shall be expedient for the temperature of the whole bodie, and of euery member thereof. Besides there must bee an other vertue to fashion into members all this matter mingled and tempered, and to giue vnto them that figure and shape which agreeeth to euery one one of them. Lastly, there is an other vertue equisite, which should drive out the childe after it is fashioned at the time which God hath appointed in nature for that purpose. And these are all the parts with their offices, which are to be found in the Generatiue power of the vegetatiue soule. now because there are so many sorts of them, it is very meete that they should haue sundry places and diuers instruments in the body for the exercise of them. For this cause there are, to serue all these offices, fundry parts and many members, composed with wonderfull Art, and distinguished in most admirable fashion both with figure and qualities.

But our meaning is not to make any long particular narration, both by reaso of the matter which would be very long, as also because sinne hath made the Generation of man so full of shame, that men can hardly speake of it, or of those members that serue thereunto, especially of one part of them, without shame. Neuerthelesse as before we haue considered the counsell and prouidence of God, in that he hath ioyned to man created to immortaliy, that part wherein the light of his diuine wisdom shall shine, the loue of God shall bee seruent, and righteousnesse shall dwell for euermore, with the kitchen of mans body, whose vse shall passe away after this life: so we must consider the cause why he hath ioyned vnto this kitchen the Generatiue power, & wherfore he hath giuen it to man. Let vs know the, that as man was created for an other end then plants & beastes, so God hath giuen to him the power of Generation to an other end then he hath to the, vpon whom it is bestowed only for the preferuatiō of their kinds. For it was especially giuen him, because the Creator of the whole world purposed to collect & gather together a perpetual Church out of mankind, that is, a company of men begotten after this manner, to be dedicated and consecrated vnto him. Therefore we ought diligently to meditate and to thinke often vpon this wonderfull counsaile of GOD, and to yeelde him praise, in that hee hath manifested himselfe vnto vs, and of his weake and corrupt masse of flesh hath assembled and culled out an euerlasting Church

Church: and in that beaydeth, nourisheth & preferueth vs, yea, is carefull ouer vs, and beareth vs, calling vpon him. Neither doth he only preferue the whole course of nature for our sakes, but also giueth himselfe vnto vs: which are such benefites as exceede all the imagination and eloquence of man. Wherefore wee ought so much the rather to awaken our mindes to consider them well, and bee very much displeased with our selues, because wee doe not so well as we ought, behold this presence of OOD in that obscurity and darkenes wherein wee liue; as also, because we are no more stirred vp to loue, serue, and honour him in regarde of that true and great loue wherewith he loueth vs.

But to goe forward with our matter of Generation, we must call to mind what we heard before of the vse of the kindeis for the purging of blood, in respect whereof we call al that part of the body wherein they are seated, by the name of Reines. And by reason of the neereness that is betweene them and the seede vessels, seruing for Generation, which are many in number, all that part is taken, chiefly in the holy Scriptures, for the seate & spring thereof, and as it were for the seminary of mankind. Therefore it is written in the Hebrewes that Leuy was yet in the loines of his father Abraham, when Melchisedec met him. And Moses speaking in the person of the Lorde, of the promise made to Isaac, saith, Kings shall come out of thy loines. Dauid also minding to shew what knowledge God hath of men whom he hath created, saith Thou hast possessed my reines: thou hast covered me in my mothers wombe. And Iob declaring the selfesame thing more fully, and speaking of the seed whereof he was begotten, after he had said, Hast thou not poured me out as milke? and turned me to cruddes like cheese? he addeth presently, Thou hast clothed me with skin and flesh, and ioyned me together with bones and sinewes. This is that covering whereof the Psalmist spake, which was giuen him of God in his mothers wombe after her conception.

Iob. 10. 10. & 11.

Wherupon we haue to note, that these holy men speaking in this maner, teach vs sufficiently what is the cheife part of man, which they accompt to bee the true man. For they declare vnto vs evidently that the soule which dwelleth in the body is truely man, and that the body in comparison therof is but his covering, & the lodging wherein he dwelleth. Therefore the heauens themselves compared mans soule to one placed in a garrison, in which he is to abide vntill hee bee called from thence by the Prince and Captaine that placed him therein: meaning thereby to teach vs, that we must abide in this life and discharge our duty therein, so long as it shall please GOD, who hath brought vs into it, to haue vs continuetherein.

What is man properly.

Truely, if we consider well of those marueilous workes, which GOD effecteth daily in the Generation of men, we may well say, that it is a great miracle of God in Nature, and ought to be diligently considered of, as Dauid testifieth that he did so in his owne person. Therefore he saith, *Thou holdest me straight behind and before, and layest thy hand vpon me: shewing throughout the whole Psalm, that there is nothing in man so hidden & covered, which is not discovered before GOD, and which hee knoweth not and searcheth not vnto the bottome, to the end that men deceiue not themselves through their hipocrisie, thinking to hide themselves before him. For this cause he saith in the beginning, that he is so knowne to GOD on all sides, both within and without, that there is not so much as one motion in him, nor one thought or affection, which is not wholly manifested vnto him. And to proue and confirme his saying, he taketh his argument from the creation of man, giuing vs to vnderstand thereby, that forasmuch as GOD is his Creatour and Maker, it can not be but that he should thoroughly know his worke. Whereby we haue a certaine testimony of that which we speake in our former discourse, of the creation of all those men that are daily created by Generation, according to the order of Nature appointed by GOD. For the Prophet doth no lesse acknowledge that GOD hath made him, then Adam the first man did. So that looke what the Prophet speaketh of his owne person, it is also to be vnderstood of euery one, both in regard of his creation, as also of that knowledge which GOD hath of all things in man, be they neuer so hid and covered. Afterward he addeth, that this knowledge is too wonderfull for him, and so high that it cannot attaine vnto it. Now we may iudge well, both of the composition of mans body, and also of the nature of the soule, by those discourses of which we haue already made. And if we did consider but of the body by it selfe, yet had we iust cause to say as much as Dauid saith here. What then might be spoken if we ioyned the soule with the body, and considered onely of that which might generally bee knowne by such meanes as are already set downe? For by that which we doe know, we shall iudge well enough how far this knowledge exceedeth our capacity, and what remaineth yet behinde,*

which we cannot comprehend.

Forasmuch then as the Prophet wondereth so much at this great and high skill, wherof God giueth vs so excellent testimonie in the creation and generation of men, we ought not to thinke it superfluous and vnprofitable, but well beseeming a Christian man, to enquire after that which God would haue vs know, and which we may know, and to consider well of his workes wherein he manifesteth his prouidence and wisdom, especially in man, who is, as we haue heard, the chiefest of all his workes amongst the visible creatures, and as it were an other world created within this. Now as David from the creation of man, inferreth the knowledge which God hath of him, so Iob in the same place that I alleadged euen now, concludeth, that forasmuch as God is the Creator and Artificer that made man, he delighteth not in destroying his work. Thy hands, (saith he) hane made me & fashioned me wholly round about, and wilt thou destroy mee? Which is as much as if he had said, is it possible that I who am the worke of thy hands, should be brought to nothing by thee? For besides that this were against nature, the Scriptur testifieth vnto vs in many places, that he is not onely a preseruer of that which he hath made, but also that he leaueth not his workes vnperfect: and that he is so farre from defacing them, that contrariwise it is his manner to leade them to perfection. Whereby we ought to learne, that the onely consideration of the worke of our creation ought greatly to solace, comfort, and confirme vs in all afflictions and aduersities, how rigorous soeuer the hand of God should be vpon vs. For first, we ought to be thoroughly resolved of this, that no affliction can come vnto vs, but by his good will and from his hand, whatsoeuer the meanes and instruments are, of which hee maketh his rodde and scourges, and by which he striketh and beateth vs. Now then he seeing the hand that toucheth vs is the same that hath made and fashioned vs, we know wel that he setteth not himselfe against a strange worke vnknown vnto him, but against his owne wherewith he is very well acquainted. Whereupon wee may certainly conclude, that it proceedeth not of crueltie and furie that he striketh vs, nor yet without good cause: as hee that is neither cruell, nor furious, nor void of reason. So that it followeth necessarily, either that wee haue giuen him great occasion, or that it is very requisite for vs. But howsoeuer it bee, hee euer knoweth well how to turne all the afflictions of his children to his glory, and to their great honour and profit, as we haue many notable examples hereof in all the seruants of God, and namely in those two personages David and Iob, of whome wee haue spoken in in this our discourse.

Iob. 10. 8.

Psal. 136. and 138.

A good lesson to be learned from our creation.

The afflictions of Gods childre turne to their good.

Which we continuing so farreforth as it respecteth the worke of mans generation, are to consider more narrowly of the admirable secrete of nature therein, so much as daily experience and diligent search hath learned men to know. Tell vs then, ARAM, of the fashion of a childe in the wombe.

Of the fashion of a childe in the wombe, and how the members are framed one after another in the mothers bellie: of the time and dayes, within which a childe is perfectly fashioned.

ARAM, I cannot marueile enough at the pride and presumption of many, who thinke themselves to be such great Philosophers, and so skilfull in the knowledge of naturall things, that they perswade themselves, that nothing is so secrete in nature which they know not, and whereof they are not able to shew the causes and reason. But experience sheweth vnto vs daily, how farre short they are of that which they thinke, and in what ignorance the best learned are wraped at this day. For how many things are daily manifested vnto them, which the greatest searchers of nature, that euer haue beene, were ignorant of, vnto whome notwithstanding they that now liue are but disciples? And how many things doe continually come to passe, into which the chiefest, sharpest sighted, and most expert haue no sight at all, or very small? And among them that suppose they haue good knowledge, how are they deceiued oftentimes? How many are doubtfull in many things whereof they haue but small coniectures, whereupon they gesse at all aduenture, and as they imagine? VVe may easily iudge hereof by this, that continually one reprehendeth and correcteth another, and that the later writers condemne sundry things in the former. But not to seeke a farre off for examples, we may see them daily in the science of the Anatomie of mens bodies. For there was neuer yet Philicion or Anatomist either olde or newe, that attained to perfect knowledge

knowledge, and could render a reason of every thing that is but in one body, notwithstanding that they are continually conversant in that matter. Therefore to leave vnto God that secret which is hidden from our vnderstanding, let vs consider of that which we may know touching the forme of a child in the wombe.

If we looke narrowly into that order that nature followeth in the framing of man, who is the litle world, we shall find it like to that which the Authour of nature obserued in the creation of the world, which Moses calleth the generation of the heauens and of the earth. Gen. 2.4. For in the beginning the earth was without forme & void, and couered with a great gulph of waters, so that the earth and waters and matter of all the elements, and of all creatures created after ward, were mingled and confounded together in this great heape. Vnto this the Almighty afterwards added a forme, and created so many goodly creatures, and of so diuers natures & kinds as are to be seene in the whole world, which he hath adorned with them, and endued with so great beauty that it hath receiued the name of that, which is as much as Ornament or Order of things well disposed. The creation of the world, and of man compared together.

After the same manner doth nature, or rather God by nature work in the creation and generation of men. For the seed of which they are formed, and which is the matter prepared, disposed and tempered by the same providence of God for the work he hath in hand, receiueth not fashion presently vpon the concepio, but remaineth for a time without any figure or lineaments, or proportion, and shew of a humane body, or of any member therof. The naturall Philosophers & Phisicians, who haue searched most carefully into this work, and haue had greatest experience, they say that there are certaine membranes and skins that are wrappe round about the infant in the wombe, which some commonly call the Matrix others call the Mother: and that within these skins, which are three in number, as some Anatomists say, others but two, as it were within certaine bands, the fruite is preserved vntill the birth. Wherein we are to acknowledge the providence of almighty GOD, who hath so disposed of nature, that even from our mothers wombe, she is in steade of a mother to vs, folding vs vp with bandes before shee that hath conceived vs can performe the same. An argument of the providence of God

But let vs proceede on with our matter, so far soorth as we haue learned of the fashion of the child in the discourse of Philosophers and Phisicians. They say then, that after the wombe hath receiued the seeds ioyned together, of both which the childe is to be framed, it commeth to passe that the heat of the Matrix warmeth all this matter as it were in a litle fornace, and so raiseth a skin ouer it which being as it were rosted by litle and litle, waxeth crusty and hard round about the seed. This causeth the whole matter to resemble an egge, by reason that this skinn compasseth about the seed, which boyleth inwardly through the abundance of naturall spirits that are within it. This is that skinn which is commonly called the Secundine, or After burthen, being ioyned on euery side to the womb by reason of a great number of Orifices, veines and arteries reaching thereunto, to the end that by them the blood, spirites, and nourishment should be conueyed to the infant. For as the whole wombe embraceth the seed, so likewise it heateth and nourisheth the same. Therefore this skinn that serueth in steade of litle bandes hath two vses: the first is to take fast hold of the womb: the other, to serue for the nourishment of the burthen, and of the childe. For this cause there are two veines and two arteries in it (besides a passage in the middelt) which are as it were the rootes of the burthen, and make the Nauill. Of the forme of an infant.

This worke with other circumstances belonging thereunto, which we omit for breuity sake, is brought to passe the first sixe dayes of the conception. After this skinn, they that make three, speake of a second skinn that is in the middelt, which they saye was created to receiue the vrine of the childe, which in the former monethes is voyded by the Nauill, and in the latter monethes by the ordinary passage. This voyding place is ordayned to this ende, that the vrine might not frette and rent in sunder the tender skin of the infant, who is therefore couered with a third skinn next to the other, and that is very tender. So that the vrine toucheth not the infant, but is voyded by the middle way, as I haue already declared. Thus you see the beginning of the conception, before the burthen be wholly formed like to an infant. Wherunto that saying of the Prophet hath relation, Thine eies (sayth hee) did see mee when I was without forme: for in thy booke was all things written which in continuance were fashioned, when there was none of them before. Then hee compareth the secreet partes seruing for generation, especially the belly, and womb. The first sixe dayes worke from the conception.

544 Of the fashioning of the child, and of

wombe of the woman, vnto the earth, and to an obscure, secret and hidde place, even to deepe and darke caues in the ground. For as the earth hauing received the seede in which is the vigour, keepeth, cherisheth, and increaseth the same: enen so fareth it with the wombe and with the mother. On the other side, as these parts are lowest in regard of the trunke of the body, and of all the receptacles and vessels thereof, so are they very secret and hidden, and as it were, in the midst & center of the body, if the whole be considered together, namely the trunke with both ends thereof. For this cause the work that is there wrought by God, is so much the more marueilous, because enen in that obscure place, it receiveth the goodliest and most perfect forme that can be imagined. And who will not be abashed to consider, that out of that slymie seed of man there should come bones, sinewes, flesh, skinne, and such like things so diuers one from another? But yet it is a greater marueile to see all this great diuersity of matter, to be framed in so many sundry members, and of so many sundry formes, and that with such excellent beauty, so profitable and so fit for those offices that are assigned vnto them, as we haue learned in our former discourses. Now as God did not create all creatures in one day, although he could well haue done it, if it had so pleased him, so doth he in the generation of men, for albeit that the members are fashioned all at once, so that not one of them is framed before an other, neuerthelesse because there is great variety betwixt them, both in respect of their dignity, and of their strength, nature their mother doth not set them forward all alike. For in displaying her power generally towards all the parts of the body, it commeth to passe that her worke, and the figure given vnto it, appeareth sooner or later in some members more then in others. Hereof it is that the greatest and chiefest members appeare naturally before the rest, albeit they are not the first that are fashioned. So likewise all the members are not beautified and made perfect at the same time, but some after others, according as they haue heat and nourishment. Nature therefore obserueth this order, that the worthiest parts and such as haue in them the beginning of motion, shew themselues first, and then those members that are profitable and seruiceable to the former, and are created for their cause. And according to this order the highest parts are seene sooner then the lowest, & those within before them without, and they that receive their substance from the seed before those that haue it from blood. Those also amongst them that are most excellent are first, notwithstanding many times they haue their accomplishment and perfection after the other, as it appeareth in the Nauil. For although the heart, liuer, and braine, being the chiefest parts of the body, haue their beginning before that, yet is it the first amongst the all that appeareth perfect. Now then after the Nauill with his pipe or passage is formed and fashioned within the first sixe dayes, the blood and spirit are next drawne by those veines and arteries, whereof wee spake euen now to be sent to the seed, & mingled therewith, that the principall members might be figured, as the liuer, the hart, & the braine, which begin first like to litle bladders, and so consequently the rest which are fashioned by litle & litle according as they receive nourishment. For the veines whereby the burthen is nourished, may well bee likened to small rootes, whereby plants are cherished: as also the burthen it selfe may be compared vnto plantes in this point, as wee haue already learned. So that the seed receiuing this forme already spoken of, in the first sixe daies, during which time it is called by no other name then seed, nine dayes after that the blood is drawne thither, of which the liuer and the heart receive their forme: so that after twelue dayes added to the former, a man may discern the lineaments and proportion of these two members, and also of the braine, albeit they are not then altogether fashioned. At this time the burthen is called Fetus of the Latines, and Embryon of the Greeks, which is as much in our language as Sprouting or Budding. Next after this, within the space of other eightene dayes, all the other members are fashioned and distinguished. So that about five and forty dayes after the conception, the members receive their perfect fashion: and then doth the burthen begin to live not only as plantes live, but also as other living creatures. For it hath sense & feeling about the sixe & thirtieth day, and from that time forward it is called an infant. But as yet it is void of motion. For by and by after it is formed, it is very tender, vntill that by vertue of the heat it waxeth more dry and firme, which is by reason that the moisture, whereby it is made so soft and tender, consumeth away by litle and litle, so that the nayles begin to take roote at the fingers ends, and the haire in the head. Now after the child is come to the third moneth if it be a male, or to the fourth if it be a female, it beginneth to stirre it selfe according to the testimony of Hippocrates, because then his bones are more firme and somewhat harder. But this is not alwaies alike alike in al women with child. For there are some that alwaies feele it stirre about the two & fortieth day, others neuer feele the same vntill the middest of the time from the conception to the birth. Yea in the same woman the same time and order is not alwaies obserued. For according to the strength and good complection of the child, and the nature and disposition of the mother, these things change, and not onely because of the sexe. Neuerthelesse it is most ordinary and viall for male children to moue within three moneths or thereabouts, as likewise to be borne at the ninth moneth: whereas females are commonly somewhat slower both in stirring and also at their birth, the reason wherof is this, because male childre are naturally a great deale more hote then females. Galen attributeth the cause of the generation of sons to the strength and heat of the seed and saith that they are caried on the right side of the wombe, as the daughters on the left, which is the colder side, as being farthest removed from the liuer. He yeeldeth also this reason why some children are more like the father and some the mother, because of the greater strength of feede which they haue either from the one, or from the other. And when it commeth to passe, that the wombe receiue seed at two sundry passages which it hath, then are twins engendred either at one conception or at twaine, so that the later bee not long after the former; according to the opinions of the Philosophers, & namely of Aristotle, who rehearseth many examples therof in his seuenth booke of the history of liuing creatures, saying that a whore was deliuered of two children, wherof the one was like the father, and the other like the adulterer. But now we are to consider of the child birth, which is as wonderfull a worke of God in nature as any other. It belongeth then to thee ACHITO B, to end this dayes worke by a discourse tending to this purpose.

Galen's opinion of the birth of sons.

Of childe birth, and the naturall causes therof: of the great providence of God appearing therein: of the image of our eternall natiuity represented vnto vs in our mortall birth. Chap. 72.

ACHITO B. Men are of that nature, that they cannot acknowledge what they are themselves, or what they haue receined of God, except they be brought backe to the first dust and earth, out of which they are taken, euen to their first creation & generation. Therefore the holy spirit doth esteeme it a thing not vnwoorthy his diuine maiesty often to instruct and to admonish vs by his word, and that so plainly and familiarly, as no man, be he neuer so skilfull or so ignorant, but he may greatly profit in this school, at leastwise be made altogether inexcusable, if he learne not that which the spirit doth there teach him. For concerning them that are most ignorant, he speaketh very plainly to be vnderstood of them; propounding that vnto them wherof they cannot be ignorant, although they would, at leastwise which they cannot easily know. And as for the skilfuller sort, who by their knowledge are able to vnderstand more then others, they are so much the more guilty, if they will not giue credite to the works of God, as they are propounded vnto vs in the holy scriptures. For what idle of nature soeuer they frame to themselves, yet must they alwaies come to this first beginning of man, which is cleane contrary to the reason of humane sense and vnderstanding, and so giue glory vnto God: otherwise the fruit of all their study will be nothing els but confusion and ignorance. Now the more we consider of the daily generation of men, the more like we shall find it in all admiration to their first originall and creation. For who could euer, I say, not beleue, but only thinke or imagine, that out of pressed milk and curds, as it were, such as the beginning of man seemeth to be, there could proceede any liuing creature at all, especially such an image of God as man is? And yet we see this dayly come to passe. Now from whence commeth this milke? Wee cannot for shame speake it without blushing. So that if the worke and providence of God be wonderfull in the conception and fashioning of man, and in the life and preservation he affordeth him in his Mothers belly, as we haue shewed heretofore, sure it is no lesse admirable in his natiuity & birth as we may now vnderstand.

The word profitable for all.

Mans birth a wonderfull work of God.

We haue already heard, how by the faculties and powers of the soule, and generative vertue thereof, the seede is retained and preserved, and how the child is formed thereof in the wombe. Now all this while it is nourished by blood, which is drawn vnto it by the veins of the nauill ordained to that end: & therefore also the issue of this blood commonly ceaseth in women with child, as that which is then divided into three parts. For the child draweth the purest thereof to it selfe, and is therewithall nourished. Secondly the womb by veines leading directly to the breasts, sendeth that part which is lesse pure, wherof the milk is prepared that feedeth the child after it is born. The third part which is the worst, staideth still in the womb, & so soon as the child is born, it issueth forth also. This food which the child receiveth thus in the womb, caused Galen to alledge an ancient sentence out of Athenaus, saying, That the child receiveth more from the mother then from the father, even as the plants draw more from the earth then they doe from the husbandman. For this menstruall blood first encreaseth the seede, and after serveth towards the growth of the members by ministring food vnto them. And for this cause this Author teacheth that naturally the loue of the childre is very great towards their Mothers, and so of the Mothers towards their children, as also in respect of the exceeding great mixture of their substance. But when the childe is now encreased and growne so great and strong, that he is well able to moue himselfe, and to receiue his foode at the mouth, as he is waxen greater, so he must haue more store of nourishment then, then he is able to draw in at the nauill. Likewise forasmuch as naturall heate is more augmented he had neede of the more aire, and to receiue it in by respiration and breathing, so far forth as is necessary for his refreshing. Whereupon the childe stirreth and mooueth with greater strength and violence, so that it breaketh the skins and bands wherein it was wrapped, and some veines also, and so maketh an issue and way for it selfe, as that which cannot any longer be kept in the womb. Now when the child feeleth that aire entring in which it desireth & seeketh, for the reason before alledged, it moueth it self towards the mouth of the womb, which is the most naturall and easie way of birth, by reason that it is borne with the head forward. Now so soone as it is come into the light it crieth, as if it did prognosticate & foretell of the miseries of that life into which it is entred. The Philosophers & Phisitions refer the cause of this weeping to that motiō which driueth it to the birth, as also to those handlings & touchings wherwith it is receiued, which cannot be without some sence of grieve conceiued by this litle tender body. Which body so long as it is in the womb, is bowd round as it were in a lump, so that the heels of it ioyned to the buttocks, and the hands lay fast hold of the knees, towards which it doth bow downe the head so low, that the eies are ioyned to the thumbs as if they were fastened to them, and the nose is thrust down betweene the knees. Now when it hath attained to the 9. moneth, so that it may no longer tary there, for the reasons before mentioned, it turneth it selfe in the womb, first with the head downward, & stretching out the legs, & other members vpward. Then when the houre of child-birth approacheth, the babe by kicking & turning it selfe more violently, maketh many ruptures by litle & litle, so that the skins wherin both the Vrine & the sweat are contained burst asunder, whole streams gush out, which shew that the birth is hard at hand. For presētly vpon the renting & breach of the After burthen through the violence of the child, because there is nothing els that holdeth it vp, the babe falleth down, euē as an apple or peare falleth frō the tree when it is ripe. And as the child doth his best to come forth at that time which God hath prescribed vnto it, so the womb & the mother of the child doe their parts as much as lyeth in them to performe by the prouidence of God, who hath prouided accordingly. For during the space of those 9. moneths wherin the child is contained in the womb, it is shut vp, and embraceth the burthen as close as it may. And when the time of birth cometh, the womb doth not only open it selfe by litle & litle, but all the top of it doth gather it selfe as close together as it can, and so thrust the babe towards the mouth of it, whereunto also the neighbour parts lend their helping hand. The woman likewise laboreth, & helpeth as much as she is able, and the child falling downward with his head turned towards the mouth of the womb, maketh way for all the rest of his body, and so casteth it selfe forth, at whose issuing out, the humor wherewithall it was before abundantly moistened helpeth very much, by reason that both the childs body, and the way also is thereby made more gliding and slippery. Wherein we haue a great argument of Gods prouidence to be obserued. For the childs head being of a round fashio, his coming forth cannot be so hindred, as we see it is when the child offereth it selfe crosse wise, or when the arms or legs come forward. Besides, all the rest of the members are greatly benefited hereby, both because the way is already made before thē, as also because themselues are thereby the better placed to prevent al impediments with which otherwise they might encounter. For we see by experience what inconueniences fall out in childbirths, in what dangers the mothers & children are, & how oftē the death of the one or the other, or of both ensueth, whē the child cometh otherwise then then by this order, which is most naturall and most ordinary. Wherefore women with childe haue great occasion offered to recommend themselves vnto God especially at that time. For howsoeuer the child commeth, we must then acknowledge the almighty hand of God, & his helpe & assistance both towards the mothers and their children. For let there be neuer so good concord & agreemēt in the ioynt labor of the child, of the mother, & of the wombe yet the work being so difficult, who wil not wonder that euer it could be borne? who would euer beleue that a child should come forth, or that it could be drawn out of the mothers belly, without cleaving the same asunder in the midst; or without the death of the one of them if not of both, but that we see the experience therof daily before our eyes? Galen, who made such an idol of nature, confesseth that he knoweth not how the child can find any issue & passage out, & therefore wondreth at it very much. Auicenna thinketh that there is an opening of some bones, but he is deceiued, for it cannot be so, neither hath experience euer shewed the same. Wherefore both Philosophers and Phisitions, but especially Epicures and Atheists, must needs be driven into an astonishment at this, & haue their mouths stopped and closed vp, except they will open them to giue glory to God, and to acknowledge and magnifie his great providence and goodnes towards men, singing with Dauid, O God how precious are thy thoughts vnto me; how great is the summe of them: If I should count them they are more then the sand. It was thou that diddest drawe mee out of the wombe: thou gauest mee hope euen at my mothers breasts. But we haue here to note, that there are many causes which hasten forward the childbirth, but we speak here of them that are most common and ordinary. Children that are borne at the sixt moneth or sooner, liue not, as not hauing their whole perfectiō. They that are borne in the seuenth moneth may liue, for then is the fruit perfect. And yet they that are borne in the eight moneth, commonly dy: and the reason is, because the child stirreth very much in the seuenth moneth, preparing it selfe for the birth. So that if the child be of a strong nature it commeth then into the light: but if it be yet weak, it cannot come forth, but tarieth 2. moneths longer in the wombe to gather new strength. For it remoueth from the one side of the wombe to the other. Therefore when the child after the 7. moneth is presently borne in the eight, it cannot liue. For nature was weak in the first indeauor, neither could it be to purpose, before the matter receiueh motiō after the critical time; with which name the Philosophers call the seuenth moneth. Moreover, double motion weakeneth the strength of the childe. For it had remoued vnto the other side of the wombe as is said, & presently after it came into the light; but the nature of the child cannot sustaine two brunts one in the neck of another, so that death followeth therupon. The Astrologiās likewise alledge these reasons why the seuenth moneth is criticall, namely either because the sunne is carried into a signe that is opposit to the signe of conception: or els because every planet answering his seuerall moneth, the eight moneth is giue to Saturne, who is an enemy to them that are borne. Now for the end of this matter, we will consider two things in our generation and birth, which offer vnto vs great cause both of humility and of spiritual ioy. First the, we see how God would haue vs humbled in our generatiō, by creating vs of a matter that is but slime & dung, wherunto notwithstanding, he hath given such an excellent & goodly forme, to the end that his powerfull vertue, wisdom, iustice, and kindnesse, should be so much the better manifested vnto vs, and that in our selues, so that we shall not neede to seeke for testimonies thereof elsewhere. So that as our beginning ought to take out of our heart all swelling and pride, euen so the forme and beauty wherewithall God hath honoured this mire of which he hath made men, and the great graces which he hath communicated with them, especially in regard of the soule which hee hath ioyned to the body, ought to teach vs to acknowledge and to celebrate incessantly his providence and great goodnesse towards vs. To conclude, we ought to consider the image and similitude wee haue of our eternall natiuity in this our mortall birth, and that birth whereby wee are borne vnto an immortall life, as here on earth we are borne to enioy a life that is subiect to mortallitie. For first, as man is formed and fashioned in darke places in the belly of his mother, that afterward he might come forth and enioy the light of the world: so likewise being come hither, he is after a maner so vpon the earth, as if he were to be borne againe. For this world is vnto him as his mothers wombe, wherein the light is to him as darkenes & as a very obscure night, in comparison of that other diuine & eternall light, in which he is to enioy a happy & an immortall life. And therefore as the child is prepared in the darkenes of his mothers belly, that after he may come forth into the light of the world, so are we prepared in this dimme light, that wee may attaine to that other diuine light, which is farre greater and more excellent without comparifon. Againe, when the time of birth approacheth, the life and vigor of the wombe, which is as it were the childs mother, whithereth and decaiech, & the child likewise as if he were dead, in regard of that kind of life which he enioyeth in his mothers belly. For as he liueth no more after that fafhion, fo he is in an eftate that differeth much from the former. So fareth it with man when he is to depart out of the life of this world, as if he were to be deliuered of it in childſ birth for another life. For he dieth in regard of this life, to the eud he may liue another life, which as far excelleth this, as this is better then the other, which he enioyed before in his mothers belly, yea it is fo much the better & of higher price, in that the length of time of this fecond & bleſſed life ſhal be eternall and endleſſe. Moreouer, as a child commeth out when he is borne, fo doth a man when he dieth. And in comming forth both of them enter into a new and vnacquainted light, and into a place where they finde all things much altered and far differing from thoſe which they vſed to haue in their other kind of liuing. For which cauſe both the one and the other being troubled and ſcared with this nouelty, are vnwilling to come forth of their clapper & to forſake their cloſet, were it not that they are vrged and conſtrained thereunto by the art, lawes and rights of nature, whereby God hath better provided for our affaires then wee our ſelues could conceiue or comprehend, both in our nativity and life, and alſo in our death. The ignorance whereof cauſeth our ſpirit to abhor the departure out of this life, in regarde of this great change that is therein, becauſe it knoweth not what good is brought to it thereby, no more then the little child knoweth wherefore he is borne into the world, or what he ſhal finde there. And therefore albeit nature preſſeth to come forth, neuertheleſſe according to that ſenſe which it can haue, it weepeth by and by after it is borne, as it were fallen into ſome great inconuenience, and that ſome great euil were ſalne vnto it, as we do alſo at our death, for the cauſe before alleadged, nor conſidering that it is our ſecond & better birth. Thus you ſee what I haue thought requiſite to be noted in the diſcourſe of our generation: and to morrow, God willing, we muſt looke into the life and death of mans body. But it ſhall not be without profit, if firſt we ſpeake ſomewhat of the cauſes why God created man naked, and with leſſe defence for himſelfe then he did other liuing creatures. It belongeth then to thee AS ER to ſpeake of this matter.

How the child is nourished in the wombe.

Why God created man naked, and with leſſe naturall defence then he did all other liuing creatures: how many wayes he recompenceth this nakednes: of the generall beauty of the whole body of man, ioyned with profit and commodity. Chap. 73.

AS ER. As often as men ſhal conſider in ſuch fort as becommeth them that they are borne men, and not brute beaſts, they will be ſufficiently admoniſhed of the ciuill and ſociable nature in which God hath created them, and of that humanity for which he hath endued them with ſuch a nature, ſo that they will keep themſelves from being transformed into ſauage and cruell beaſts to hurt one another, as commonly they do. Truly, it is not without ſome great and notable cauſe, that among all liuing creatures there is not one to be found that hath a more delicate & tender ſkin, & leſſe furniſhed with couerings for the defence therof the man hath: conſidering that God himſelfe created him as his principal work amongſt al viſible creatures, & made him as it were, Lord of the whole world. And yet he is of that nature, that the ſkin wherwith he is clothed is not ſo ſufficient a garmēt for him as is neceſſary to keep him frō heat & cold, & from other inconueniences that might happen vnto him, except he be clad with ſome other couering then that which he bringeth from his mothers belly. For he neither hath feathers as birds haue, nor wool as ſheep haue, nor briſtles as ſwine haue, neither yet any ſkin or hide ſo hard, nor ſo well covered and furniſhed with haire, as foxes, wolues beares, buls and other fourefooted beaſts haue. Neither hath

hath he any scales as fishes haue nor any shels as cockles, sea-creuilles, tortoises, and such other creatures haue.

But we haue foure things to consider of touching this point. The first is, that if man had not sinned after that God by creation had in great larges made him partaker of his heavenly gifts and graces, he should not haue beene subiect to the want either of garments, or of any such like thing whereupon he is now after a sort brought in subiection, at leastwise hee should haue had all these things without paine and grieve. For this cause it is saide in Genesis, that after our first parents had transgressed the ordinance of God, by eating of the forbidden fruite, they knew that they were naked and covered themselves with leaues. And for a punishment of their offence it was said vnto them, that they should eat their bread in the sweate of their face: vnder which word of bread was comprehended all things whereof they stood in need for the maintenance and preservation of their life: as we vnderstand it in that prayer which we daily make to God, when we demand of him our daily bread. The second point which we ought to note in this matter touching the nakednesse of man, is this, that God would admonish him, not only by the whole frame and composition of his body and of all his members, but also by his very skinne, that he created him to liue in company and fellowship, and in peace with those of his owne kind, to help all and to hurt none. Therefore he did not create him with naturall weapons, as he did other liuing creatures, vnto whom he gaue al things necessary for their defence & preservation. For some of the haue strength & weapons by nature to resist their enemies: others wanting this haue swiftnes to conuey themselves out of all dangers: and some wanting both these, haue yet subtiltie & places of refuge to defend themselves withall. As for man, God hath placed him in this world vnarmed and naked, so that if men be disposed to hurt and to war one vpon another, they must deform themselves, and borrow weapons from others, wherby they transformethemselues, and become monstrous, as though they were transfigured into sauage beasts & into monsters. For they haue not (as hath bin said) hard & strong hides as some bruit beasts haue, neither prickles & darts in them as Hedgehogs and Porcupines haue. Neither are their feet, hands, and nayles like to the hoofes of Horses, Asses, and Mules, or to the talents of birds that liue by pray, or to the pawes of wild beasts, neither yet are their teeth like to theirs. God hath not giuen them sharpe bills like to birds, neither hath he armed them with stings or with venom, as he hath done venomous beasts. True it is, that man hath an aduantage aboue other liuing creatures, namely, his hands: giuen him of God for the doing of any work that he wil, as we haue already declared. Wherefore if he be to fight against beasts, his hand will furnish him with moe weapons, then all theirs are, which they haue by nature, although they be put all together. For he cannot only make weapons of all sorts, but handle them also, and manage them as pleaseth him in his own defence, both against beasts, as likewise against those of his own kind. And I would to God he vsed them but in his owne defence, and did not abuse the as he doth to his own hurt very vnnaturally. But let vs proceed forward & come to the third cause, why God hath thus created man al naked: which is, that he wold admonish him thereby of his naturall infirmity, in regard of those wants and necessities that hemme him in on euery side, vnto which he is more subiect then any other creature. Which instruction ought to worke two things especially in him: first it ought to induce & mooue him to that peaceable and sociable life with his kinde, for the which God created him. Secondly, by this meanes he is the more bound to acknowledge the providence, bounty, & liberality of God towards him, whereby he bringeth to passe, that the necessitie and want, which seemeth to be greater in man then in any other liuing creature, declareth him to be the richest, & best provided for, yea, to bee Lord of all. For all the garments of beasts of what qualitie soeuer they be, and whatsoeuer else they possesse, belong to him. Whereas if men were not subiect to such necessities as are incident vnto them, what vse should they haue of so many creatures as God hath created for them? or what seruice should they haue of their hands. For here againe we see how that by them he provideth for their garments, by setting on worke the skins, wooles, and haire of all other liuing creatures, besides the silks of wormes, and other matter which the fruits of the earth affoord vnto them, as flaxe, hempe, and such like. And if necessitie did not teach them the vse of all these things, how would they consider the power, wisdom, goodnesse and providence of God in his works, & in his creatures, to praise him and to giue him thanks? For although they haue necessitie and want for their schoole-mistris, to the end they might learne this science in their schoole, yet do they profit verie little thereby, but rather become most ingrattfull towards God their Creator who is so bountifull full & liberall a father towards the. Whereupon we haue further to note, that God hath not given to men many things belonging particularly to beasts, because he hath enriched the with so many other things, of which all other creatures are altogether destitute. For besides the help he hath of the composition and placing of those members, which he hath given to their bodies, being so conuenient to performe that which beasts cannot doe with theirs, he hath endued them with speech and reason, whereby, not onely all that is in other creatures which is not in them, is more then recompenced, but they haue more in them, then all other living creatures haue being put together. For albeit they haue no fethers and wings to flye and mount aloft by as birds haue, yet how many meanes haue they to ascend & to descend to goe and to come whether they wil? And as for swiftnes and nimblenesse, how many beasts are there with whose swiftnesse they may helpe themselves? And although they haue not finnes wherby to swim in the sea, and in waters like fishes, yet they haue skil and hands whereby they can make and guide ships, and so conuey themselves whither they will. Now as for strength which they want to carrie heauie burdens a far off, how many waies is it recompenced both by land and by water, and that by meanes as well of beasts whose seruice they vse, as of artes and sciences wherein they are skilfull? Whereby wee see that God hath put more within a man, namely in the sense and vnderstanding, wherewith he hath indued him, then he hath put without in all beasts. Concerning the fourth point of which I haue to speake touching this matter, it is this, that as it pleased God to giue vnto man a far more excellent body for beautie then he did to any other living creature, so he would haue this beautie also to appeare in all the parts thereof. For, first this body was not fashioned, either to fly in the aire as birds do, or to glide vpon the earth, and to draw it selfe vpon the belly as creeping things do, nor to march vpon all foure as foure footed beasts do, nor with the head bending downward as theirs is, but to stand and go vpright with the head lifted vwards towards heauen, to the end he might be admonished, that his true beginning and birth came higher then from the earth, and from other corruptible elements, namely from heauen. Hee is also admonished hereby, that he is not borne to serue his belly as brute beasts doe, and to follow after gluttony, drunkennesse, whoredome, and such other carnall and more then brutish pleasures, wherein licentious men commonly obserue lesse moderation, then beasts that are altogether without reason and vnderstanding. For although the matter whereof a mans body is compounded, differeth nothing from that whereof the bodies of brute beasts are made, neuertheless seeing it pleased God to lodge within it a soule of a diuine & celestiall nature, that is far more excellent then all natures and creatures with bodies, hee would it should haue a lodging agreeable to the nature of it, whereby also man might be admonished of his excellencie, and that he was created, not onely to looke downe vpon the earth as beasts doe, but to lift vp his eyes vnto heauen, and to behold therein the high workes of God his Creator, and to doe the like in the residue of the whole world. For as we haue heard, man is not properly this body which wee see, but chiefly the soule & spirit which wee see not, and which hath the bodie for his lodging. So that if we consider both the house and the inhabitant, we shall see that the thinges giuen of God to beasts and denied, to men, doe bring great beauty both to beasts because they haue them, and to men because they haue them not. For if the beasts were deprived of their armour and naturall ornaments, they should lose all their beautie and profit that redoundeth vnto them: as likewise man should be deformed and vgly, if in any sort he were made partaker of that which is proper and agreeable to other creatures. But because GOD hath created man so that hee might be eternall and immortall, he hath armed him inwardly, even in that part that shall be the meanes vnto him of eternall life. Neither would hee cloathe him with naturall garments, nor arme him with corpall weapons, both because, that had bin superfluous hauing giuen vnto him that which is farre better, as also because his beauty had bin thereby much diminished, and his spirit should not haue bene so well knowne as now it is, by meanes of that skill and of those artes of which God hath made it capable. For what could he inuent and doe, and wherein should he shew that naturall light and dexteritie that is in him, if nature had furnished him with all those things, wherewith his reason giuen vnto him, is able to enrich him? But to conclude our speech, hauing spoken sufficiently of the creation, generation, & birth of man, let vs looke into this beauty that is in the forme & figure of mans body by calling to remembrance our former discourses. And let vs know, that both for the matter, and also for the forme composition thereof, there is not the like worke in all the world & none so goodly, so proper, nor so well vnited and knit together: none so well proportioned ned and polished in euery respect, and in euery part thereof. So that when we consider thereof from one end of it vnto the other, wee shall finde that the workemaster that made this body, hath throughout the whole worke ioyned beauty & profit together. But there is yet another excellencie worthy of great admiration, in that he hath not onely beautified this body with so goodly a shape as we see it hath, but hath also endued it with vertue and abilitie to make other bodies altogether like it selfe, as we heard yester day. Wherefore men shew indeede, that they know nothing of the excellencie of their nature, and that they haue altogether forgotten, or at leastwise very ill considered of that instruction, which God hath giuen them by the composition of their bodies, but principally by the soule that is lodged therein, if despising celestiall and eternall things for which they are created, they affect and seeke after earthly and transitorie things, preferring the earth before heaven, as commonly they doe. Which is all one as if they declared openly, that they are displeased that G O D hath made them men, and not beastes ramping on the earth, or marching vpon all foure, and turning their snoute alwaies downeward, because they haue nothing in them that fauoureth of a diuine and celestiall nature as man hath: and so they deale no otherwise then as if they would reproch God for that honour, which hee hath bestowed vpon them, by creating them differing from brute beastes, vnto whome notwithstanding they had rather be like. But enough is spoken of this matter. And seeing we may be sufficiently instructed by all our former discourses, what are those principall partes, powers and offices of the soule. I meane the animall vitall and naturall vertues, as also what instruments they haue in mans bodie, let vs now looke into the life and death thereof, and consider more narrowly then hitherto we haue done, what are the causes both of the one and the other.

Who they be that know not themselves.

Whether the life of the body can proceede either of the matter, or of the composition forme, and figure, or of the qualities thereof, or else of the harmony, coniunction and agreement of all these: whether any of these or all of them together can be the soule: of the length and shortnesse, of the diuers degrees and ages, and of the end of mans life: of death and of the cause: both of life and death: of the difference that is betweene natural and supernatral Philosophy in the consideration of things. Chap. 74.

AMANA. Iesus Christ purposing to teach vs, that we cannot haue life but in him, and by him, who is the life, & who hath the words of eternall life, compareth himselfe to a Vine, and his disciples vnto Branches. For the branch hath life and vigour, and beareth fruit, so long as it remaineth in the vine, and receiueith nourishment from thence, so if it receiueith no sap from thence, or if it be cut off, it withereth and dieth. We may say the same of the members of the body, if the soule be not in euery one of them, & if it giue not life, vertue, & vigour to them all for the performance of their offices. For if it fall out so, that it withdraweth it selfe altogether from any one part of the body, that part is without life: as we see by experience in a member dried vp, or putrified, or cut off from the body. And so is it with the whole body, when the soule is separated from it. But we are to handle this matter more at large. By our former discourses we may learne the nature both of the soule & of the body what is that vnion & coniunction which they haue together, albeit their natures, substances, and essences are diuers and very different: also we haue learned that the one of them, namely the spiritual essence, is a great deale more excellent then the other, which is corporal. Wherefore wee may well conclude, that the life in the body proceedeth not of the matter wherof it is made, nor of the qualities ioyned vnto it, nor yet of the composition, forme and figure thereof. For if the life and soule were in the matter of the body, the larger and greater mens bodies were, and the more matter they had in them, the more life and soule, the more wit, spirit and vnderstanding should be in them. But wee see by experience that it is farre otherwise, and that there is no more life and soule in a great body then in a little. And if it were so that the life proceeded from the matter, a dead body should be as well a man, as a liuing body. VVe may say the same both of the qualities ioyned to the matter according to the nature of the elements, as also of that confirmation and agreement that is betweene all the members both within and without. And as for the harmony, coniunction & concord that floweth from the diuersitie of these qualities, and from their temperatue, it may bee increased and diminished, Wherefore that cannot but be the effect of nature, which causeth a thing to be that which it is, and giueth vnto the same thing his forme & kind, that continueth alwaies in his estate & natural dispositiō. For if it were otherwise, the nature of kinds might be changed, which neuer any of the Philosophers did so much as imagine, or thinke to affirme. And as for the composition & figure of the body, there is yet lesse reason to say it commeth from thence, forasmuch as that continueth the same in a dead body which it was in a liuing. Againe, those liuing creatures, that resemble most the nature & forme of the members of mans body, & the matter thereof, are often times farther off from the nature of humane sense & vnderstanding, then they that do lesse resemble the. Which we may easily know by considering the nature of a Hog & of an Elephant. For they that through want & famine haue bin cōtrained to eate mans flesh, haue testified that no flesh or meate whatsoever approacheth neerer in tast, or is more like it then the flesh of a Hog. And if we consider the inward members and parts, there is no beast, if we wil giue credit to them that haue had the experience thereof, that hath them liker to those in man, then the Hog hath, both for substance, disposition, forme and figure. Contrariwise, wherein doth the Elephant resemble man either for forme or composition of body, or of the members both internall and externall, in comparison of a Hog? And yet there is no beast more teachable then the Elephant. or approacheth neerer to the sense & vnderstanding of man: as on the other side there is no beast further off in this respect, nor more hard to be taught, & more brutish, then is the Hog, And if any man thinke that the industry & docilitie of an Elephant proceedeth, either from the greatnesse of the matter whereof it is made, or from the abundance of the qualities ioyned vnto the matter, or from the harmony, coniunction & concord that is betweene them, or lastly, from the composition, forme and figure of his body & of the members thereof, we will oppose vnto him the Ant, which is one of the least among the creatures of the earth, as the Elephant is the greatest of all, as farre as we know. The like may be said of the Bee. For, are there many creatures although greater in substance, that yet haue such industrious and iagenious natures, as these little beasts haue, that are to be reckoned among the smallest of them? And by this it appeareth plainly, that the soule of beasts is of some other substance and nature then their bodies, notwithstanding there is great difference betwixt the soule of beasts and the soule of men. But we haue further to note touching the soule of man, that the spirit doth not onely not follow the nature of the body, but which is more, governeth, carrieth and recarrieth it whether it pleaseth: yea, it withstandeth the affections, which approach neere to the corporall and terrestriall nature. And as for the faculty of sense and of the senses, it is a vertue that surpasseth all bodily power and vertue, & all things depending of the body, so that there is no facultie of the body that is able to expresse the actions thereof. VVhat shall we say then of the vertue of vnderstanding, which is the highest and most soveraigne facultie that is in man? Which we cannot say is a body compounded of matter and forme. For that thing is the fountaine and originall of life, which first mooueth a liuing creature to the workes belonging vnto life. So that when we enquire what this fountaine & spring is, then doe we seeke to know what the soule is. Now wee may soone know by that which hath beene spoken, what the soule is not: but as yet we cannot perceiue what the proper substance and nature thereof is. And indeede it is not that which wee haue to speake of at this time, hereafter wee may say somewhat of that matter. Let it suffice for this present, that we know that the true cause of the life of the body, in regard of second causes, is in the soule next vnto God, who is the first and principal cause of all things. Therefore it is he that hath ordained & limited to every liuing creature his appointed time wherein to liue and to grow, and next to decrease and to die: and as it pleaseth him either to prolong or to abridge their life, so doth he dispose of the second causes and meanes wherby he wil haue it brought to passe. VVherfore although every one hath his certaine bounds and terme of life set him, yet none but God onely can attaine to the knowledge thereof. For all come not to the last age, which he hath appointed to be the ordinary end of every ones life, following those degrees into which it is diuided, according to that diuision which wee make of daies and yeares. For the infancie of man may bee resembled to the mourning and to the spring time of the yeare: mans age to midday and to the sommer: olde age to the Euening and to Autumne: & death to night and to winter. Therefore Iob saith very well speaking of man, the number of his moneths are with thee: thou hast appointed his bounds, which he cannot passe. Now if it be demaunded what is the ordinarie terme of life appointed by God we are to know, that nature by the ordinance of God appropriateth the matter beeing in the

the forme of members, vnto the soule, that is to giue life vnto the whole body. Now when the soule is entred into it and hath taken possession thereof, by little and little it prepareth and maketh fit the internall instruments, vntill at length it hath brought them to that perfection, which the qualitie, constitution and composition of the matter is able to receive & to beare. And after these instruments are come to their greatest perfection by vse they waste & consume away, returning by little and little vnto their first nature, & so in the end wholly corrupt and die. Thus you see how the members are appropriated in the body of the mother, how the spirits and humours are fitted in the time of infancy: after which the flower of age in youth is, as it were, the vigour and vse of the perfection of the instruments, and olde-age is the decreasing age, wherein they decay continually and become worse and worse, even vntill they come to their corruption, which is death. And this death we call naturall, when following this course it attaineth without violence to these bounds. Now although this be no long course, yet there are but very few that holde out to the vttermost end thereof, in regard of them that stay by the way: of whom some are cut off, even before they have begunne their course, others presently after they have begun it, and some in the mid-way: & that through so many sorts of sickenneses with other inconueniences and accidents that a man cannot possibly comprehend or conceiue them all. Therefore Dauid said long since, that the time of our life is three score yeeres & ten, and if they be of strength, foure score yeeres: yet their strength is but labor & sorrow: for it is cut off quickly, and we flee away. And after he hath compared man to a streame of water carried violently away, to a Morning dreame, to the grasse that flourisheth and groweth in the Morning, and in the Euening is cut down & withereth, he giueth the reason of all this, saying, for we are consumed by thine anger, and by thy wrath are we troubled. Thou hast set our iniquities before thee, and our secret sins in the light of thy countenance: for all our dayes are past in thine anger: we haue spent our yeeres as a thought. Iob also agreeth well, Tob 14.1.3. with Moses in this point when he saith, Man that is borne of a woman is of short continuance, and full of trouble. He shooteth forth as a flower, & is cut down, he vanisheth also as a shadow, and continueth not. Now it is certain, that if we looke to the causes of the life & death of men laid down by vs, we shall thinke that all this is done naturall, and that there is a certaine order of nature, vnto which we must all be subiect, & a naturall necessitie which none can eschew. But we see that Moses mounteth a loft, and searcheth higher for the cause: for hee seeketh it in God and in his determination, yea in his wrath conceived against our sinnes. Therefore the children and seruants of God, that haue bene instructed in his word, doe not only consider of that in death, which prophane men holde there: but they mount vpon to this highest cause, and behold therethe wrath of God against sin, and against all mankind for the same. So that we may know by that way which hath bin said, what difference there is betweene humane and naturall Philosophie, and that which is diuine and supernaturall: and wherein they deceiue themselves, that stay altogether in naturall Philosophie. And hereby also wee may learne the cause why so many become Atheists and Epicures thereby, whereas it should serue them in place of steps and degrees to cause them to ascend vp to that Philosophie that is supernaturall and heauenly. For their noses are altogether poring in this base kitchen, of which we haue intreated in our former discourses: as though God had not created men for another life and end, then he hath done beasts. Whereupon we may imagine, what true ioy and consolation they can haue, I say, not only in death, but also throughout their whole life, seeing their life, will they, nill they, must passe through so many dangers and miseries. For whether they will or no, they must bee subiect to this sentence passed from God against all mankind, in the person of our first parents, when he said to Adam, Cursed is the earth for thy sake, in sorrow shalt thou eate of it all the daies of thy life. Thorns also and thistles shall it bring forth to thee, and thou shalt eate the herbe of the field. In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eate bread, till thou returne to the earth, for out of it wast thou taken, because thou art dust and to dust shalt thou returne. Therefore Eliphaz saith in the booke of Iob, that miserie proceedeth not out of the dust, and that affliction buildeth not out of the earth. Which is as much to say, as that the cause of barrennes of ground proceedeth not from the earth, but from the sinne of man. Wherefore men cannot lay the blame vpon any other beside themselves, as beeing the cause of all the evils which they suffer, because they beare the matter of them in themselves. Now if any think, that this sentence pronounced by God against all mankind is not so much executed vpon the wicked that are without God, as vpon others, because we see comonly that they are richest, and liue in greatest ease, in pleasures and in delights, wee must know that they are not therefore exempted from those miseries, whereunto the life of man is subiect, & which are all comprehended prehended vnder this sweate of the face mentioned in the holy Scriptures. For there is no one of them to be found, that can so saue himselfe, but that he hath alwaies his part & portion in these things. And if we could consider well the whole course of their life, who seeme to be the happiest amongst them, and had the patience to waite vntill the end of their race, should find by experience the truth of that we speake of. But let vs goe on with our speeces, touching the causes of the length and shortnes of this bodily life, and of naturall death, as also of that which is violent, whereof wee haue not yet spoken. Also let vs consider of the things that are chiefly required for the vpholding of this bodily life, and without which it could not consist. This then shall be the matter subiect, of which thou. ARAM, shalt take vpon thee to discourse.

Of the causes generally of the length and shortnes of bodily life: of naturall and of violent death: in what manner the life of man consisteth in his breath: of the principall things required to life, and without which it cannot be: of the difference betwixt the life of man, and the life of beasts: of the image of the spiritual death in the corporal of the true comfort which we ought to haue therein. Chap. 75.

Nothing abideth still in the same state.

A*RAM*. This law was laide vpon nature by God the Creatour thereof that the things which it should bring forth in this inferiour world, should haue small beginnings at the first, and after grow by little and little, and when they were come to their full greatnesse should stand a while at a stay, and then fall by little and little, and returne to their originall and first beginning: as we see a patterne hereof and an example twise a day in the Ocean sea. For after it is mounted vp to the highest, and hath spred it selfe in length & breadth as much as it may, it returneth againe vnto the fountaine and wombe from whence it came, and there closeth vp it selfe. For God hath compassed it with certaine bounds beyond which it cannot passe. So likewise euery thing hath his course & set time of continuance: neither doe we see any thing vnder the Moone, either of the works of God, or of the inventions of men, which keepeth not his course. And so is it with the body, which being created by little and little, decayeth after the same manner, as it were by the same degrees by which it mounted vpward. And that which we see in euery particular body, the same we perceiue to be in the whole frame and course of the world, & in al the estates thereof. For the world hath had his infancie, next his youth, then his mans estate, & now he is in his old-age. For we see how all things decline daily, and continually waxe worse, as it were approaching to their end. In like maner if we would consider the course of al Common wealths, Principalities, Kingdomes, and Empires, & of all the great and chiefest Monarchies, that euer were from the creation of the world, we should find that al of them were very smal & weak in their beginnings, and that afterwards they increased and mounted vp vntill they came to their highest degrees: and after they had attained thither, they descended and fell by little and little continually, vntill in the end they were wholly ruinated. Now the first causes of all these things proceeding from God and from his eternall counsell, we know that the second causes are in the nature of euery thing that hath beginning and must end, & chiefly in the nature of mens bodies.

By our former speech wee haue learned already how this corporall life consisteth in the preservation of those instruments which the soule vseth in the body: and that the chiefest of them is heat, the second moysture agreeable to the heate, which must needs haue some thing to feede it and keepe it in a moderate stay. Lastly wee learned, that the nourishing and cherishing of the heate is the preservation of the moysture: and therefore those liuing creatures that are best able to maintaine and keepe these two qualities within themselves, are of longest continuance in life. So that the chiefe naturall cause of the long continuance of life, consisteth in euery mans composition, namely if it bee hot and moist by due proportion, both in the sinewes and in the marrow, in the liquors and humors, and in the spirits. The second cause consisteth in the long continuance of this temperature, which beeing interrupted and marred by diseases, the instruments of life are thereby also spoiled, & so they failing, life it selfe must needs cease. Whereupon death ensueth: euen as when the instruments and tooles of some handicraftes man are worne and faile him, it cannot be but that his arte and occupation should also bee at an ende. So that death is a defect of those instruments of the soule, whereby life is prolonged. For the soule leaueth the bodie by reason of the defect of instruments, and not for any

The cause of the length of life.

What death is any disagreement that is betweene the body and it, as may appeare by this, that it was not any proportion or agreement that ioyned the soule and the body together. For albeit a worke man vseth his instruments, yet there is no proportion and agreement betweene him and them, in regard of the matter and forme of him and of his tooles: vnlesse peradventure this proportion may be imagined to be betweene the arte of the Workeman, as hee is a Workeman, and the theaptnesse of the tooles hee vseth, whereby it is made fit for the doing of that which the Workeman hath in hand. Seeing then all life consisteth both in heate, as we haue already said, and also in moisture requisite for the heate, wee call that naturall death, when heat faileth, by reason that the moisture is dried vp, through the heat that drinketh it vp, which heate also in the ende vanisheth away, euen as a lampe doth when the oyle of it is consumed. But that is called a violent death, when through some accident, either the moisture is drawne out of the body, or the heat is put out and extinguished either by some inward, or els some outward oppression and violence. Internal violence is either by poison, or by gluttony and drunkenness, or by such excesse: as when a lampe goeth out because there is too much oyle powred into it. And if this oppression be done outwardly, it is called externall, as when the aire and breath that refresheth the heart, is shut vp and retained, either in the sharpe artery, or in the mouth. For it is as if a fire were suddenly couered and choked by some great heape of stones, or of earth, or of ashes laid vpon it. We heard before, that if the lungs had no respiration by the mouth and nostrils, no man could breath, but he should be choked by and by: as we see it by experience in them that are strangled. The reason hereof is, because the pipe that reacheth from the Lungs to the throat, is so closed vp, that it is altogether stopt, or at least, so narrow and strait, that there is not space enough for the aire and breath to passe in and out by. We see also daily how this windepipe is troubled, if whiles we eat or drinke, there fall into it a litle crumb of bread, or meat, or else a drop of water, or of wine, or of any other drinke, yea, although it were but a litle drope of our owne spittle. For the breath that ascendeth vp from the lungs by this pipe, will not suffer any other thing to enter in thereat, except it be as subtil and thinne as the aire is, but it driueth it vpward, insomuch as when this happeneth to any man, hee is in great paine and as it were stifled for the time. We see the like also in the cough. For, from whence proceedeth it but onely of those distillations that descend from the braine vnto the lungs by this pipe? And truly the consideration of all this, ought to be vnto vs in place of another speciall testimonie of the infirmitie of our nature, that wee may alwaies learne the better by this to humble our selues. For what an excellent gift is this life, which God hath giuen to man? and yet a matter of nothing will depriue him of it. For let his breath onely bee taken away, which is but a litle winde, and behold he is stifled and dead by and by. And for the taking away of his breath, and so of his life withall, there needeth nothing else but the stopping of his mouth and nostrilles, or of his windepipe onely, which is soone done, and hee is dispatched presently without all helpe and remedy by man. Therefore Esay hath a good speech: Depart (saith hee) from the man whose breath is in his nostrilles: for wherein is hee to be esteemed? In a word, his meaning is, that man is but as it were a litle winde and blast, as if hee had his life in his nostrilles, and as if it were as easie a matter to take away his life as his breath. Moreover, the mixture and temperature of all the elementarie qualities, and of all the humours is so necessary for life, as we haue already heard, that if any one be wanting, our life cannot continue. But the chiefest & most necessary of all, are heat & moisture placed in the the blood, which is so necessary for the maintenance of life, that after it is out of the body, death followeth presently.

Concerning the members of the body, it hath bene told vs already, that there are some of them without which the body cannot keepe life, nor be kept therein amongst which the heart is the chiefest of all, for the reasons which wee haue already heard. Now these things standing thus, we must consider what difference there is betweene the death of bruite beasts, and that of man: namely this, that the soule of beastes perisheth vtterly in their death, as doth the vigour of mens senses in the death of man. But the soule of man surviveth after the death of his body, and continueth alwaies in being and in life. For, considering that beastes doe in this life all that can bee done by them according to those gifts, which they haue receiued of nature, therefore they lue and die here altogether, having nothing bestowed vpon them for another better life. But forasmuch as G O D hath giuen vnto man a diuine and immortall spirit, which hath here great impediments and cannot well exercise all his offices, it is requisite that it should haue an other life wherein it may display all the vertues it hath, and enioy whatsoever GOD hath prepared for it, euen that which is most agreeable and proper to the nature thereof. Wherefore we may say, that the death of man is a separation, or a departure of the soule from the body wherein GOD propoundeth vnto vs a perfect image of our separation and departure from him, which commeth by the meanes of sinne. For we see what becommeth of the body when the soule is gone from it, and what it is during the time that it is ioyned therewith. The difference is very great. Let vs then propound our soule, as if it were in the place of the body, and imagine that God were in steade of the soule in it, as we see the soule is in the body. Then let vs consider what might bee the estate of the soule both when it is ioyned with God, and when it is separated from him. For there is greater difference betwene the soule separated from God, then betwene a body separated from his soule. Forasmuch as there is no body so stinking nor so infected, when it is separated from the soule, as the soule is when it is separated from God, if wee will compare spirituall things with corporall things. And contrariwise we may iudge of the estate thereof when it is ioyned with God, by the estate of a body ioyned with his soule, and by that difference which is betwene a dead body and a quicke.

Now if wee would well consider these things, and compare the corporall death of the body with the spirituall death of the soule, we would abhorre sinne in greater measure then we doe, and bee more affraide of it then of any thing that may come vnto vs. For there is nothing either in heaven or earth, that can hurt vs but sinne: as in deede nothing can bring dammage to vs, but that which can hurt the soule. But it is sinne onely that is able to hurt the soule, because by it those meanes are taken away from the soule, wherby God befloweth spirituall life vpon it. Therefore we ought not to thinke that bodily death can any way hurt the soule, vnlesse it be in regarde of the euill life past. It is true, that seeing GOD, hath created man to be of such a nature, as to be compounded of a body and of a soule, and that his true and perfect estate consisteth herein that they should liue vnitied and ioyned together, it is very like that there is some euill in the seuering of them asunder, especially if any of them corrupt and perish, and the euill may seeme to be doubled, if both of them should corrupt and perish, as many Epicures and Atheists would haue it. For if it be euill to haue but halfe a being, the euill and imperfection is much more, not to be at all, seeing there is nothing more goodly or more excellent then to haue a being. And if it be an excellent thing to bee, then to be well, is a farre more goodly and excellent thing. For therein consisteth the perfection and absolute felicitie of man. Now there is no sound or perfect estate of any man, but only that in which, and for which God created him. And although man be fallen from that estate, yet hath pleased GOD not onely to restore him againe therunto by his Sonne Iesus Christ, but also to make it vnto him more entire & more perfect, yea much more sure & stedfast then it was in the beginning. For this cause, if besides the benefit of creation we consider also that of regeneration, and of the restauration & repairing of man, we shall find therein ample matter of true and sound consolation against death. For we knowe that this tabernacle of our body, which is infirme, faulty, corruptible, fraile and tending to putrefaction, shall be destroyed & as it were pulled downe, to the end, that afterwards it may be restored vnto a perfect, firme, incorruptible and celestiall glorie. We see that by death we are called backe againe fro a miserable exile, to the end that we may dwel in our countrey, euen in our heauenly countrey. In a worde, we are assured by death to enioy such a blessed and permanent estate, as the like whereof appeareth no where vpon the earth. And if the brute beastes, euen the insensible creatures as Saint Paul teacheth vs, as wood & stone, hauing some sence of their vanity & corruption, doe waite for the day of iudgement that they may be deliuered from the same: shall not we be very miserable, hauing both some light of nature, and also boasting that we are inspired with the spirit of GOD, if wee doe not lift vp our eyes about this earthly corruption, when the question is concerning our beeing? Shall we not contemne and disdain the vanitie of the world, to aspire after the good being of the immortalitie to come? Let vs know then that we cannot finde any true and sound consolation without this consideration and hope which is most assured to them that beleue in Christ Iesus. Therefore they that went not beyond the boundes of naturall Philosophy, could neuer enioy any true consolation, either against the miseries of mans life, or against corporall death. And though they beleued, that altogether with the body whatsoever is in man, was extinguished, or otherwise that after the death of the body, the soule remaineth maineth immortall, yet notwithstanding, some haue done nothing else but mourne and complaine in this life, insomuch as they haue laid violent hands, as it were, vpon Nature, reuiling her and caling her the stepmother, rather then the mother of mankind: and others haue doubted of their future estate and condition, not being able to learne and know whether their soules should liue either in ioy and rest, or els in paine and torment, but onely by opinion. Of which if we would discourse at large, and consider particularly of their reasons. we should be confirmed more and more in that true consolation, that ought to be in the heart of euery Christian against the horror of death. Therefore I greatly desire ACHITO B, to heare thee discoursing vpon this matter.

Of the chiefe consolations, which the wisest amongst the Pagans and Infidels could drawe from their humane reason and naturall Philosophy against death: of the blasphemies vsed by Atheists and Epicures against God and Nature: what Nature is, and who they be that attribute vnto it that which they ought to attribute vnto God. Chap. 76.

ACHITO B. Trees haue their seasons, in which they beginne to bud, and afterwards doe blossome: which blossome in convenient time taketh the forme and fashion of the fruit, and after that it continueth growing, vntill it becommeth ripe: and being come to the greatest maturitie and ripenes that it can haue, it falleth down of it selfe, and still consumeth more and more. The same may be said of leaues. But this happeneth not to all, nor yet altogether after the selfe same maner to all those to whom it doth happen. For some fruits perish euen in the very bud, or else in the flowre: & some after they are come to the fashion of fruit. And of these latter sort, some fade away sooner, some latter, according to their sundry accidents. For some are eaten by wormes, other by noisome flies, and some through diuers kinds of creeping things, which bred in the fruit it selfe. Againe, some are shaken downe violently, either through great and mightie showres, huge stormes, blustering windes or els by haile and tempest, being plucked forcibly from the trees before they can come to any ripenes. By all which things God propoundeth vnto vs, a goodly picture and representation of the whole course of mans life, yea, of all estates & conditions of men in the world, both generally and particularly. For although in our former speech we heard what order nature vsually followeth in naturall things, and namely, in that which respecteth the estate of Empires and Monarchies, yet if we looke well into it, we shall there find also this very difference, which we haue obserued to be betwixt naturall death, & that which wee call violent death. For as amongst men all come not to the vitermost of olde age, but many are slaid by the way, so is it with estates. We see some men ascende vp through all degrees, euen vntill they attaine to the highest: and then by the same degrees descend againe, vntill they come to the end and period of all. But wee see others that are stayed in ascending, or if they come to the highest degree are suddenly throwne downe. Moreover, among those fruits which attaine to maturity and ripenesse, all haue not one and the selfe same time of ripenesse, but every one hath his proper season: and those that are most forward and soonest ripe, are of shortest continuance, and quickly gone. This selfe same thing also we see to be obserued in the life of men, and in the course of this World. Wherefore if wee had no hope of another life besides this, our estate would be more miserable, not onely then the estate of beastes, but also then that of trees. For as trees decay yearely in regard of their flowers, fruits and leaues, so they are yearely renewed, whereas many men perish after that maner, that being once dead they shall neuer be raised and renewed againe to glory. For although they haue some opiniõ of an other life, yet by the certaintie of faith they do not apprehend the fruition of eternal happines, which is prepared for the blessed through the grace of Christ Iesus, they can neither liue nor die without some doubt of that which they desire most to be perswaded of.

When the greatest and most skilful Philosophers, the wisest & most vertuous personages that haue bin amongst the Heathen, went about to comfort either the selues, or their friends in their great afflictions, and chiefly in death, this was thought to be one of their strongest reasons, that the lawes of nature are unavoidable, and that it must bee so. For they had no hope of the resurrection of their bodies: as indeede it is a doctrine that humane Philosophy doth not vnderstand. And as for the immortalitie of the soule, albeit the best Philosophers & most learned men amongst them were of that opinion, which also was for the most part generally receiued of the people, yet they were neuer so assured thereof, but that still there remained some doubt in them, because they had no certaine knowledge of it, but onely so much as they could get by their naturall light & humane Philosophy. Therefore when such as excelled others amongst them laboured to comfort & strengthen men against the feare of death, and would perswade them that there was no euill in it, they vsed for their principall reason this disunctiue speech, saying: Either man is wholly extinguished by death, or else some part of him remaineth afterwards. If he perish altogether, so that nothing of him continueth still, then he feeleth no ill: and so death hurteth him not, but deliuereth him from all those euils whereunto he is necessarily subiect in this life. But if some part of him abideth stil, so that he die not altogether, then is death no death vnto him, or at leastwise, it is not euil vnto him, seeing his principal part, which is his soule, and in regard of which he is man, liueth and abideth whole and sound. Now these are very leane and slender consolations. For seeing God hath created man of that nature that he is compounded of body and soule, no doubt but his true & perfect estate consisteth therein, that these two natures bee vnited and linked together: as in deede they should haue done, had it not beene for the sinne of our first parents, who thereby brought vpon man both bodily and spirituall death. And it is against reason to thinke that a separation of these two natures so well knit together could be made, and that one of them should corrupt and perish, and all this without griefe. Now if they perish both together, the euill that followeth thereupon is the greater. For nothing can bee imagined to be more goodly and excellent then to haue a being. Now can any body call that thing excellent which ceaseth to bee, or which hauing a being, fadeth incontinently? But what an horreur is it to a man onely to thinke of death? And how much more will his horreur be increased, when hee shall thinke that hee must so vanish away by death, that no part of him afterward shall haue any more being, then if hee had neuer beene at all? And what profit ariseth to him that was neuer borne, more then to the brut beast? But yet the estate of this man is more miserable. For to what end should the reasonable soule serue, which God hath given him, as also the vnderstanding, reason, and all the other vertues wherewith God hath endued it aboue the soule of beastes, but to make him more miserable and wretched then if he had been created a beast? For seeing beastes haue no minde, vnderstanding, or reason, to conceiue and knowe what a benefit and gift of God it is to haue a being and to liue, they haue no such vehement apprehension, either of death as men haue, or of the losse of any good thing, which they are in danger to loose. And by this reason it followeth, that the more blockish and brutish men are, the lesse miserable they should bee: as contrariwise, the greater spirits they haue, and the more they acknowledge the excellency of mans nature, and those giftes wherewith God hath endued it, so much the more miserable and wretched should they bee, in steade of receiuing greater ioy and consolation. Whereupon it commeth to passe, that they are more ready to despise and blaspheme God, then to praise and glorifie him for those graces and benefits wherewith hee hath adorned mankind. We see how Epicures and Atheists, and all they that consider in man this present life onely, and go no further, draw neere to this point of which we speake. Therefore some of them say, that it were best for a man not to bee borne at all, or, els to die so soone as hee is borne. Others set themselues against nature and speake euill of her, saying, that she is, rather a badde step-mother then a good mother to mankind. And because they know not what GOD is, they set vpon Nature, through whose sides they wound him, speaking euill of him, and blaspheming him vnder this name of Nature. Thus you see what comfort and consolation they finde, who looke for no other life after this. And as for those other that haue but some bare motion and slender opinion of the immortality of soules, what greater ioy or contentation can they haue? Nay there are three things that doe greatly diminish their comfort. The first is, their doubting wherewith they are continually possessed, which hindereth them from hauing any assurance of the same. The second is the separation of the soule from the body, whereby they conceine and imagine, that the body doth so turne into corruption, as that it wholly perisheth without any hope of the resurrection thereof, or of conioyning it againe with the soule from which it was disioyned. The third is the ignorance of the estate of soules after this life. For albeit they were very certainly perswaded that our soules are immortall, yet they haue no assurance of their estate, neither know they whether whether they live in ioy and rest, or in paine and torment, but onely by opinion, as they esteeme by every ones merites, which they measure according to that knowledge they have and that iudgement which they are able to affoord of their vertues and vices. Therefore, whatsoeuer they thinke or hope, seeing they are not very sure and certaine, neither indeede can bee, if they haue no better assurance then by their naturall light and reason, they must needes be subiect continually to sorrow & grieve; which way soeuer they turne themselves. For if they are of opinion, that there are punishments for such as haue led an euill life in this world, who can assure them that they shall be exempted and freed thereof? For howsoeuer they labour to enforce (as it were) their conscience, and stricke neuer so much to rocke it on sleepe, and flatter themselves in their sins, yet it cannot afford them any such peace and quietnesse, as will altogether satisfie and content them.

And as for perswading themselves that there is no punishment for the wicked, they are neuer able to doe it. For the same naturall light and reason whereby they iudge soules to be immortall, doth likewise constraîne them to acknowledge, that there is a God a iust Iudge, who suffereth not euill unpunished, as also he will not passe by that which is good without accepting of it as it is. So that seeing they cannot assuredly know, that God will approue and receiue their works as good, or refuse them as euill, they must of necessitie be alwaies in feare, whatsoeuer they beleue. Therefore as the one sort endeavour with all their power to be perswaded of this that mens soules are mortall as well as their bodies, and that after death there remaineth no more of the one then of the other, thereby to deliuer themselves of this feare and of the torment that accompanieth feare: so the other sort that haue a better opinion of the immortality of soules, labour to perswade themselves that there is no hell nor punishment for soules after this life, but that they are onely Poeticall fictions and fables. But although Poets vsed fictions in that which they wrote of Hell, and of those infernall furies and torments, yet they deriued the ground and foundation of them from that testimony which God hath planted in the nature of vs all. So that none ought to flatter and seduce themselves by meanes of such opinions as ouerturne all nature: for that were to take away all difference betweene good and euill, vertue and vice, things honest and dishonest. For if there be no reward either for the one or for the other, or if all be one, it followeth either that there is no difference betwixt all these thing, or that there is no iustice in God. But both these are impossible, whereupon it must needes be concluded, that not only there is another life after this, but also that in the second life there is ioy, rest, & felicitie for the one, and grieve, paine and dolour for the other. Wherefore we must not thinke, that because the Kitchen and Nurserie of this mortall body is by the appointment and providence of God, ioined with the soule that is immortall and diuine, therefore there is no other life for man besides this bodily life, or that the soule which giueth life and mainteineth it in the body, is no more immortall then the body that receiue the same from it, and that the body in like maner ought not to expect another life after this. But I hope that these things shall hereafter be better declared vnto vs in those discourses, which we are especially to make touching the immortality of the soule. Now to ende this speech, forasmuch as in this and in our former discourses, we haue oftentimes made mention of Nature, which for the most part men ioine as companion with God, when they speake of the counsels of his providence over all things created, according to that common prouerbe, That God and nature haue made nothing in vaine, I say in this respect it shall be good for vs to know, what Nature is, to speake properly, & into what detestable error they fall, who attribute that to it, which appertaineth to God alone. And first they that vse this prouerbe might speake more directly & Christianly, if they attributed the whol to God only, not ioining vnto him nature for a cōpanion, as though he had need of her helpe, & could not well finish all his works alone, and as though he had not bin able to haue done all that he hath done without her. It may be, they will say, that they doe giue this honour vnto God, and that they speake not of Nature, as Galen, and many other Heathen Philistions and Philosophers, or rather Epicures and Atheists, do, who place Nature in God his stead: but that they speake of her as of a means created of God, by which he performeth all these things. But there is no such necessity to ioine Nature with God as his fellow worker. For when he created the first man, what Nature had he with him that did help him to make this worke? Besides, the very name of nature doth it not declare, that it is a thing borne and created, and so consequently hath her creation and birth from God as all other creatures haue? For if we take Nature for that diuine vertue and power which appeareth in the works of the creation, & in their preservation & order, we must of necessity take it, not for a thing that is borne and bred of others, but that giueth birth and being vnto others. And if we take it so, then God and nature shall be taken to be all one. Wherefore in this respect it were better to let the name of Nature alone: and to speake of God onely, to whome Nature is but a seruant, and seeing that by him it was created, and that all things were made before Nature had her being. Otherwise wee are like to fall into that error of Galen and others his like in these daies, who albeit they bee conuicted and rauished with admiration, through the contemplation of those wonderfull workes, which they beholde in all the parts and powers of mans bodie, are notwithstanding so vngratefull, that in steade of yeelding vnto God that honour that belongeth vnto him, it seemeth they would despite him to his face, and seeke all possible meanes to put out their owne eyes, and wholly to blinde their vnderstandings, to the end they might not bee constrained to acknowledge that there is a God, the Creator and maker of this so excellent a piece of worke, and so, to glorifie him as becommeth them. Now rather then they would giue him his honour, they would make an idole of Nature, thereby to cast a vile before mens eyes, that they should not see and acknowledge God in his workes. They will rather put their owne eyes then follow this nature, which they forge vnto themselues as a soueraigne Mistresse, whereas she is but the meanes to leade them to God her and their Creatour, of whome she is but a seruant, and a very small image.

What we are to iudge of Nature.

Thus much I thought meete to bee knowne, concerning Nature, that we might learne to speake better and more reuerently both of God and of his workes, and that we might know that Nature is nothing else but the order and continuance of the workes of God. Now that we are instructed in the causes of life and death, and what true comfort and consolation we may haue against the horror thereof; and so haue finished our discourses concerning the frame of the body, and of the powers and faculties of the soule therein, wee must enter into a particular contemplation of the nature of the soule, and learne what is the creation and immortality thereof so farre forth as the minde of man is able to comprehend, and as the word of truth shall affoord vs sure and certaine doctrine thereof. First, then it is necessary and very profitable for vs to consider, that there is but one soule in one body, which hath all those powers and vertues of which the effects are daily seene: also what place the soule hath in the body, and what vnion there is betweene them. Now A S E R, this shall be that matter subiect which thou shalt haue to continue our speech withall.

That there is but one soule in euery seuerall body: that one and the same soule hath in it all those vertues and powers, whose effects are daily seene: of the seat of the Soule in the body, and of the principall instrument thereof: of the vnion of the body and Soule: of the diuers degrees of nature, and of the excellencie that is in it: of the fountaines and bounds of all the powers and vertues of the soule. Chap. 77.

A S E R Saint Paul maketh a prayer in the end of his first Epistle to the Thessalonians, which agreeth very well both to that matter whereof we haue already intreated, touching the nature as well of the soule as of the body, and to that also which wee haue yet to handle concerning the nature, creation, and immortality of the soule. Now the very God of peace (saith he) sanctifie you throughout: and I pray God that your whole spirit, and soule, and body, may be kept blamelesse vnto the comming of our Lord Iesus Christ. Where first he sheweth vs, that none but God, who onely is holy, sanctifieth vs through Iesus Christ his sonne the most Holy, and that by the vertue of his holy spirit. Moreover he teacheth vs, that as we are to acknowledge all sanctification alreadie begun in vs to proceede from God alone, so wee must expect from him the accomplishment of that worke, which he hath begun in vs. For as he is the beginning, so from him must proceede the perfection, which comprehendeth all the partes of man. Therefore the Apostle heere maketh a diuision of three members placing the spirit first, in the second place the soule, and in the third the body. Then he teacheth vs, that the entire and absolute sanctification of all these parts of man shall be in the comming of Iesus Christ, in which it shall obtaine the last perfection. Now we vnderstand stand already sufficiently by our former discourses, that man is compounded of two diuers natures, namely, of a body and of a soule: and yet heere wee see that Saint Paul setteth downe three parts, and ioyneth the spirit vnto the soule, as if they were two diuers and different things, aswell as the soule and the body are. Therefore we must search out of the cause of this diuision of man after this manner. But before wee enter into this matter, it shall be very profitable for vs to refresh our memory with those things we haue already intreated of, so farre forth as they may serue for the vnderstanding of this, and that according to the matter subiect propounded to discourse vpon.

Wee heard before how the body is the lodging and instrument of the soule, and how the soule serueth it selfe with all the members thereof, and setteth them on worke. And as for the Soule, albeit there be but one in each seuerall body, neuerthelesse that one soule hath diuers faculties, powers and vertues, which wee also call partes and offices thereof. Wherefore as wee say not, that there are so many bodies in one body of a man, as there is diuersitie of partes, members and offices therein, but account them all ioyntly together, as one and the same body: euen so wee meane not that there are so many soules, as there are powers and offices in the Soule, or according to that varietie of effects that appeareth in every part and member thereof, albeit wee know very well, that they are distinguished one from another both in time and place. For we perceiue by the effects thereof, that the sight is in the eyes, hearing in the eares, vnderstanding and cogitation in the braine, and the like is to be said of all the other partes and members of the body, according to the nature and office of euery one, and according to the offices of the Soule in them: as wee haue already shewed when we handled all the powers thereof particularly. Moreouer wee see how the child, so long as it is in the Mothers wombe, differeth almost nothing at all from plants: and after it is borne, how it differeth but a little from brute beastes, as else where it hath bene already declared vnto vs. Neuerthelesse, as in every body there is but one and the same kind, fashion and essentiall forme of nature, whereby it commeth to be that which it is: so there is but one onely Soule in every liuing creatures body, by which it doth liue, but yet this soule is distinguished according to the vertues and offices thereof. Wherein it falleth out with the soule as it doth with a man that hath many charges and offices, or that exerciseth many Artes and occupations, which he practiseth in seuerall places, at sundry times, and by diuers instruments and seruants. Yea, the very variety of those instruments which the soule vseth, and the repugnance that is betweene the actions thereof, doe shew manifestly that there is but one workemaster from whom the whole proceedeth, and which gouerneth and moderateth all, as a liuing creature ought to doe. For there could not be so great agreement in such diuersitie, if there were diuers workmen, and so many soules as there are effects and actions in all the parts of man. Besides, if there were such diuersitie of kinds of all things, as there is diuersitie of effects, the number of them would be infinite: whereupon there would great confusion follow in the searching out of nature, and of naturall things. Therefore seeing there is but one soule in every body, we must learne whether it hath any certaine place and seate in the body, or whether the whole body be the lodging for it. Now as every forme of each body is in the whole body, so the soule is wholly in the whole body, in which the true forme and principall essence of man consisteth. For if there were any part thereof that had no soule within it, that part should haue no life: as we see it by experience in a member that is dry, or putrified, or cut off from the body. So that as an Husbandman hath his sundry instruments for the trimming of the ground, and by them effecteth diuers works, according to the vse of each seuerall instrument: so fareth it with the soule in the body. For the Husbandman worketh another worke with his Plough, then he doeth with his Harrowes, and otherwise with his Spades and Shouels then with the other aboue named instruments: so that according to the diuersitie of his tooles he worketh diuers workes. And yet all this while there are not so many Husbandmen as there are sundry instruments, but one alone vseth all these to serue his turne. And he that should demaund in which of all his instruments an Husbandman were, should he not (thinke you) moue an impartinent question? For hee may bee both with his instruments, and also without them: and when he vseth them, he applieth them to himselfe, and himselfe vnto them. And to aske which of his instruments is the chiefest, were not to speake very much to purpose. For every one of them is principall in his vse, and for that worke whereunto it is applied: and so it is with the Soule, and with the instruments thereof. For it can be both with them, and without them, in that maner that hath bene already declared. And as the

562 That there is but one soule in euery body,

Plough is the chiefe instrument which the Husbandman hath to cut and deuide the ground into furrowes, and the Pickaxe to digge in hard places, so the eye is the chiefe instrument the soule hath for seeing, the eare for hearing, the brayne with the thin, cleare, and bright spirits therein, for all kinde of vnderstanding and knowledge, and the heart for the fountaine of life. Now because the soule hath so many sundry powers, offices and actions, it is also taken in diuers senses and significations, but especially in the holy scriptures, as (God willing) we shall learne hereafter. In the meane time that vnion which it hath with the body, is marueilous, and ought to be diligently considered of vs. Wee are to know then, that all things whatsoeuer are ioyned together in nature, are alwaies so knit and vnited by some meanes: which meane consisteth either in this, that the essence of two extreames doe participate one of another, and ioyned together, or else in the agreement of action & of work. Now as the bond of the first meane is between the elements themselves, and also betweene them and that matter wherof bodies are compounded, because there is betweene them an agreement and participation of nature, euery one in his degree, according as they are neerer or further removed off one from an other: so we haue the bond of the second meane, betweene the body & the soule, namely, the agreement of action and worke. Let vs then consider of the coniunction and agreement that is betweene a workeman and his worke, together with those instruments whereby he effecteth his worke. For there is an agreement and coniunction betweene the painter and his picture, by reason of the pen-fill wherewith he worketh. And the like may bee said of all other workemen. Euen so the forme and kinde of all things is as it were the Workemaster in regard of the matter, and the qualities and fashioning of the matter, are the instruments whereby the Species or kinde of any thing is vnited and knit vnto the matter. Now the soule is ioyned to the body as light is vnto the aire. For by reason of the coniunction of the aire and light together, the aire is made cleare and lightsome: and yet the aire and light remaine whole and perfect without any mixture or confusion of the one with the other. For they are not mingled together as the elements are in naturall mixtures, or as hearbes that are beaten together into powder, or drugges of the Apothecary in a medicine, that lye mingled and confused one within an other. But the vnion and bond of two substances ioined together is a great deale more neere in other kindes and creatures then in the soule, wherein it is removed farther off, by reason that the nature of corporall things admitteth of a neerer coniunction and agreement among themselves, then there can be naturally betweene corporall and spirituall things. So that the greater agreement of natures there is, the straiter is the bond and vnion betweene them. Now we may know of what nature euery kinde of thing is by the offices and actions thereof. As if the question were touching to nature of that soule, which heretofore wee called the Nourishing and Vegetative Soule, it appeareth by the office and actions thereof that it is hote, and that it taketh part (as also all the actions thereof) of the nature of fire, which is the highest and purest element, and that which approacheth neere to the celestiall natures. But that kinde of soule, which we called Sensitive and Cogitative, such as it is in brute beastes, ascendeth yet higher and by agreement is linked neerer to the heauens, and to the nature of heauenly bodies. And therefore beafts haue not onely sense, but some kinde of knowledge also, whereby they doe in some sort marke and perceiue the course of the heauens, and heauenly bodies, and doe seeme after a sort to vnderstand them. For they haue knowledge both of the day and of the night, of Winter and of Summer, yea, they haue some sense and perseuerance of the alterations of seasons, according as they fall out by the course of the Spheres: but yet not by any such knowledge and vnderstanding as is in man. Now sense and knowledge cannot proceede of the power of the elements, but is deriued from some higher thing. For it is by meanes of a more excellent power that beafts are distinguished from plants, holding more of the excellencie of their Creator, declaring it a great deale more. But man he hemounteth vp much higher. For he ascendeth vp aboue all the heauens, euen vnto God and to those spirituall natures, by meanes of reason and vnderstanding, which make his soule capable of heauenly light and wisedome, and of diuine inspirations.

Whereupon it followeth that the originall birth of the Soule is celestiall. And therefore in this diuersitie of the faculties and powers of the soule and life of man, wee must note this, that the lower kindes of the soule and life are not the well-springs and fountaines of the highest, as if those powers and faculties did first set these latter aworking; or as if the highest, did spring of the basest, and receiued their vertues from them: but they are onely certaine certaine aydes and degrees of helpe, whereby the highest & chiefeft descend and ascend. So that the Vegetatiue and nourishing life and vertue, is not the originall of the senses, and sensitiue vertue, but onely a degree by which the facultie of sense is derined to the body, and by little and little ascendeth vp to her powers and offices. The like may bee said of the vnderstanding and of reason in regard of the sensitiue facultie. For every sort and kinde of life, and every power of the soule hath beginning of it selfe, and certaine bounds within which it is contained. Wherein we haue to consider a marvellous worke and providence of God in that he hath ioyned & linked together in man things that are so diuers. For we take this as granted, that the soule of man is a spirituall nature and not corporall, that it is immortall, and created for the contemplation of celestiaall and eternall things. On the other side wee see, how this so excellent and diuine a nature is ioyned to that part and power that is called Vegetatiue and Nourishing, which seemeth rather to bee corporall then spirituall, to be more terrestriall then celestiaall, and to bee as it were the Kitching of the bodies of liuing creatures, and the Store-house & Originall of their generation. So that there is no man of any sound minde, who knowing this marvellous coniunction of nature in things so diuers, and considering that it cannot come to passe by hap hazard and at aduenture, but he must needs be rauished with great admiration, and acknowledge an admirable providence of God the Creator and Lord of nature.

An admirable worke of God.

But they that are instructed in the holy word, and in the doctrine of the Church, haue yet a further consideration of these things. For they know well, that albeit the Kitchin of mans body shall haue no necessarie vse in the life to come, neuerthelesse God hath establi shed this order, and would haue it thus ioyned to the soule and spirit, to the end that those beginnings of eternall life, and of that true and perpetuall wisdom, which he hath put into vs should be kindled and inflamed in this mortall life. For they shall not shine forth in any there, who haue not here had some beginnings, but haue suffered those to bee cleane extinguished which they receiued of God. For this cause doth the voice of God and of his heavenly doctrine sound in mens eares, and to these endes hath bee ordeined that government, which ought to be amongst them, and hath bound and fortified it with many bonds and rampiers. Wherefore we stand in neede of doctrine of instruction and discipline, vnto which things the consideration of mans nature may greatly helpe vs. For there is no science or humane wisdom, how great soeuer it be, that is able to rehearse and comprehend the great profit, which this consideration can afford to men, euen so farre forth as they may very well learne and know. And of this we may the better be resolved, if we consider well of that which hath already bene handled: yea, wee may the better iudge hereof, if we perfectly vnderstand that diuision of man made by Saint Paul, and mentioned by vs in this discourse. Therefore AMANA, proceed you in the residue of this matter, giuing vs first to vnderstand, what is the nature and offices of those pure, animal, cleare and bright spirits, which we said were seruiceable to the soule for all kinde of vnderstanding and knowledge. Afterwards you may more easily instruct vs at large and teach vs, what difference there is not onely betweene the soule and the instruments thereof, whereby it worketh, but also betweene the instruments themselves, and their nature and offices, and which of them are neereft, or remoued farthest from the soule.

Why God hath ioyned the body to the soule.

The naturall knowledge of mans body very profitable.

Of the nature and varietie of the animall Spirits, and how they are onely instruments of the soule, and not the soule it selfe: of the nature of those bodies wherein the soule may dwell and worke: of the difference that is not onely betweene the soule and the instruments by which it worketh, but also betweene the instruments themselves, and their natures and offices, & which of them are neereft or farthest off: of the degrees that are in the vnion and coniunction of the soule with the body. Chap. 78.

A*MANA.* It is requisite that workemen should haue instruments answerable to those works which they are to make: and if they haue taken in hand but one single and simple worke, they neede but one tooke fit for that purpose: as to sawe timber, there needeth but a saw. But they that are to make many works, or one worke that is full of variety, stand in need of many instruments: as painters, ioyners, carpenters, masons, & such like. The same may be said of the soule: and therefore it hath many members in the body, that are giuen vnto it as instruments to serue for those works, which it hath outwardly to perform. Moreover, the soule hath humours to preserve and uphold the members, and to keepe them alwayes ready for their worke, by those meanes which we haue heard already: besides, it hath vital spirits of which the animall spirits are bred, which serue in steade of a light to gard and conduct it in the actions both of the externall and the internall senses. And as there is great force in a toole or instrument to cause a good or euill worke, so is there in the humours, spirits, and members of the body, whereby we are made fit to exercise and to execute all actions whether they concerne life and sense, knowledge and vnderstanding, or will and affections. For it fareth in this matter as it doth in the disposition of the aire, which the thicker and more obscure it is, the lesse cleere will the light appeare vnto vs: and contrariwise the more pure and thin it is, the brighter and more shining it will shew it selfe vnto vs.

Of the vitall
and animal spirits and of their operations

Now for this matter, wee must call to minde what wee heard concerning the generation of spirits both Vitall and Animall, in those discourses of the nature and office of the heart. And as they are thinne vapours, engendred of blood, concocted, and set on fire through the vertue of the heart, that they might bee as it were little flames, hauing diuers actions in diuers members: so according to the purity and impurity of the blood in the composition of the body, wee are to iudge of the spirites that proceede from them. And albeit they haue all one and the same fountaine, namely, the heart in which they are bredde, neuerthelesse they change according to those places and members wherein they worke, and beeing so changed, they haue diuers and seuerall actions. We vnderstand then by the Vitall spirit, a little flame bredde & borne in the hart of the purest blood, whose office is to carry naturall heate to the other members, and to giue them vertue & strength to put in practise those actions and offices, which exercise by the same heate. It hath beene tolde vs before, that the arteries serue to carrie this vital spirit to all the members. But wee are further to learne, that when the vitall spirits bredde in the heart, are in part transported to the braine, others are engendred of them, which are called Animall spirites, in that sence in which we called those Animall faculties and powers, from whence the Soule deriueth her vessels and instruments in the braine. For after the spirites sent by the heart, are come thither, they are made more cleane and bright through the vertue of the brayne, and agreeable to the temperament thereof: and then beeing infused into the brayne by meanes of the sinewes, they are in steade of a light whereby the actions of the senses are incited and stirred vp, as also those motions which are from place to place. And as we haue heard, that a good temperature of the bloode and of other humours doth much helpe forward and profite the manners and conditions of men, the same may bee said of the heart and of the spirites proceeding from the same. For when the heart is in good temper, so that it is not troubled either with anger, or sadnesse, or any other euill affection, it is manifest that the spirites are a great deale the better in the braine.

The effects
of the vitall
and animal
spirits in man.

Now let vs consider the wonderfull worke of God wrought in man by meanes of the vitall and animal spirits. For what are the chiefe actions effected in him? Are they not the preservation of life, nourishment, and generation: and then sense and motion, with cogitation and the affections of the heart? And what were all these things without spirits? Hence it commeth that in the holy Scriptures, the heart is taken for the fountaine, not onely of life, but also of all the actions of men, as it hath beene already declared vnto vs. And for this cause also some haue said, that these spirits, and litle Vitall and Animal flames were the soule it selfe, or the immediate instrument thereof, that is to say, the very next whereby it worketh immediatly, so that there is none betwixt them twaine. But the latter is more certaine and more agreeable to truth then the former. For if the soule were nothing else but the Vitall and Animall spirits, it should faile and perish with them, as the bodily life doth: and so it should not be immortall. But seeing they are but the instruments thereof, as the humors of the body are, and namely, the blood from which they proceede, the soule can well be without them: albeit they cannot be without it, and although it cannot without them performe the workes it doth with and by them. And forasmuch as God hath giuen them to be as it were a light, it is certaine that the light of these surmounteth the light of the Sunne, Moone, or Starres; and that all these lights haue great agreement one with another.

The vitall &
animal spirits are not the soule.

But

But it is yet a farre more wonderfull worke of God when not onely the soule vseth these instruments for the life of man, but also when the celestially spirit ioyneth it selfe vnto them, vsing them in the elect, and making them more cleare by his heavenly light, that the knowledge of God might be more euident, that their assurance and trust in him might bee more firme, and that all the motions of his children might be kindled the more towards him. So likewise the euill spirit knoweth well how to take occasion by the bad tempera- ture of the humours to abuse men as we haue already declared, thereby to set forward their ruine, when he possesseth the heart, troubleth and poisoneth the spirits in that and in the braine. Whereupon he attempteth to hinder reason and iudgement, to bring men to fury and madnesse, and to thrust forward their heart and their other members to commit foule and execrable facts. Whereof wee haue examples in the furie of Saul and in his death: in the death of Achisophel, of Indas, and of many others whom hee hath brought to slay themselves: as likewise in many other horrible facts daily committed by men. Therefore it is very requisite, that we should diligently consider our nature, and be carefull to gouerne and guide it well. We are to know that our spirits are the habitations of the holy spirit, and therefore we are to pray to God through his Sonne Iesus Christ, to repell and keepe backe euill spirits farre from vs, and to inspire his diuine and celestially spirit into our spirits, hearts and mindes, that it may guide and gouerne them. And this agreeth very fitly with that prayer, which we heard already vttered by Saint Paul, touching the entire sanctification of the whole man, whom he diuided into spirit, soule and body. So that, if we haue through- ly tasted of the former discourses, as wel concerning the nature of the body as of the soule, we may perceiue wherefore the Apostle hath thus diuided the whole man. For first, wee cannot doubt but that the soule being the principall Worker, is such a substance and nature as dwelleth in a body apt and meete to receiue life in. I speake this purposely, because all sorts of bodies are not capable of soule and life: and they that are capable, are not yet cape- able of euery kinde of soule and life, but onely of such as are agreeable to their nature ha- uing those instruments in themselves which may bee vsed by them according to their na- ture. Wherefore the soule of man must of necessitie haue another body, with other instru- ments and of another nature, then the soule of beasts may haue: and the soule of beastes another then the soule of plants, according as euery one of them differereth from other both in nature and offices. But of what nature soeuer either the soule or the body is, the soule hath this property like a busie workeman to be in the body, hauing all her instruments ther- in. Now when a workeman worketh with his tooles, he must haue within himselfe the ver- tue and skill to doe that which he doeth, because it is not in the instruments whereby hee worketh. For albeit they bee appropriated and fitted to the work that is wrought, yet of themselves they can doe nothing at all, except they be set on worke by the workeman, be- cause they haue not in them any vertue to worke. But this power and facultie is only in the workeman, to whom it belongeth to perfect his worke. So if the vertue of working were not in the soule, it could worke no more with instruments then without. Therefore albeit it see- meth that the naturall heat, the humours and the spirits worke in the body, and effect some- thing therein, yet we must know, that they doe nothing there of themselves, but that they receiue of the soule whatsoeuer they haue. As when a Painter draweth a picture, his pen- sill and colours haue it not of themselves to doe that which is done by them, but of the Painter. The soule then is the Workeman that worketh, receiuing her vertue and facultie of working not from without, but even in the selfe same body in which it is. Therefore to speake properly, we may say that she dwelleth in the body, because shee abideth therein, as in her house with all her implements and household instruments so that shee must needs haue the body appropriated and made fit vnto her nature. For euery soule cannot bee indiffe- rently ioined to euery forme and figure of a body, to exercise and execute therein the works of life: but it must worke by that order of nature, and according to those lawes which the Creator of all things hath ordeined from the beginning of the world. Whereupon we may note, that if we had no other reason but the consideration hereof, against the Pithagorical transmigration of soules from one body to another, it were sufficient to make knowne the greatnesse of this fopperie, and what error there is in that opinion. For if it were so, there would be no difference betwixt the soules of men, of beasts & of plants, neither should there be any propriety and aptnesse of body, and instruments more to one soule then to another. Whereupon all nature touching this point and order appointed by God herein, should bee confounded and ouerthrowne.

But to returne to our matter, forasmuch as the temperature of liquors, humours and qualities, (vnder which I also comprehend the spirits) is most inward and profound, as well in the body as in the workmanship of nature, it is vndoubtedly the fittest instrument the soule hath, & such a one as is neereſt linked by agreement and coniunction, with the workman that vseth the same. Inſomuch that if the soule want this instrument, it departeth away: and if the soule be gone and so be wanting to it, then must it also necessarily faile presently, although the members abide yet after the departure of the soule. For the confirmation and strengthening of the members both internall and externall, is separated farther from the Soule: but the mixture of the humours and spirit that is in the members, is more neere and more inward. True it is, that the humours and qualities are instruments of the soule, as well as the members: but the humours are ſuch instruments as ſet the reſt on working. I meane the members, yea, by meanes of them the soule vseth the members. Wherefore if the humours faile, the members are very vnprofitable, as it appeareth in them that are dry or puffed vp, or taken with the palsie, or oppreſſed with any other malady. For the members are fitte instruments for outward vses and exerciſe, but the temperature and mixture of the humours and ſpirits, is ordayned to preſerue ſuch instruments, to the end they might alwaies be apt and ready to doe their duties. Therefore the humours and qualities are in perpetuall motion, but the members are not. For the humours muſt alwaies keepe the members in a readineſſe to worke, if neede require. Now in the conſideration of all theſe things, we ſee wonderfull degrees in the vnion and coniunction that is between the body and the ſoule, and the instruments which it vseth in the body. For as all the elements haue their combinations, and are linked together, according to that agreement of nature which they haue one with another, every one in his degree from heauen downe to the earth, and ſo likewiſe all the humours and qualities of all things: euen ſo is it with the ſoule and body, and with thoſe instruments and meanes whereby they are ioyned and knit together, every one in his degree, according as their natures are more or leſſe corporall or ſpirituall, terreſtriall or celeſtiall. For as the vitall and animall ſpirits approach neereſt to the nature of the ſoule, ſecondly, the humours come neereſt to the nature of the ſpirits, thirdly, the members next to the humours: ſo all of them keepe their ranke and order in their degrees, and in that coniunction which the body and ſoule haue together, as alſo the instruments whereby the ſoule worketh in the bodie: whether we conſider them either in aſcending vpward from the loweſt to the higheſt, or elſe in deſcending from the higheſt to the loweſt, as wee conſider the vnion and coniunction that is betwixt all the elements from the earth to the heauens, and from the heauens to the earth. Whereby we daily ſee more and more the great marueiles of God, and by what meanes and arte he ioyneth the heauens with the earth, and bodily natures with ſpirituall.

This being thus, we are to learne, that all the instruments of the ſoule are prepared for it in the body, as it were for a Workeman that is to doe ſome worke, and that there is none but the ſoule that doeth uſe them. So that it is very euident, that the ſoule is the perfection of this aptneſſe of the bodie, and that there is great agreement betweene the ſoule and the body, and betweene all the partes and faculties of both. Forasmuch then as there is ſuch a coniunction, and that GOD hath created them both to be glorified in them, Saint Paul hath good cauſe to pray for ſanctification in them both, to the ende that God might be ſerued and honoured, and that both of them might be glorified in the day of the Lord. But that our ſpeech may yet be better vnderſtoode, we muſt conſider in what ſignification the names of ſoule, ſpirit and heart are commonly taken, namely in the holy ſcriptures, and how we may and ought to uſe them. This will helpe vs greatly to attaine to the knowledge of the nature and immortality of the ſoule, wherein we are to be inſtructed before we diſſolue our preſent aſſembly.

Teach vs therefore, AR AM, what diuiſions the Scripture maketh of the whole man, as well in regard of the ſoule as of the body, and in what ſignifications the names of ſoule ſpirit and heart are taken; with the cauſes wherefore.

Of the diuisions of man made in the holy Scriptures, as well in respect of the soule as of the body: in what significations the names of soule, spirit, and heart, are used therein, and the causes why: of the entire sanctification of man: how the soule is taken for the life, and for the members and instruments of nourishment, and for nourishment it selfe. Chap. 79.

ARAM. Forasmuch as God so honoureth our bodies, as to call them Temples of his holy spirit. I thinke they cannot be such indeede, except they be wholly dedicated and consecrated vnto him, so that wee separate them from all filthinesse and pollution, by giuing our selues to all kinde of sanctimonie and honesty of life. For then is the body wholly sanctified, when all the senses and members apply themselves onely to good and holy workes commanded by God, and when they abstaine from the contrary. Whereupon it commeth to passe, that the eyes turne aside from beholding all vaine things, and take pleasure onely in seeing that, which may rauish a man with admiration at the excellencie of the workes of God, and induce him to well doing. Thelike may be saide of soundes, of voyces, of words in regard of the eares. And as for the tongue, it is not polluted with vile speeches, with lying, flandering and blasphemie: but praiseth God, and rehearseth his works and wonders, speaking alwaies with a grace to the edifying of all. In like maner, the mouth serueth man for the selfe same vse, as the stomacke also and the belly, with all the rest of the members that serue for the nourishing of the body, are not defiled through gluttonie and drunkennes. So that the body liueth not to eat, but eateth to liue, & to make supply to those necessities vnto which GOD hath made it subiect. Therefore it obserueth sobriety, and is contented to minister to the naturall affections, that God may be serued in this life. Neither doth it abuse the members of generation to whoredome and villanie, but containeth them within their office and lawfull vse. And as for the feete and hands, with all the rest of the externall members, it keepeth them also within the compasse of their duty. But seeing the whole body and all the members therof, take from the soule all their actions and vses, they cannot be sanctified for the seruice of God and of holy things, vnlesse the soule be first sanctified, which giueth vnto them life, motion, and sense.

Of the entire sanctification of mans body.

The body liueth not to eat, but eateth to liue.

For this cause Saint Paul speaking of the sanctification which he wisheth to the Thessalonians, before he maketh any mention of that of the body, he beginneth with the Spirit and Soule, as wee haue already heard. Now because the soule hath diuers powers, he vseth two words the better to note them out, especially the chiefest of them. For as it hath bene already declared vnto vs, albeit the soule hath many powers and offices in the body of man, yet there are not so many soules in the body, as there are faculties and effectes thereof, but one onely soule which doth all that. For this cause the name of soule is diuersly taken in the holy Scriptures. Sometime it is taken for that spirituall substance that is ioyned with the body to giue life vnto it, and for all the powers therof: and sometime againe for one part of those faculties and powers. The like may be sayd of the name of Spirit, and of heart, and that for the same reason. Thus doeth the Scripture sometimes diuide the whole man into two parts onely, namely, into body and soule: as when Iesus Christ sayeth: Feare ye not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soule: but rather feare him, which is able to destroy both soule and body in Hell. And often also the same holy word taketh the one of these two parts for the whole, euen in that signification wherein wee take the name Person in our tongue. For this cause wee reade so often in the word, All flesh and every soule, for every person. Also, Giue mee the Soules, for giue mee the persons: And all the Soules of the house, for all the persons thereof. Now because the vnderstanding and the will are the principall faculties and powers of the soule, when the Scripture meaneth to set them downe distinctly, and to expresse them together with the nature & vertue of the soule, it taketh the spirit for the one, and the soule for the other: namely the spirit for the reason and vnderstanding and the soule for the will and affections. For otherwise how should euery man be entire and sound, vnlesse

his thoughts were pure and holy, all his affections rightlie ruled, and finally his whole body made obedient, and seruiceable to euery good worke? For we haue heard already what Lordship is attributed to the reason and to the vnderstanding: then how the will and affections are in the middest to command, and lastly, the body to serue and obey. So that a man is then altogether pure and sound, when he thinketh nothing in his minde, desireth nothing in his heart, neither executeth any thing with his mēbers, but that which pleaseth God. We haue a place in Esay which teacheth vs very clearly, that the spirite and soule are so taken and distinguished as we say: The desire of our soule (saith hee) is to thy name, and to the remembrance of thee. With my soule haue I desired thee in the night, and with my spirit within mee will I seeke thee in the morning. We see how first he attributeth desire to the soule, thereby to declare the affection of the people towards the Lord. Then he maketh mention of the remembrance and memory that he hath of God, which is in the minde. So that it seemeth he comprehendeth the vnderstanding, and will in the first verse vnder the name of Soule. Afterward in the verse following hee distinguisheth them more specially, attributing desire to the soule, then watchfulnesse and diligent inquisition to the spirit, which is not without thinking and discoursing that appertayne to the minde. Wherefore the Prophet minding to signifie how hee was wholly addicted to the Lord with all his senses and vnderstanding, and with all his heart and will, and that all his affection was towards him hee vseth this distinction betweene the soule and the spirite. Likewise wee finde these two names, Soule and Spirite, ioyned together in this signification in the Psalmes: and I am perswaded, that for the same reason the blessed Virgin ioyned them together in her song, when she sayd, My soule magnifieth the Lord, and my spirit reioyceth in God my Saviour. Now as the Scripture vseth this distinction the better to expresse the faculties and powers of the soule, so Saint Paul sometimes distinguisheth them into three, that they may the better bee known: as when hee writeth to the Ephesians in these wordes, This I say therefore and testifie in the Lord that yee henceforth walke not as other Gentiles walke, in vanitie of their minde, hauing their cogitations darkened, and beeing strangers from the life of God through the ignorance that is in them, because of the hardnesse of their heart. We see here that in the first place hee putteth the minde, by which hee meaneth vnderstanding and reason, which is the principall faculty and power of the soule, and that which is so much magnified by the Philosophers that it is called of them the Queene, Dame and Mistresse. Neuerthelesse Saint Paul testifieth cleerely, that all of it is vanity without Christ: so that a man may well iudge, what we are to esteeme of the rest that is in man, Therefore also we see, how from the mind he commeth to the thought, wherby he comprehendeth both imagination and memory, and all the faculties and powers of the internal senses, which he testifieth to be shadowed with darknesse, so that there is no heavenly light at all therein without Iesus Christ, who is the light of the world. For which cause also he affirmeth that they are estranged from the life of God: that is to say, from that life by which he liueth in his, and which he commandeth and approoueth. Afterward hee referreth the cause therof to their ignorance, which he ioined with darknesse & with the thought obscured thereby. Finally, he commeth to the will & affections, which he comprehendeth vnder the name of heart, to whose hardnes hee referreth their ignorance as to the fountaine thereof. For by reason that through their malice and contumacy they reiect the light of God that is offered to their hearts and minds, they blind themselves by the iust iudgment of God, by which also they are made blinde, as they iustly deserue, seeing they loue darkenes more then light, and lying more then the truth.

Now when all these faculties of the soule are reformed with the body, according as wee haue already declared, then is man come to that entire sanctification of which Saint Paul speaketh in the place before alleaged, which is requisite for the true children & seruants of God. But it seemeth that in all these diuisions and distinctions of the faculties and powers of the soule rehearsed out of the Scriptures, there is not one of them wherein any mention is made of the naturall powers, by which the soule giueth life and nourishment to the body, notwithstanding that this office also is assigned vnto it as well as the rest. Hereof three reasons may be rendered. The first is, that the word of GOD maketh expresse mention of the chiefe faculties and powers, which most properly belong to the nature of the soule, and are giuen vnto it more specially to knowe and honour God by, and which appertaine not onely to this life, but also to the other. The second is, because these naturall powers may bee comprehended vnder the vitall, and vnder the seate of the affections,

by reason of that communion which they haue both with the spirites and with the humours vsed by the soule in the body, not onely to nourish it and preserue life in it, but also to serue for all other things spoken of before. The third reason is, that forasmuch as these naturall powers are more terrestriall then celestiall, and more corporall then spirituall, and the vse and profite of them endeth with this humane life, wee may comprehend them vnder the name of body, as things more neerely ioyned to it for the vse of this life, and of which it shall haue no need after this life, when it shall bee made incorruptible and immortal. And because this power of the soule appeareth more in this life, then any of the rest, therefore it is better knowne. For this cause the name of soule is oftentimes taken not onely for this naturall power which we call Vegetative & Nutritive, but also for the life it selfe, and for all the commodities and desires thereof, yea, for the whole estate of life.

Wee may call to minde what we heard before of the soule which is in the blood. And when Ruben sayde to his bretheren that would haue slaine Ioseph, Let vs not strike his soule, it is as much as if hee had sayde, Let vs not kill the soule. Now it is certaine, that the soule can neither be slaine nor striken: therefore by the soule hee meaneth the life. And so his speech was all one as if hee had sayde, Let vs not take his life from him, as himselfe declareth it by and by after in the verse following where he sayth, Shedde not blood. Also when Moses speaketh of the Law that requireth punishment like to the euill committed, as hee sayeth, Eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, and foote for foote, so hee sayeth, Soule for soules, that is, life for life. And to seeke the soule of one, in many places of Scripture signifieth to lye in wayte for the life, and to pursue it vnto death: as it is written of the enemies of Jeremy, and of Herod against Christ Iesus. There are infinit such like places, both in the olde and newe Testament, in which the soule is taken for this corporall and naturall life. Now because the soule giueth life by meanes of the stomach, belly, and other members and instruments of nourishment, of which wee haue spoken before, therefore it is often taken for them also, as when Esay, sayeth, Therefore Hell, (that is to say the graue) hath enlarged his soule, and hath opened his mouth without measure: and their glory, and their multitude, and their pompe, and hee that reioyceth among them, shall descend into it. The Prophet propoundeth heere the graue as a great and horrible monster, that hath a throte, with a stomach and belly, as it were a deepe gulfe and bottomlesse pitte to swallowe vp and to consume all. And therefore as hee sayeth, that he hath opened his throte or mouth, so hee sayeth, that he hath enlarged his soule, that is to say, his stomach and belly, that it may bee more capable to receiue greater store of meate. The same Prophet in another place, meaning to set downe the vaine hope, that shall deceiue them that band themselues, and enterprise any thing against the people of GOD, and that looke for aide and deliuerance from any other besides him, sayth that They are like to an hungry man, who dreameth that hee eateth, but when he awaketh, his soule is empty: or to a thirsty man, who dreameth that he is drinking, but when he awaketh, behold he is faint, and his soule longeth. Which is as much as if hee had sayde, that such a one supposing hee hath well eaten and well drunke, findeth this stomacke and his belly empty, and is still as hungry and thirsty as he was before. Also when Jeremy sayeth, I haue satiate the weary soule, and haue respited euery languishing soule, it is certaine that by the soule he meaneth the members & instruments of nourishment, with the body that receiue it & the life that is preserued: for the soule neyther eateth nor drinketh. But Ezechiel sheweth vs this yet more cleerely saying, They shall not satisfie their soules, nor fill their bowelles. For himselfe expoundeth that by the word Bowelles, which before hee called soules.

Moreouer, wee haue further to note, that forasmuch as the soule can no more giue life to the body without foode, then without these members and instruments by which it distributeth and deliuereth the same, it is likewise taken not only for the food of the body, but also for those instruments and meanes whereby men get and obtaine foode. Therefore it is written in the Law of the hired seruant that is poore and needy, Thou shalt giue him his hire for his day (that is, the same day he laboureth) neither shall the Sun go down upon it: for he is poore, and therewith sustayneth his soule: as if hee should say, it is his life and foode wherby hee must bee sustained. So that hee which beguileth him of his hire, taketh away his soule and life from him as much as in him lyeth. It is written also, That no man shall take the neather nor the upper millstone to pledge: for this gage is his soule. By which phrase of two millstones, that serue to grinde the corne, the Lord comprehendeth all those instruments wherwith men get their liuing by their labour, of what occupation and trade soeuer they be.

For as a man can not grinde without a millstone or without corne, to haue meale for bread to maintaine life withall: so poore Artificers and Handicraftsmen cannot grinde, nor consequently liue, if those tooles & instruments be taken from them, wherby they must get both their owne liuing, and the liuing of their wiues and children. Therefore God sayth that such a gage is the soule, by which he vnderstandeth the life, and by life the food and nourishment that preserueth it, and consequently the instruments by which poore men and Artificers get their liuing. To conclude, it seemeth that this kinde of phrase vsed by the Hebrewes agreeth well enough with our common speech, in which we often take the life for foode and charges to maintaine life. As when we say, that a man getteth and purchaseth his life or liuing with the sweate of his face. We say likewise, that we giue life to those whom we feede, and take life from them whom we deprive of foode and nourishment, and of the meanes to get it. But we must learne some other significations of this word Soule, taught vs in the holy Scriptures. And first, what is meant by a liuing soule, and what by a naturall, or sensuall body, and what is a spirituall body: and how the name of soule is taken for the desires of the flesh, and for all things belonging to this life. Therefore it belongeth to thee ACHITO B. to discourse vpon this matter.

What is meant by a liuing soule, what by a sensuall and naturall body, and what by a spirituall body: how the name of soule is taken for all the desires of the flesh, and for all things belonging to this life: and not onely for the whole person aline, but also for the person being dead, and for a dead corps: and lastly, for the spirit separate from the body. Chap. 80.

ACHITO B. Men may well study in the schooles of the most skilfull and excellent Law makers, Philosophers, Oratours, and Doctors that are in the world, yet they shall reape small profit thereby except they come to that schoole where the spirit of God is our master and teacher. For this cause Iesus Christ, after he heard the confession that Peter made of him, said thus vnto him, Blessed art thou Simon, the sonne of Ionas: for flesh and blood hath not reueiled it vnto thee, but my Father which is in heauen. Now in that he opposeth flesh and blood to the Father in heauen, he declareth sufficiently, that according to the manner of the Hebrew speech, he vnderstandeth by these two words, whatsoeuer is in man, that is of man. As when Saint Iohn saith, that as many as receiued Christ, to them hee gaue power to bee the sonnes of God, euen to them that beleue in his name, which are borne not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God. And to confirme this, it is saide else where, What man knoweth the things of a man, saue the spirit of man which is in him: euen so the things of God knoweth no man, but the spirit of God. Now wee haue receiued, not the spirit of the world, but the spirit which is of God, that wee might know the things that are giuen to vs of God. To this purpose when Saint Paul opposeth a spirituall man, to him whom he called before a naturall man, and altogether vncapable of the Spirit of God, hee saith that the spirituall man discerneth all things, and is iudged of no man. For being such a one, he hath certaine knowledge of heavenly things, to be able to discern light from darknes, & truth from lies, that he be not deceiued by a false shew of truth. Neither is he iudged of any body, because the truth of God is not subiect to the iudgement of men, how skilfull and conceited soeuer they be, without the spirit of regeneration.

Now then as wee haue heard, that the soule is taken in sundry significations declared by vs, wee may now knowe, that it is taken oftentimes in the holy Scriptures for all the vertues, for all natural gifts and graces, for all affections and desires, for all pleasures and commodities, and for other thing sappertaining to this life. For this cause liuing soule signifieth in the Scriptures as much as creature, hauing soule and naturall life, and it is so taken for all liuing creatures of what nature and kinde soeuer they be, and Saint Paul in the place alleadged and in the fifteenth of the same epistle, calleth a naturall man & a naturall body, that man and that body, which liueth with such a soule and such a life. vnto whom he opposeth diuersely, a spirituall man & a spirituall body. For by a natural man hee vnderstandeth a man not regenerated by the Spirit of God, & by a spirituall, a man regenerated: and by a naturall body, he meaneth a body that liueth by this corporall life, such as it is in this world before the death and resurrection thereof. By a spirituall body, he vnderstandeth not one,

ly such a body as men haue that are already regenerated in this life, but also such a one as it shall bee after the resurrection, when it shall be fully regenerated and made immortall, and like to the glorious body of Iesus Christ. For besides the humane soule wherewith it liueth here, and in regard of which Saint Paul calleth it naturall, it shall also haue a diuine vertue, that shall wholly change in it all corruptible and mortall qualities, and all humane infirmities, vnto which it is subiect in this life, into incorruptible and immortall qualities. And so doth the Apostle expound it saying in the same place, The body is sown in corruption, and riseth in incorruption: it is sown in dishonour, it riseth in glorie, it is sown in weaknesse, and is raysed in power. It is sown a naturall body, and is raysed a spirituall body: there is a naturall body, and there is a spirituall body. As it is also written, The first man Adam was made a liuing soule: and the last Adam was made a quickening spirite. Whereupon wee haue to note, that Saint Paul speaketh still of the selfesame body, which remaineth alwayes one in substance. But forasmuch as it altereth in qualities and kinde of life, therefore as he calleth it spirituall, in regarde of the Spirit of Christ, and of his spirituall and heavenly vertues, by which he changeth the first qualities of it, as the Apostle teacheth vs by such as are opposed against them: so it is also called an animall or naturall body, of the soule, which giueth vnto it onely that naturall life that it hath in this world, and not that spirituall and immortall life, which it shall haue after this. For the soule which now can giue none but this mortall life by reason of sinne, shall then haue another vertue, when sinne shall bee wholly abolished, to giue vnto the body an immortall and blessed life, by means of that spirituall and diuine vertue of Iesus Christ, whereby it shall bee quickened, that it may quicken the body with the same life. But because this word Animal deriued from Ani-ma, that signifieth the soule, is not very common in our English tongue, wee finde in the vsuall translation of these places of Saint Paul alleadged by vs, these words naturall and sensuall in steade of Animal, which the Greeke word properly signifieth. Therefore in expounding the sence of these kindes of speech vsed by the Apostle wee must vnderstand, that hee doeth not call animall, or sensuall and naturall, the body of man onely, or man by reason of his body onely, but the whole man compounded of body and soule. For he is altogether animall, that is, naturall and sensuall both in body and soule without Christ Iesus: but being in him, so long as hee liueth in this world, hee is both animall, that is to say, naturall and sensuall, and also spirituall. First hee is animall, both because hee is not yet perfectly regenerated, as also because hee is not yet immortall and glorified, as hee shall bee after his resurrection. On the other side hee beginneth euen now to bee spirituall, because he hath a beginning of regeneration wrought in him, which beeing once made perfect, hee shall be regenerated much more absolutely, and made wholly conformable to Iesus Christ both for immortalitie and eternall happinesse. For then hee shall be no more animall, naturall, sensuall, and spirituall altogether, but onely spirituall, according as I haue already declared. Wherefore let vs knowe, that every one shall retaine still the selfe same body and soule, which he hath in this life, but by reason of that change of euill qualities, which being in both, shall be made in the other life, Saint Paul calleth it spirituall, and not for any conuersion that shall be of the body into the spirit. For as a man is called animal, in regard of the soule that is giuen him, because the soule is the chiefest thing in him: so hee is called spirituall in respect of the other life, and of the excellency that shall bee added to the soule, and by the soule to the body, through the heavenly and spirituall vertue and power of Iesus Christ.

What is meant by an animal or naturall man.

Now then seeing the soule is taken in the holy Scriptures for the natural life, which is not without affections, we may see it sometimes also put for them. Therefore when the word of G O D would expresse a great affection of loue, it saith of the sonne of Sichem, that his soule claued vnto Dinah: and after it is added, that hee loved her and spake to the heart of the maide, that is to say, kindly, and as her heart could wish. In like manner it is written of Iacob, that his soule was bound to the soule of Beniamin his sonne: to signifie, that hee loved him tenderly, as his owne soule and life. And of Jonathan it is said, that his soule was knit with the soule of David: which phrase is afterward expounded by the scripture, where it is said, that Jonathan loved David as his owne soule. Wee are also commanded to loue G O D with all our soule, as also with all our heart and minde. Therefore Iesus Christ saith that whosoever seeketh and saueth his soule, shall lose it, but hee that hateth and looseth it for his sake, shall finde it and saue it vnto eternall life. In which wordes, the soule is not onely taken for the life, but also for all the commodities thereof, and for the desires of the flesh, such as are glory, honors, riches, pleasures, delights, ease, and all kinde of prosperity: for the obtaining of which things, many turne aside from the way of saluation, and take the way that leadeth to destruction. Also we reade many places in the Scriptures, in which the soule is taken not only for the whole person liuing, but also for the person dead, yea for the dead body, and sometimes for the spirit separated from the body.

1. Cor. 2. 11.

But we must well consider in what sence there is mention made of the death of the soule. Balaam wished that his soule might die the death of the iust: but he speaketh after the maner of the Hebrewes, who vsed many times to say My soule and thy soule, for my selfe and thy selfe, or for my person and thy person: according to that before mentioned, that the name of soule and of flesh, are often taken for the whole man, and for that which we call Person. For this cause whereas Moses sayd, that GOD sware by himselfe, Jeremy and Amos say, that hee sware by his soule, in the same sence and signification. Likewise, the name of Soule is not onely taken for a liuing person, but also for him that is dead: as when it is written in the Law, Let none of you be defiled by the dead among his people, it is in the Hebrew, ouer the soule of his people, that is ouer the dead body of any of the people, by touching it after it is dead. And when Iob sayeth, that the soule of a man draweth to the graue, and his life to the buryers, and that God deliuereth his soule from going into the pitte, he taketh not the name of soule for that spirituall essence that giueth life vnto man, but for the life it selfe, or for the man and body it selfe, which is laide in the graue after death. So that his meaning is no other then to say, that God deliuereth man from death, wherby otherwise he should be brought into the pit. And when Dauid saith, Lord, thou hast brought vp my soule out of the graue, he sheweth after very euidently what he vnderstandeth by his soule when he saith. Thou hast reniued mee from them that goe downe into the pit. He taketh this word Soule in the same sence when hee sayth, that God deliuered his soule from death and from the midst of Lions: and when he prayeth him to deliuer his soule from the sword, his desolate soule from the power of the dogge. For it is easie to iudge by these words, that hee taketh not the soule in these places for the essence of the soule and proper substance thereof: because the soule cannot be smitten with the sword, nor deuoured of Lions, nor carried away by dogges. Therefore seeing the soule is so often put in the Scripture for corporall life which endeth with the body, and which the soule giueth vnto it by meanes of those instruments, which it hath in the body, the name of Spirit is many times vsed therein, to signifie more specially this essence and spirituall substance, which we call the soule, and which may bee separated both from the body and blood, as that which liueth after the death of the body. Therefore Dauid did so vse the word Spirit, when he recommended his soule to God by the same words, which Iesus Christ vsed vpon the croise. Afterward S. Steuen took it in the same sence when he said, Lord Iesus receiue my spirit. For this is that spirit of which Salomon saith, that it returneth to God that gane it, after that the body is returned to the earth and to dust of which it consisteth. And yet this difference is not alwaies obserued in the Scriptures. For as wee haue already heard, both the heart, and soule, and spirit are oftentimes generally and indifferently put for all the patts and powers of the soule, and not onely for those of men, but also of beastes: as when the Wise man attributeth spirit vnto them, hauing regard to this corporall life. For when Salomon speaketh so, it is in consideration of this life that consisteth in breath, which is also called Spirit in the holy Scriptures, which vse one and the same word to signifie both winde and breathing, and whatsoever we call spirit, taking it both for the soule of man, for the Angelicall natures, and for the diuine nature. Therefore Iob speaking of this present life saith, So long as my breath is in me, and the spirit of God in my nostrils, my lips surely shall speake no wickednesse, and my tongue shall viter no deceit. But when Saint Paul saith, The same spirit beareth witnesse with our spirit, that wee are the children of God, he taketh the word Spirit in an other sence then Iob did in the place now alleadged. For in the first place hee taketh the name of Spirit for the Spirit of God, and in the second place for the spirit of man, which signifieth the humane soule. It is true that in this place he taketh it for the soule and for the spirit, such as it is in regenerate men: but when he saith elsewhere, that the spirit of man knoweth the things of man, he taketh the spirit simply for a humane spirit, and for the vnderstanding part thereof.

Likewise the name of soule is put, not onely for his naturall life and for the will and affections, but also for the selfe same thing that is comprehended by this word Spirit, when one would signifie thereby the greatest excellencie of the soule. As when Dauid saith, Our soule soule waiteth for the Lord, for hee is our helpe and our shield. Surely our heart shall reioyce in him, because we trusted in his holy name. And againe, My soule reioyceth in the Lord, and is glad in his saluation. And when Saint Peter saith, Abstaine from fleshy lustes, which fight against the soule, and haue your conuersation honest among the Gentiles, hee taketh the name of soule for the spirituall man, who hath his minde and all his affections well ruled according to the will of God. As then we haue heard in what sort the soule may die; in regard of this corporall life according to the phrase of the Scriptures and of the Hebrewes, so by this which Saint Peter saith, that fleshy lustes fight against the soule, wee may learne after what manner the soule, may be said to die and to be slaine. For nothing can bring death vnto it but sin. Wherefore it is not said without good reason in the Booke of Wisdome, that the mouth that telleth lies slayeth the soule. Albeit then the soule is immortall, in that it can neuer be without life, no more then the Angels, who are spirits like to it: neuertheless it is after a sort mortall so farre forth as being farre off separated from God through sinne, it liueth no more that blessed life, wherewith it should liue if it were vnited and ioyned vnto him by true faith and sincere obedience. For it should enioy the selfe same life, which the heauenly Angels, with the soules and spirits of the blessed, doe enioy. As contrariwise the soules of wicked liue with the same life that the Diuels doe, which is called dead, because it is a more accursed life then death it selfe, and therefore called the second and eternall death.

Now we may thinke our selues sufficiently taught touching the diuerse significations in which the name of soule is taken. It seemeth to me, that we haue spoken enough of the Anatomy of the body and soule, of which the most of our discourses hitherto were made: which may suffice for the contentation of euery one, that will keepe himselfe within the bounds and limits set down vnto vs by the wisdome of GOD in his word. But to finish this whole matter concerning the soule, which we haue chiefly considered in her parts, powers, and effects, we are further yet to be instructed in the creation, generation, nature, and immortality thereof. And because they are marueilous difficult matters, and such as are not without great contrarieties of opinions euen amongst the learned, I am of opinion that these things are to be discoursed of, according to that manner of teaching of the ancient Academicks, which we followed in our first meeting: namely, vpon the theame propounded vnto vs, to ballance the arguments on the one part, with the reasons of the other side, that so wee may diligently search out the truth. Notwithstanding it shalbe lawfull for vs to deliuer our opinion, so long as we ground it vpon the infallible testimony of the word of God, leauing to euery one his libertie to iudge which is best, and to embrace and follow the same. For our entrance therefore into so goodly a matter, thou shalt begin, ASER, to morrow to declare vnto vs what thou shalt thinke good concerning this proposition, namely, whether the soule is begotten with the body, and of the seede thereof: or whether it be created a part and of another substance, and what is requisit for vs to know therein.

ASER. I am of opinion, that in discoursing Philosophically concerning the knowledge of the soule, we ought to practise that which Socrates said, being tired with the consideration of the nature of things, namely, to be very carefull least it happen to vs as it doth to them that are busie beholders of the Sunne eclipsed, whose sight is dazeled thereby, except they beholde the image thereof in water, or in some such like thing. For euen the Spirit that is wholly given to the vnderstanding of it self, is often as it were amazed and carried far out of the way of true contemplation, vnlesse it know how to consider it selfe in the glasse of all brightnesse, layd open in the sacred word of God and not stay altogether in the discourses of natural Philosophie and humane reason, which many times blinde euen the sharpest wittes of men. True it is, that we have many things in Nature that affoorde vs euident testimonies of the creation, nature, and immortalitie of the soule, which haue greatly moued, not onely those Philosophers that haue borne greatest reuerence to GOD, and acknowledged him to bee the Creatour of all things, but euen those also that were most prophane, and made the greatest Idole of Nature.

Who knowe
the soule best

Neuerthelesse the knowledge of so high and difficult a matter, could neuer be perfectly comprehended, but of them onely that haue heard the doctrine of the Spirit of God, and haue receiued the testimonies of his word, as certaine demonstrations of those thinges, which the sense of man is not able to conceiue. For indeed we can not pronounce any thing certaine of so high a nature as is that of the soule, except it be by his testimony who hath created it, and who onely knoweth it, as the workeman knoweth his worke. Yet wee ought not to contemne naturall reasons found out by the learned sort, which are as it were, beames of that true light: but rather diligently consider of them, as helps that may greatly further vs in the vnderstanding of that we seeke, and to serue for the confounding of so many Atheists as impudently dare deny the immortalitie of the soule, and that iudgement of God, which shall be to the euerlasting happinesse and ioy of the good, and to the perpetuall griefe and torment of the wicked.

Now albeit the soule of man hath no parts nor members into which it may bee diuided as the body may, neuerthelesse in the sequele of our discourses concerning the Anatomy of the body, we haue also made as it were an Anatomy of the soule, in regarde of her faculties, powers, and offices, whereby we may attaine to some good measure of knowledge touching the nature thereof, and of the difference that is betweene it and the soules of all other creatures that haue soule and life. But there remaine yet very great difficulties concerning the creation and substance thereof, vpon which points it shall be very profitable for vs to be well resolved.

The soule is not bred of corporal seed.

We know wel enough by that which wee haue heard before, that the soule of man cannot be of any corporal nature, or compounded of any corruptible nature, as the body is. For if it were so, then must it necessarily be mortall as the body is, and be farre from doing that which it doeth. Besides, it would follow therupon that the soule of man differed in nothing from the soule of beasts. But we know by the effects of it that there is great difference betweene them, yea greater then betweene heauen and earth: which beeing so, it followeth well, that it is not engendered with the body of the same substance with it, and that, the substance of the soule is not deriued from the same seede. Again, if the soule be created of some other substance, and not begotten with the body of any humane seede, a man may aske from whence then cometh that pollution that is in it through sinne, whereby the whole race of mankinde is corrupted, and what power Originall sinne ought to haue ouer it. For if GOD daily createth soules for those humane bodies that come into the worlde continually, as wee doe beleeue, and that to place and lodge them in those bodies euen from the wombe, surely he createth them no otherwise then he did al other creatures, which he created good. Whereupon it followeth, that he created not soules corrupted and infected with sinne, but pure and sound, as those were of our first Parents before sinne entred into the worlde. Neuerthelesse we see that the chiefe corruption and infection in man through sin, is in the soule. For if the soule were not infected, the body should not be stained therewith, as that which is but the lodging and instrument of the soule, and as it were, the seruant thereof. Wherefore when the soule is cleane and pure, the whole man, both body and soule is altogether pure: but when that is defiled, all is defiled. From whence then, will some men say, doth the soule receive this infection of sinne, wherewith she is polluted after her creation? Hath she it of her selfe, or of the body after she is lodged therein, and of the corruption of that seede, of which the body is begotten? These are very profound questions and woonderfull difficult, about which many great Diuines haue troubled themselues along time. But the wiser sort enquire soberly into them, so as they give euident testimony of that modesty, wherewith they seeke after the vnderstanding of the great secrets of God, rather then make profession that they haue found them out. Others there are who one while with coniectures according to their fancie, an other while with reasons drawne from the nature of thinges, set downe for a certaine truth whatsoever cometh into their minde.

Modesty re-

Now

Now then being to heare what reasons can be alleadged, we will omit and passe over, as well them that walke wholly in the darkenesse of ignorance, as those that will not goe faire and softly, and as it were feeling with the hand, but runne on swiftly whither they please, without feare of downefalles. We will take a middle course, neither too high nor too lowe, keeping our selues within the limites of the word of truth, which teacheth vs that wee incurre original sinne, because we are all the children of Adam, to whom, and to whose posteritie God gaue originall iustice, which made man obedient to God, and the body subiect to reason. But it was given him with this condition, that if he kept not the commandement of God, both he and his posterity should bee deprived of that gift and priuiledge: euen as if some noble man hauing committed treason should be disgraced from the title of Nobilitie both he & his children. This deprivation of gifts bestowed vpon man by God, of which we should haue beene the inheritours, but for the sinne of our first Parents, is called by the Diuines, Originall sinne. To proceede then with our former matter, first I say, that in my minde, it is not so necessarily required of vs to know what the soule is, or what ist he essence and substance thereof as to know of what qualitie it is, and what are the action and works of it. And that this is so, wee may iudge by that bountifullnesse, which GOD the Lord of nature vsfeth towards vs, and which he manifesteth vnto vs oneuery side by manyfolde signes and testimonies. For whatsoeuer is expedient for vs, the same hee propoundeth vnto vs both very abundantly, and with such facilitie, that we may easily finde it out and bring it into vse. Wherefore we can haue no more euident token, that a thing is not profitable or not very necessary for vs, then this, that it is rare, far off, and hid from vs, yea, very hard to finde out and to attaine to the vse of it. So that when we are admonished to know our selues, we must not referre this to the knowledge of the essence of the soule, which we are not able to know or comprehend, but to the knowledge of the effects and workes of it, thereby to know how to frame our manners and our whole life, to the end that chasing vice away, we might follow after vertue. And this by the grace of Christ Iesus, will leade vs to that life in which we shall be perfectly wise and good, and liue immortall and blessed with GOD for euermore.

Then, as we shall see the Creatour of all things face to face, who otherwise is incomprehensible vnto vs, so we shal know our selues perfectly in him. True it is if wee vnderstand well the principall cause that is taught vs in his word, why hee created man after his image and likenesse, and gaue him an immortal soule partaker of vnderstanding & reason, we shal be wel instructed in that point we desire to know touching the nature of the soule. So that although we cannot thoroughly know or define what is the essence or substance thereof, neuerthelesse seeing it was created of God, that being ioyned vnto him it might haue eternall happinesse, we must needes say, that it is a substance in some sort capable of the diuine nature & that may be ioyned therewith. For being indued with the knowledge of the Diuinitie, the loue of the same is bred within it, by which loue the soule is so ioyned vnto God, that it is indued with perpetuall happinesse.

And thus we may say, that the soule of man is a spirit that giueth life to the body whereunto it is ioyned, and which is capable of the knowledge of GOD to loue him, as beeing meete to be vnited vnto him through loue, to eternal felicitie. But let vs consider the diuersitie of opinions of the best learned, as well vpon this matter, as vpon the doubts mentioned by vs in our speech. For the first, there are many who thinke, that we take our generation and birth of our fathers and mothers, not onely, in regard of our bodies, but also for our soules: and that soules are produced of soules, as bodies are begotten of bodies, being led by the reason before spoken of. For they cannot conceiue how original sinne, which is the pollution of our nature that before was good and pure, by reason of the hereditarie corruption of the first father of men, can be deriued from Adam to all his successours, and from father to sonne, if the soules of children take not their originall from the soules of their parents, as the bodies do of their bodies: considering that the soule is the chiefe subiect of original sin, and of all the rest that proceede from it, as rivers issue from their fountaine. Wherefore, as we set Adam before our eyes for the first stocke or roote of all mankinde, in regard of mens bodies that haue all their beginning from him: so these men doe the like with his soule, and the soules of all other men, as if soules were deriued from soules, and bodies from bodies. And indeede at the first blush a man might thinke, that Christ Iesus was of this mind when he saide, That which is borne of flesh, is flesh, and that which is borne of the spirit, is spirit: if it bee so that the name of flesh in that place ought to be taken for the whole man, comprehending vnder it the body, soule, and spirit, and whatsoeuer excellent thing is in man, being considered in his corrupt nature, as the word flesh is commonly taken in the holy Scriptures, when it is opposed to the spirit, or to God. And for this cause many do not take this word flesh so largely, neither in this place, nor in any other like to this, as if the spirit of man & the chiefe power of his soule were comprehended therein: but they reſtaine it to that part which they call ſenſuall, vnder which they vnderſtand not only the body of man, but alſo thoſe powers of the ſoule, which they haue common with beaſts. Therefore they doubt not to ſay, that the ſoule, which is called vegetatiue and ſenſitiue, like to that of plants and beaſts, is produced of the ſame ſeede that the body is: and that it is aſwell contained in the ſeede, as the matter and nature of which the body is compounded. Whereupon it would follow, that in this reſpect there is no difference betwixt the ſoule of man & the ſoule of beaſts and plants. They ſay well, that euery living creature hath but one onely ſoule, albeit there bee diuers powers thereof in certaine creatures, in ſome more, in ſome leſſe. Hereof it is that they call that of plants by a more ſpeciall name Vegetatiue, becauſe it hath but this vertue and office onely, of which it taketh the name. And albeit the ſoule of beaſt hath the ſame vertue alſo, yet they call it not by the ſame name, but onely ſenſitiue, vnder which they place the vegetatiue ſoule that is in plants, as a power and propertie thereof. So likewiſe, although the ſoule of man, hath both theſe together, yet they call it not either vegetatiue or ſenſitiue but onely reasonable vnder which they place the vegetatiue and ſenſitiue ſoule that is in beaſts for powers and properties thereof, as before I ſaid, they placed the vegetatiue vnder the ſenſitiue. But I would very gladly AMANA, be inſtructed in that which thou canſt deliuer very well to this purpoſe, following this excellent matter, which will ſerue greatly to cauſe vs more ſpecially to vnderſtand the nature and immortalitie of the ſoule, the chiefe object whereat wee aime.

Whether there be any thing mortall in the ſoule of man: of the diſtinction betweene the ſoule and the powers of it: of the opinion of Philoſophers, and what agreeement is betweene them touching the ſoule of brute beaſts, and the nature and ſubſtance of it: of their opinion that deriue the ſoule of man and the ſoule of beaſts from one fountaine: of them that aſcend higher, and of their reaſons. Chap. 82.

Iohn 3.12,

Of the diſtinction of the ſoule from the powers thereof.

A*MANA*. That which we read of Ieſus Chriſt his ſaying to Nicodemus in theſe wordes, If when I tell you earthly things, yee beleene not, how ſhould yee beleene, if I ſhall tell you of heavenly things? may giue vs occaſion to ſay in like manner, that if we cannot knowe the earth, neither the body and ſoule of man, nor the nature and vertue thereof, how ſhould we attaine to the knowledge of Heauen and of thoſe ſpirituall natures, of God and of his workes? And if we cannot comprehend in our ſelues the workes of our ſoule how ſhal we vnderſtand the workes of GOD in the whole world? And if we be not able to conceiue them, doeth it follow therefore that he doeth them not? and yet there are many that conclude after that manner. For they beleene no more then they are able to know and comprehend by their naturall reaſon, according as they deale alſo with their ſoule. For becauſe they vnderſtand not what is the proper eſſence of it, neither can ſee it after it is entred into the body and ioyned therewith, nor yet when it departeth away, therefore they conclude, that it is no other thing but as it were a fire that laſteth ſo long as there is matter agreeable to the nature of it, and is quenched when that faileth.

But for that which you deliuered to vs, ASER, of the ſayings of certaine touching the diuers kindes of ſoules, and the powers of euery one of them, it ſeemeth to mee that (vnderſtanding them as you ſay theſe men doe) one of theſe three things will follow of their opinion. For they muſt of neceſſity yeeld to this, either that the ſoule of man is partly immortal & partly mortal: or that a man hath three ſoules, one immortal & two mortal: or laſtly, that the powers of the reaſonable ſoule, which we call ſenſitiue & vegetatiue, are not of the proper eſſence and ſubſtance thereof, but only of the body, & that they are inſtruments of the reaſonable ſoule, as members thereof. For I doubt not but they will readily confeſſe this, that the ſoule is immortal: and if that part of the ſoule which they call vegetatiue and ſenſitiue be of the ſelfe ſame eſſence and ſubſtance, in that reſpect it ſhall bee mortall. Nowe if wee ſo diſtinguiſh distinguish all these three sorts of soules in man, that we make three kinds of them; the first and principall shall be immortall, and the other two mortall. And if they will say, that they take not the vegetative and sensitive soule in man, for two diuerse kindes of soules, but only for two sundry powers of the reasonable soule, I demaund of them whether these two powers are so toynd vnto it, that it may bee a soule as it is, both without them and with them; even as before wee saide that it might bee with the body and without the body. I doubt not but every one will answer me to this question, according to that opinion he hath conceiued of the nature of mans soule. If the question be made touching the soule of beasts, the Philosophers agree wel amongst themselves herein, that it is of the same matter of which their bodies are compounded; whether it be deriued and taken from the same, or whether it be the propertie of the matter. Therefore they meane, that it is the Vitall spirit only therein that giueth life vnto them, which is of a corporall matter and substance; or else that it is the temperature or temperament of the whole body generally, which is the propertie of that matter. And so the soule in beasts shall be the life it selfe, of which the Vitall spirit or the temperament are the instruments. Which seemeth to agree wel with that which Moses saith, That the soule of the flesh is in the blood thereof, that is to say, the life, according as we shewed when we speake of the nature of blood, and of those meanes by which it giueth life to the creatures. For when Moses speaketh so, a man might say that it is as much in effect as if he saide, that the blood is as it were the pipe and instrument that conueyeth life to the body, and that the Vital spirits are the thing that giueth motion and sense to the body, which is the same that we call Soule: neither is there any inconuenience to yeeld to this in regard of the soule of beasts. And albeit we see not with the eye how these Vital spirits, or the temperament of all the partes of the body, doe giue vnto it that life which it hath, yet a man may iudge and haue some knowledge hereof by the thinges wee see in nature, which haue some agreement and resemblance with this. For wee conceiue well, howe the flame is nourished by the oyle and match that is in a lampe, or by the waxe and weeke that is in a candle. In which we see two sorts of matter differing one from another, toyning both together. Besides, we see how that by meanes of this coniunction, and of the temperature and agreement that these two matters haue each with other, the flame beeing kindled in them, is nourished and preserued. So likewise we propound the Vitall spirit in the bodies of liuing creatures, as a thinne flame engendered of the blood, by vertue of the heart: and this flyeth as it were throughout all the parts of the body, distributing vnto it Vitall heate, which quickeneth it, and endueth it with that vertue by which it hath motion and sense, and exerciseth all her actions, so that every member doth his office. Now wee see well in this comparison the matter that is in the lampe or in the candle, and the temperature and agreement that is betwene the parts of it, and how the flame is fedde and maintained after it is lighted. We may see also from whence this flame is brought to the lampe, and how this matter is lighted, and that neither the matter, nor the agreement and temperature thereof bredde this flame of themselves, but that it is brought from elsewhere.

In like manner, we may easily conceiue that which hath bin tolde vs of the vitall spirit, & of the blood whereof it is bredde, and of the vertue & power of the heart in the generation of it. But one may say vnto mee, that there is great difference betwene the comparison we made of a lampe or candle, and of his flame, & betwene that which we haue spoken of the generation of the vitall spirit, because this flame, which we call the vitall spirit, springeth of the selfe same matter by which it is nourished and preserued, and is kindled there. And therefore it were requisite that we should further know what is the cause of this, as also why the life and motion that are therein, are inflamed by this vitall spirit, and not by any other meanes whatsoever, whether it be the blood or the flesh. And yet this spirit is as well of a corporall and bodily matter, as all therest, of which the body is compounded: so that it hath his originall of the selfe same elements from whence that matter is deriued, out of which it springeth. But of such inquisitors I would likewise demaund, from whence the heauens, the Sun and Moone, with the other planetes and starres haue their motion, their light and properties. It is very certaine they can yeeld me no other true cause, but that God hath created them of that nature, that he hath so framed them, and that hee alwaies preserueth them such, by the diuine vertue and power of his prouidence. So I say to them, that we ought not to search for any other cause or reason of that we mentioned before, or goe any further, or mount higher in the inquisition thereof. But forasmuch as that which wee haue now deliue-

red of the nature and matter of the Soule, is proper to that Sensitive & Sensuall soule which we attribute to beasts, we must come more particularly to that that is proper to men, which we call the reasonable soule. This is that matter and point, about which the greatest and most ingenious wittes haue most laboured and disputed from time to time. For they that affirmed the soule of man to be no other thing then the Vitall and Animal spirits by meanes of which the body receiueth life, or the temperature and temperament of the humours, and matter of which the body is copounded, these men put no difference between the soule of beasts & the soule of men. And as for thē that take it to be the breath, or a fire of which the natural heat proceedeth, they iumpe in opiniō with the former, who place it in the Vitall spirits. And they that say it is in the harmony of the whole body, are of the same mind with thē that place it in the temperament. So that according to the opinion of all these, the soule of man is nothing else but naturall heats, or else the Vitall spirit that is in the blood: as the Physitions commonly take it, whose consideration reacheth not farther then that they can comprehend by their naturall reason, following therein Hippocrates, who agreeable to this opinion saith that the soule is daily ingendered, after that manner, which wee haue already declared. But they that more diligently looke into the properties and excellent gifts, wherewith the reasonable soule is endued, know assuredly by their naturall reason, that these opinions are verie vnworthie the noble excellencie thereof, and that they are of no force in regard thereof. For they iudge very well, that the vnderstanding and reason with the discourses thereof, that the iudgement and such memorie as it hath that the discerning of good and euill, of thinges honest and dishonest, of vertues and vices, with the knowledge of humane and diuine thinges, whereof it is pertaker, are works and actions which cannot proceede frō such matter as the elements are, as we haue touched elsewhere. Whereupon it followeth, that it is some other thing then the Vitall spirit, or the temperament of the body: and that it is of a farre differing nature from that of beasts, which consisteth in these things. And by the same reason also they conclude, that if the soule of man were of any such matter as to be the Vitall spirit, or the temperament of the bodie, it would follow that it were mortall like to the body, and that nothing should remaine of it after the death thereof. Which thing they finde to be too much contrary vnto that, which a man may iudge of the nature and substance of the soule by those effects of it, that were euen now mentioned: which effectes are such as cannot agree to a corruptible and mortall nature, nor to any other then to a celestiall and immortal nature, like to that of the Angels and blessed spirits, which are endued with such vertues. But I desire to heare the ARAM, vpon the thinges now spoken of, that thou maiest goe on with the matter of our discourses.

Galen's opinion of the soule.

Gal. de plac. Hip.

ARAM. The Ancient speaking of man, often call him a great miracle: and indeede the more we bend our mindes to consider of it, the more marueilous we shal finde it to be. Inasmuch as in the particular contemplation of the soule, which is truely man, I would gladly aske whether it were better, either to discourse Philosophically of this matter hauing store of argument, or by way of admiration to crie out with Saint Paul, O the deepenes of the riches, both of the wisdom, and knowledge of God! Neuertheles being drawen on with the same desire that hath hither to pricked vs forward, to search out and to be instructed in the truth according to my knowledge I will go forward ARAM, with thy speech.

For the causes then alleadged by thee, out of them that consider more diligently the properties and excellent gifts of the soule, although Galen, who otherwise was a prophane man in respect of the knowledge of God, and an idolatrous worshipper of nature, durst not boldly determine what the reasonable soule was, yet as for that which is commonly called the vegetatiue or nourishing, and the sensitive or sensuall soule, he feareth not boldly to affirme, that it it is no other thing then either the naturall & vital spirits, or the temperament. But as for the reasonable soule, he leaueth it in doubt whether it be of a bodily nature or of some other that is not corporall, and which subsisteth by it selfe being seperated from the body. Neither doth he conclude any other thing, but that it is either a shining substance, and an ethereall body, that is to say, of a more pure and celestially nature then any of the elements: or else, that it is of a nature that is not corporall, but yet hath this body, by which he meaneth the animal spirit, to be as a chariot to carrie it. Plato before him said, that soules were little portions taken from the substance of the celestially fires: and he maketh three parts of a mans soule, diuiding them according to the principall parts of the body, and those instruments which they haue in the same. Which diuision is vnderstood of some, as if he made so many sorts of soules, as we haue shewed that there are principal powers and offices, which haue their seuerall seats and places assigned vnto them in the body. Therefore Galen maintaineth, that the vegetative and sensitive soule is no other thing then the temperament of the liuer and of the heart, which are assigned to bee the seats and chiefe instruments of the nourishing and vitall power and vertue. And as for the animal or reasonable power, whose seate is commonly placed in the braine, wee haue already shewed his opinion. Now of this part, there are many, euen of them who greatly magnifie it, that are not yet well resolved whether they ought to take it for the animal spirit, or for the temperament, or for an incorporall nature that commeth else where then from the body. Aristotle he calleth the soule by a new Greek name, that signifieth as much as a perpetuall motion, and saith that it proceedeth from a first nature and beginning, which he calleth Heauen. But hee speaketh not so plainly, that a man may iudge by his words, what he thinketh of the reasonable soule in man, whether it bee mortall or immortall. Neuerthelesse he confesseth, that there is great difference betweene the power of the soule, which we call more specially by the name of spirit, and betweene the other twain, which he calleth the Nutritive and Sensitive powers. For he useth this word Powers, and affirmeth, that these two first proceede only from the body, and are bredde there, and that the Vegetative soule and power is more in the seede and burthen, then the Sensitive. But as for the third, he saith plainly, that it onely commeth from without else where, and that this onely is diuine, not communicating her action with any corporall action.

Aristotles opinion of the soule.

Occams opinion of the soule.

Of the creation of soules according to the Platonists.

Thus we see sufficient agreement between the Philosophers and the Physicians concerning the Vegetative and Sensitive soule or power: but there is not so good accord about the reasonable soule and power. Yea many great Diuines and Doctors agree with them in the two first points. For this cause Occam saith plainly, that there are two distinct soules in man, the one reasonable the other sensuall: the reason is, because it is manifest, that the sensitive soule hath no actions, but instrumentall, that is to say, by means of those instruments where by she exerciseth her actions, & from which she hath them. Whereupon he concludeth, that this sensuall soule seemeth to haue her originall and generation from the seede, and that it is either the temperament, or some faculty and power in the body. He confirmeth this opinion by another argument taken from the contrary appetites and desires of the reasonable & sensuall soule: out of which he draweth this conclusion, That it is very likely that these are two distinct substances, because it seemeth inconuenient, in one & the same nature not diuided or distinguished to place appetites so wholly contrary each to other. He addeth further, that it is a thing very agreeable to nature, that every liuing creature should beget his like: therefore man begetteth man like himselfe, at leastwise in respect of the Sensitive soule, if not of the reasonable soule. Whereupon it followeth, that the Vegetative and Sensitive soule proceed from the nature of the seede. The Platonicall Philosophers were of opinion, that soules were bredde in heauen, and were taken out of the diuine nature as a portion thereof, & that there they were instructed and adorned with sundry sciences, with knowledge and vertue: and that afterward being given of God, they descended from thence into the bodies of men, as into stinking, filthy, and contagious prisons. Wherof it followed, that through the infection of these prisons they were corrupted by euill affections, as it were with the filthines of them. So that they forgot all those gifts and celestially vertues wherewith they had bin endued and adorned in their first birth, and which they had brought with them. And being thus detained as prisoners in this darke & filthy prison, they could no more vse all those goodly gifts, but onely so far forth as they were taught and instructed againe by doctrine, which in respect of them may be compared to a light brought to prisoners kept in a darke dungeon, to light and refresh them. For this cause those that were of this opinion affirmed, that the knowledge of men is but a remembrance and calling againe to minde of that which their soules had ty of God.

nion of soules

learned and did know in heauen at their first birth, before they entred into their bodies, according as we heard euen now. For being descended into this base and obscure prison, and hauing forgotten that which they knew, their memories are rubbed vp by doctrine and instruction bestowed vpon the, which kindleth again these celestiall sparkles of their mind, and portions of diuine fire, by inflaming them and causing them to burne that were almost vtterly quenched. Whereupon like Philosophers they conclude, that soules so infected by descending and entring into their bodies, cannot returne again nor bee received into heauen, & into the place assigned for the blessed spirits, vnlesse they returne pure & cleane, and decked with the selfe same ornaments wherewith they were adorned at their first birth. And this (they say) may be wrought by good instruction, by vertue & by good workes: or otherwise they say they haue sundry purgings being separated from their bodies. Some diuines among the Grecians haue followed, at leastwise in some part, the opinio of these Philosophers, & by name Origen, of whom S. Augustin thus writeth: *But we may marueile much more, that some beleeuing with vs, that there is but one only beginning of al things, & that no nature which is not God, can haue any being but from the Creatour, neuertheless would not beleene rightly and simply this point of the creation of the world that is so good & simple, namely, that God creating all those good things that were after him, although they were not the same that God is, notwithstanding they were all good. But they say, that the soules not being parts of God, but made of God, sinned in departing from the Lord, and so by sundry degrees according to the diuersity of sins, from the heaueus vnto the earth, haue merited sundry sorts of bodies to be as it were their chaines and setters. This say they, it is the world, and this was the cause of making the world, not to the end that the good things might bee created, but that euil things might be staied & expressed. Of this opinio is Origen, who is worthily to be blamed. These are the very words of this great Doctor of the Church. And by that which followeth in the same place, he plainly confuteth Origens error, who in his first booke of Beginnings writeth, that things without bodies were first made of God: and that amongst spirituall things, our spirits or minds were also created, which declining from their estate and dignity were made or named soules, of which the Greeke word ψυχη signifieth, as it wereto grow colde, and to decline from a better and more diuine estate, being so called, because it seemeth that the spirit or mind is waxen cold and fallen from this naturall and diuine heate. Therefore the soule lieth now in this estate and condition, but when it is repaired and amended it shall returne againe to the condition of a spirit or mind. Which being so, it seemeth that the departing & declining of the soule is not alike in al, but is turned either more or lesse in the soules: and that some spirits or minds doe yet retaine somewhat of their first vigour, other some, either nothing at all or very litle. These soules by reason of many defects of the spirit, stood in need of more grosse and solide bodies: so that for their sakes, this visible world was made and created so great that it might containe al those soules which were appointed to be exercised therein. And forasmuch as all of them did not depart alike from goodnes, the Creatour of all things took vnto himselve certaine seeds & causes of variety, to the end that according to the diuersity of sins, he might make the world variable & diuers. This is Origens sentence concerning soules, which selfe same opinion we may read also in S. Hierom writing to Anitus: whereby we may see how this opinion agreeth in part with that of the Platonists. For the greatest disagreement between them consisteth herein, that these Philosophers attributed the cause of the infection of soules to the bodies into which they were sent from heauē. And Origen with many that followed him, supposed that the soules were sent into bodies, as prisoners, to be punished for their offences committed in heauen. From such fancies haue issued so many dreams about soules as are to bee read in infinite writings. But do thou, ACHITO B, take occasion hereupon to continue our discourses.*

Of the opinion of the Platonists, and some others touching the substance of mens soales: in what sence not onely the Poets and Heathen Philosophers, but also S. Paul haue said that men were the generation and lineage of God: of their error that say, that soules are of the very substance of God: of the transmigration of soules according to the opinion of the same Philosophers. Chap. 84.

ACHITO B. It is wonderfull to consider, how hard a matter it is to finde out the truth of such things, as are commonly disputed of, because notwithstanding any solution solution or answer that is made, yet still some doubt may arise in our minds: inso much as there is no poynt how doubtfull soeuer it be, but that a man may alleadge likelihood both with it and against it. But this commeth to passe, especially in matters of greatest reach, the difficulty of which is so much the harder to be defined, as the true knowledge thereof is more necessary for vs. Those men therefore are happy, who are assured of that which they beleene, by certaine testimonies out of the word of truth: especially when the question is concerning the soule, which is the instrument of God whereby he worketh in vs and lifteth vs vp to the contemplation of this diuinity.

Now my companions, by your three former discourses wee may gather both what agreement and what difference there is amongst those whom you haue mentioned, touching their opinions, as well in regard of the birth of soules, as of their distinction, diuision, and corruption. For they agree herein, that they are not engendred with the body, neither of the same seede and matter, at least wise the reasonable soule: but say that it is of a celestiall, diuine and immortall nature. But herein they disagree, in respect of the nature of the matter, and about the time, creation, and birth of the soule, and also in regard of the meanes, by which it is defiled and infected with sinne. The Platonists affirme, that the soule is so extracted out of the diuine nature, that it is a part and portion thereof. Which thing cannot agree with the nature of God, because it would follow thereupon, that it were not one, but might be diuided into diuers parts: and that those parts of which the soules should be created, might be subiect to the pollution of sinne, a thing too contrary to the nature of God. Or else they must say, that there is but one soule in all and through all, and that God is this soule.

And this were to fall into their opinion who said that God was the soule of the world, and that the world was his body: which is far from the truth. For if it were so, then must God be mortall and corruptible in respect of his body, and that still one part or other should be corrupted, as we see corporall things daily to corrupt. On the other side, God should not then be infinit and incomprehensible, as he is, neither is it the world that comprehendeth and containeth him, but it is he who comprehendeth and containeth the world. Wherefore neither is the world God, neither is God the world, but the Creator thereof, and he by whom it is and doth consist. So that forasmuch as all these opinions are very strange, and vnworthy the diuine nature, they deserue not that wee should stay any longer in them as they that overthrow themselves. But I know well, that some would haue that place alleadged out of the Poet by Saint Paul, to serue their fantasticall opinion, where it is said, that we are the lineage and generation of God. For Saint Paul doth not alleadg it onely as an opinion of an Heathen Poet, but doth also approoue and confirme the same, taking his argument from thence, that our soule beeing of a spirituall and diuine nature, we ought to make the same account of God, whose lineage and generation wee are. Now albeit the Apostle speaketh thus, yet his meaning is not that the soules of men are of the very substance and essence of GOD, as wee say that the Father, the Sonne, and the holy Ghost, are one and the same essence and substance in the vinity of God, beeing distinguished, and not diuided into three persons. Neither doth hee meane, that the soules are engendred of the proper essence and substance of God, or that they proceede from it, as wee say that the Sonne is begotten of the Father, and that the holy Spirit proceedeth from the Father and the Sonne, according as it is testified vnto vs in the holy Scriptures. But hee would haue vs learne, that the soule of man is of another nature and substance, not only then the body of man is, but also then the soule of beafts, and that the nature and substance thereof is celestiall and diuine, not because it is drawne from the very substance and essence of God, but by reason of that difference which is betweene the soule of man, and the bodies and soules of beafts: and also in regard of that agreement which is betweene it and the diuine nature, both because of the immortality of the soule, as because it approacheth more neere to the nature of God then of any other creature, except the Angels, whom wee say, also are of a diuine nature and celestiall, for the like reason. For if the Angels and soules of men were of the proper substance and essence of GOD, they should not bee creatures, but Gods themselves, equall in substance and essence with him, as wee say of the Sonne begotten of the Father, and of the holy Ghost proceeding from them both, in the matter of the vinity and trinitie of the diuine nature: which by this meanes should bee diuided into parts, and so nothing at all resemble the fountaine and substance from which they are drawne, as I shewed euen now. And albeit the Philosophers and Heathen Poets did not so well

God is not the soule of the world.

The soule created of nothing.

Of the transmigration of soules.

vnderstand this matter as Saint Paul, neuertheless when they sayd, that the soule of man was of the diuine nature and part thereof, it is very likely they had regard to the reasons touched by mee, not meaning that it was of the very substance and essence of G O D. I speake of them that were of greatest vnderstanding and that wrote best: & namely of them that did best vnderstand the Philosophie of Plato. For hee confesseth and testifieth plainly, that the Angels themselues both good and badde, whom in his language he calleth Dæmones, as the other Grecians doe, are creatures of another essence and substance: then God is of, and that they are not immortall of themselues, but haue their immortality of GOD their Creatour, who both giueth it and preserveth them in it, and could take it from them if he would, and dissolue them as well as he hath made them. Now if he supposed God to speake so to his Angels, and to declare these things vnto them, a man may easily iudge, that hee placeth not the soules of men aboue the Angels, whom he taketh to be of a more excellent nature, as he sheweth evidently by that which he hath written of them both. In which writing we may see many things touching these matters, which come neerer to the doctrine of the holy Scriptures and of true religion, then in the writings of many others, who yeelded no further then they were able to know & conceiue by naturall things, without going any further. For they do not conceiue so well either of the nature of God, or of that of Angels, or of the soules of men, as this Philosopher doth. Moreover, wee are to know, that Plato had other helps, and more light then from his naturall reason, whereby hee attained to the vnderstanding of that, which others were ignorant of, who busied themselues onely about nature and naturall things. For he conuerfed with the Egyptians, as Pythagoras did before him, of whom they learned many points touching diuine things, which they should neuer haue learned of the Grecians, nor out of their Philosophy. For the Egyptians had great acquaintance and familiaritie with the people of Israel that dwelt in their land, & with many of the ancient Patriarkes, of whom they had learned many things of the diuinity, and of the nature of soules. But all they that haue beene destitute of the chief light of the spirit of God, haue still mingled many dreames amidst their writings, as wee haue already heard, and shall heare more in the sequelle of our speech. Yet first wee will note, how not onely many amongst the Heathen Philosophers, but also among the Christians haue imagined that the soules of men are the substance of G O D. I omit to speake of the Heretikes, as the Priscilianists, and some others that haue beene of this opinion, but I wonder at Lactantius, a man of a right Christian heart, who seemeth to haue beene of this opinion. And there haue beene some, that reasoned after this manner, that if it be to be vnderstood that of the breath issuing forth out of the mouth of God, the soule was created and inspired into the body of man, then it followeth thereupon, that it is of his very substance, and equall to that wisdom which saith, I am come out of the mouth of the most High. But that wisdom saith not, that she was breathed out of the mouth of God, but that she came out of it. Now as when wee breath, wee make a blast, not of our nature whereby wee are men, but of this ayre round about vs, which wee drawe in and out by breathing: so the Almighty God made a blast, not of his nature, nor of this creature of the aire round about vs, but euen of nothing. Which was sayd very fitly to haue beene inspired or breathed, when it was created in the body of man by God, who beeing himselfe vncorporeall, and not of a bodily substance, made the soule also incorporeall: but yet hee beeing vnchangeable, made the soule mutable, becauise himselfe beeing vncreated made that a creature.

But let vs goe on with the Philosophy of the Platonists. Wee haue heard their opinion touching the birth of soules, their entry into the body, and the pollution which they receive thereby: namely, that the soules of men are created long before their bodies, but are afterward sent into them when they are begotten and born in the world, at which time they are defiled, as hath beene declared. But further, according to the opinion of Pythagoras, who is sayd to be the first Authour thereof, they imagined, that after a soule was once entred into a body, it neuer ceased to goe from body to body, entring into one body out of another. So that when it went out of one body it entred into another, whether it were of a man, or of a beast, or of a plant. For they put no difference betweene the bodies of any liuing creatures whatsoever: but speake, as if euery soule were fit for euery body: so that according as euery soule guided and governed it selfe in that body in which it had liued before, it was receiued into another body, beeing such a one as it had deserued, eyther by her vices, or by her vertues. Therefore those that had taken the way of vertue.

entered into humane bodies worthy their vertue, into such as had beene called to honourable offices and estates: and as vertue had preuayled most with euery one, so were they more or lesse honoured in their bodies. And if so bee they had ledde a brutish rather then a humane and reasonable life, they passed into the bodies of Plants, or of beastes, whose nature resembled the life which they had ledde in their former bodies.

This Transmigration of Soules they called Regeneration, because it was vnto them as it were a generation and new birth, in respect of their life and conuersation, which before they ledde in the world. Moreouer, they accounted this regeneration to bee a kinde of purification and satisfaction, because that by this meanes euery soule was punished or rewarded, honoured or dishonoured, according to her worthinesse or vnworthinesse, and that so long vntill shee were reduced to her first and right estate. There haue beene Heretikes of olde, who following the opinion of the Platonists, affirmed, that no soule could bee fully purged and bee at rest, and cease from passing out of the one body into another, vntill such time as it hath done and finished whatsoeuer can be done in the world, whether good or euill: accounting both euill deeds and good deeds, vices as well as vertues to bee a kinde of penance and purgation of soules. Besides, these Heritikes affirmed, as the Libertines their succellours doe the like in our dayes, that there was no sin but only in the opinion and fancy of men, and that it is but a concept in their minde that breedeth this opinion.

The regeneration of the Pythagoreans.

A kind opinion of certain Hereticks.

Now when I thinke vpon this manner of regeneration and passage of the soule from one body to another, I muse how it is possible that euery man, especially those that are taken for such great Philosophers, should fall into such foppery, & above all how Plato should be of that opinion, who is by them surnamed, The diuine. For first of all, wee haue already learned by our discourses of the nature both of body and soule, that the soule cannot dwell nor exercise her offices in any other then in the body of a man, seeing that it is the true forme and perfection of man and of that kinde, without which he cannot be man. We may say the same of the soule of beastes and of plants. For if euery creature had not his proper forme and some thing in which the perfection of it consisteth, without which it cannot bee that which it is, and by which it differeth in kinde from other creatures, there would bee a wonderfull confusion throughout all nature, yea the whole order thereof would bee ouerturned. For all kindes of nature should bee confounded together, neither should there be any one kinde certaine and distinct: which thing is contrary to all naturall reason, and to all order appointed by God. Therefore it is a very hard matter to beleue, that euery man of a sound mind and good iudgement, would admit of such a fantastical opinion. But we may learne of thee ASER, in proceeding with the matter of our discourse, what thou hast learned of skilfull men concerning this that Plato hath written of this transmigration of soules.

Against the transmigration of soules.

The chiefe causes, as learned men thinke, that moued Pythagoras and Plato to broach the transmigration of soules and transformation of bodies: the auncient opinion of the Iewes touching the same thing. Chap. 85.

ASER. The world was neuer without certaine witty men, that boasted they could answer vpon a sodaine to any thing that should bee demaunded of them. And there haue beene alwayes some others, that in euery controuersie and disputation maintained one while this part, and by and by: the contrarie: which hath giuen occasion as I thinke, to certaine of the auncient Philosophers to beleue, that a man can know nothing perfectly, & that no man ought certainly to determine any thing otherwise then vpon his bare and simple opinion. But in my mind this consideration wil find but few defenders now a dayes, except it bee amongst the ignorant, who leauing all search of things, liue onely at all aduenture, or else amongst them that beleue euery thing that is tolde them, and are led with euery sentence, which they heare of others, without any further inquirie made of the reason thereof. Now as we would be loath to perish with the ignorant, so we must beware that we commit not our selues and our beleefe so easily to the danger of other mens errors. And indeede oftentimes we iudge not aright of their meaning, namely, when the question is concerning the sense of their writing. As I purpose to let you see my companions, in that which hath beene already spoken of Plato.

Why Plato invented the transmigration
of soules

I haue learned of many skilfull men, that Pitthagoras and Plato neuer beleueed that transmigration of soules into many bodies, which we reade in their writings, but that by these fained kinds of speech, their meaning was rather to withdraw men from beastly affections vnworthy their nature, and thereby to paint out and to expresse the diuersitie of those affections, and to set them, as it were, before their eies: thereby to declare vnto them, how by reason of their vnruely affections they resemble all other creatures, and chiefly bruit beastes. Wherefore we may with good reason call man a litle world, if there were no other cause but this, albeit in this respect it standeth not with his honour and credit. For there is no kinde of beast whatsoeuer, nor yet of any other creature vnto which hee doth not in some sort transforme himselfe by his affections, and by his manners and vices. For when he pleaseth, hee transformeth himselfe one while into a sheepe, then into a wolfe, againe into a foxe, or into a hogge, or into a dogge, or into a beare, or into a Lyon, or into some other such like beast. Moreover, sometimes he transfigureth himselfe, not onely into one kinde of beast, but into many together, and yet those very differing and contrary the one from the other. And as he can at his pleasure transforme himselfe into an Angell, so doth he likewise turne himselfe into a Diuell. It is not then altogether voide of reason that Plato sayth, that the nature of man is as it were a monstrous nature: yea hee compareth it to a Monster, whose vppermost parts resembleth a Virgine: whose breast, which is the midst, is like to a Lyon: and the lowest part, to a barking and bawling dogge. For hee compareth the highest part to a Virgin, because he placeth reason in the head, as in the proper seate thereof, and of the animall powers of the Soule, for their nature and office sake. Next, he saith that the breast resembleth a Lion, because he taketh the heart to be the seate of the Vitall power of the Soule, and also of the affections, that often may well be likened to a Lyon and to furious beastes. Lastly, he compareth the lower partes to dogges, because that part is appointed to be the seate of the naturall and nourishing power of the soule, and of the generative vertue, as that which is very brutish and giuen to all carnall pleasures, and chiefly to fornication. If then a man cannot moderate his affections and concupiscences, hee maketh himselfe like to so many beastes, as he hath affections holding of their nature. This also is the cause, why the spirit of God in the holy Scriptures, so often compareth men to sundry sortes of beasts, to teach vs that they are as it were transformed into them, and into hideous and horrible monsters, to the end they might be the more ashamed of themselves: and that knowing how they turne themselves into beastes and into Diuels by their vices, they should learne also, how contrariwise through vertue they become men of beastes, and Angels of Diuels. Therefore it is very like, that Pitthagoras and Plato had respect to this which hath beene said in those transformations and transmutations of soules, of which they spake. I thinke also that the Poets, following the same inuention haue for the like reason, fained the transformations of men into diuers beasts, and into other creatures forged by them: but men through ignorance haue taken them in a wrong sense, and so reaped small profit by them. No maruell then if this hath happened both to Philosophers and Poets in their doctrine and manner of teaching, seeing there are so many that profit so little by the doctrine of the holy Scriptures themselves, and by the study thereof. For were there euer any Heretikes, that did not wrest the sense of many places of Scripture to make them serue for their heresie? And doe we not daily see the like in all seducers and false Prophets? It is very certaine, that there were neuer any so absurd and strange heresies, which the fauourers of them haue not laboured to maintaine by the holy Scriptures themselves.

But to returne to our purpose, what meaning soeuer the Authors and inuencers of such things had, their doctrine was so vnderstoode, that many helde this opinion, that mens soules passed from body to body, as we haue heard. Insomuch that this error how grosse soeuer it were, came not onely to the Iewes, but to the Christians also, who boast of true religion, and of the authority and knowledge of the holy Scriptures. I speake not of the Manichees ancient Heretiks, who were open maintainers of this opinion. But what shal we say of them, who not onely haue their braines infected with this folly, but which is worse, imagine they can confirme and prooue it by testimonies out of the worde of God? As where it is reported, that when Herode heard the fame, of Christ Iesus spreade throughout all

all Iudea, hee saide, This is Iohn Baptist: hee is risen againe from the dead, and therefore great workes are wrought by him. And Saint Luke saith expressly, That Herode doubted, because that it was saide of some, that Iohn was risen againe from the dead: and of some, that Elias had appeared: and of some, that one of the olde Prophets was risen againe. Wee read likewise that when Iesus Christ demanded of his Disciples, saying, Whome doe men say that I, the Sonne of man am? they answered, Some say, Iohn Baptist: and some Elias: others, Ieremias, or one of the Prophets: and some that one of the olde Prophets is risen againe. A man may iudge by these speeches, that not onely Herode was tainted with this Pythagoricall and Platonick opinion, but also that it was very common among the Iewes with whom hee conuersed, and whose religion he followed, at least in part and in outward shewe. For Iesus Christ was knowne well enough in Iudea, and in Galilea, and amongst all the Iewes, as it appeareth by the testimony of the Euangelists. They knewe his kindred according to the flesh, and coulde tell that he was brought vp in Nazareth in the countrey of Galilea: for which cause they called him a Galilean, a Nazarean, a Carpenter, the sonne of a Carpenter, and the sonne of Ioseph and Marie. They saide that they knewe his brethren and sisters, whereby according to the Hebrew manner of speaking, they meant his cousins, Nieces, and his kindred: taking occasion thereby to despise and reiect him. But on the other side, many seeing the workes and miracles which he wrought, were constrained to passe farther, euen Herode himselfe, hearing onely the fame that went of him throughout the country: so that some tooke him to be that Christ, others, to be some great Prophet. And of them that held him for a Prophet, it appeareth by those sundry opinions that were among the people, that they did not thinke him to be a Prophet borne at that time, but that some one of the olde Prophets was reason againe in him, not in body but in spirit. For they knew well whence he issued in respect of his bodie, as that which was commonly knowne throughout the country. Therefore it is easie to iudge that they spake of resurrection, in regarde of the soule, as the skilfullest Interpreters expounde these places, referring these speeches of Herode and of the people vnto that Pythagoricall opinion, of the transmigration of soules from bodie to bodie. For according therunto, those soules that had behaved themselves vertuously in their first bodies in which they dwelt, were sent into other more honourable bodies, endued with greater gifts of God according to their deseruing. Nowe because Saint Iohn the Baptist had not the gift of miracles annexed to his Ministerie, neither did worke any, all his life time, it might be thought that this gaue occasion to Herode to thinke thus of him, that beeing risen againe from the dead after a Pythagoricall manner, hee had this gift and vertue added vnto his former graces, that so hee might haue the greater authoritie. Neither ought we to thinke it very straunge, if a great part of the Iewes were infected with manie foolish and naughtie opinions, seeing they were not onely corruptly instructed by their teachers, but also had sects amongst them there, which plainly denied the resurrection of the bodie, the immortalitie of soules, and that there was any Angel or spirit. Therefore we see the great brutishnesse who would ground their transmigration, vpon that which is said in the Scriptures touching the opinion of the Iewes in this point, which notwithstanding is openly reprehended and condemned by the selfe same worde of GOD, True it is, that the ignorance of the true sense thereof gaue occasion to many to fall into such dreames. For the Lord speaking thus by Malachie, Beholde I will sende you Elias the Prophet, before the coming of great and fearefull day of the Lord, the Iewes vnderstood this place diuersly. Some of them thought, that the auncient Prophet Elias, who was rapt vp into heauen, should bee sent againe in proper person: others vnderstoode it onely of the transmigration of his soule and spirit into an other body. For this cause they asked of Iohn Baptist whether hee were Elias: but Iesus Christ himselfe expounded those wordes of Malachie, and declared vnto the Iewes that Iohn Baptist was that Elias which should come, and that although hee were come yet they did not know him. For when hee spake so of him, hee meant not that hee was the very person of Elias in bodie and soule or that the naturall soule and spirit of Elias was entred into his body: but his meaning was according as the Angel spake to Zachary, when he tolde him of the Natiuitie of Saint Iohn his sonne, saying, He shall be filled with the holy Ghost, euen from his mothers wombe. And many of the children of Israel shall be turned to their Lord God. For he shall goe before him in the spirit and power of Elias, A man may easily iudge by these words, that he meant not to say, that the naturall spirit of Elias should enter into the body of Saint Iohn Baptist, but that God would giue a spirit adorned with such gifts and spirituall graces, and with such zeale and constancie as he gaue long before to Elias. Therefore he addeth power vnto spirit, thereby to declare the better what is meant by Spirit. And before he shewed the meanes whereby this spirit should be given him, when he said, that hee should be filled with the holy Ghost from his mothers wombe: that is with the gifts and graces thereof, as the Scripture calleth them ordinarily. Afterwardes also, the Angels declareth more at large, after what manner Saint Iohn came in the power and spirit of Elias, signifying that hee ought to behaue himselfe and to doe as Elias had done in his time, and as Melachy had foretolde of him. Moreouer wee haue in the Scripture other kindes of speaking, that agree verie fitly with this of the Angell, so that the one may well serue to open the other. For it is written of Moses, that the Lord did separate of the spirit that was vpon him, and did put it vpon the sennientie annient men, whome hee appointed vnder him to be an helpe and comfort vnto him in the gouernement of the people of Israel: and when the spirite rested vpon them they prophecied continually. Every one knoweth, that the spirit of Moses whereof the Lord speaketh, is not his naturall spirite but that hee meaneth by this spirite, part of the gifts and graces which Moses had receiued of the Lord, such as were necessarie for their charge: as likewise hee gaue to Moses according to the charge committed to him. Some also vnderstand this separation of the spirite of Moses, to be onely a communication of the graces of the spirite of God, like to those which Moses had receiued for his charge that was given to those, who were ioyned vnto him for his helpe. Now if we take it in this sence we may say that God vseth this manner of speech, the better to let vs vnderstand thereby the nature of his gifts and graces, and the meanes hee obserueth in dispensing of them. For hee doth not onelie distribute so much as is needefull for them whome hee mindeth to employ in his worke, but giueth also vnto them such manner of graces as are requisite for the worke, as Saint Paul testifieth. Besides all this, his purpose is also to teach vs what agreement there is betwixt all his gifts: as likewise what vnitie proceedeth heereof betwixt them that are partakers of these gifts, whereby wee may perceiue that they come all from one spirit, which, albeit God thereby powreth out his graces in so great abundance, is yet a fountaine and sea that is not onely not dried vp, but not so much as anie way diminished.

Numb. 11. 25.

The fountaine of Gods graces diminisheth not.

2. King. 2. 9.

Thus wee see how one and the same Spirit of GOD governed Moses, and the rest that were ioyned with him, inspiring them all with his grace, and distributing to every one according to his measure: as the winde is dispenced in many Organ-pipes al at once, according to their seuerall capacitie, and according to that sound which every one is to yeelde for the making of a good harmony: or as many Candles or Lampes are lighted by an other, with the same fire wherewith that was first kindled. Also wee are to vnderstand in this sence, the request that Eliscus made to Elias, when hee demanded a double portion of his Spirit, because hee succeeded him: in regarde whereof hee stood in neede of such gifts and graces of Gods Spirit, as Elias was guided by, that hee might faithfully execute his charge as hee had done before. Thus wee see howe places of Scripture expound one an other, and how little they helpe the Pythagoreans: of whome I woulde not haue made so long a discourse if this fopperie were driuen out of mens braines, and namely among Christians. For to this day there are two manie fantastical heads (I say not amongst true Christians) but amongst them that falsely beare that name, who are as much or rather more infected heere with, then any Pythagoreans or Platonists in former times. And for this cause, AMANA, I leaue you to goe on with this point, that afterwards wee may returne to our chiefe matter of the nature, generation and immortality of the soule.

Of the Pythagoreans of these dayes amongst Christians, and of their foolish opinions: of the opinions of many doctors and diuines touching the creation and ordinary generation of mens soules: of the moderation that ought to be kept in that matter: of the cause of the filthines and corruption of mans soule. Chap. 86.

AMANA. There was neuer yet any opiniõ, error, or heresie so strange or monstrous in the world, which hath not alwaies found men enough to receiue it, so that there were authors & matters to broach it abroad. For God doth thus punish the curiosity, ingratitude, malice, & peruersenes of men, and that contempt of his word & truth, which is ordinarily in them, together with the pleasure and delight they take in vanity and lies. Wherefore God through through his iust iudgement deliuereth them vp into a reprobate sence, inso much as they can not but reiect the truth continually and embrace that which is false, according as he often threatned them, & foretolde it by his Prophets & Apostles. And this is the cause why the Pythagoreans doe at this day finde men void of sence and vnderstanding who cleaue to their fantastical opinions, and why Epicures and Atheists are neuer without a great number of disciples.

Now albeit these men be in truth most blockish & grosse beasts, yet we cannot perswade them so, nor many others also, who imagine they know much. For there are euen doctors and some that reade lectures in Vniuersities, who keepe not their opinion of the transmiration of soules so secret to themselves, but they make some profession thereof, at least wise amongst their schollers & familiar acquaintance. There are some also, who, boast of the knowledge of tongues and of the turning ouer of many antiquities, haue published this fancy of theirs in books written by them: yea they themselves are perswaded, & they would make others believe the same with them, that their soules are the very soules of some famous personages that haue liued heretofore in the world, and that they haue already passed through many excellent bodies, which haue done great things: as likewise they promise to themselves, that they shal bring to passe great matters, seeing they haue their soules. True it is, that according to our manner of speaking wee say some times of such as agree in manners with others who haue liued before them, that their soules whom they resemble is entred into them, and that the others are raised vp in their persons. For example sake, if there bee a cruell tirant like to Nero, we say that Neroes soule is entred into his body, and that Nero is raised vp in him. But yet every one knoweth wel enough, that wee vse to speake so by reason of the agreement of tures and of manners, not because of any transmigration of soule.

The Pythagoreans of our time.

Of the true transmigration of soules.

And this may be spoken in respect of that Diuillish spirit, which possesseth the wicked and ruleth in them: as we say of the spirit of Gods seruants in regard of his vertue, that it is giuen to such as resemble them and haue receiued the same graces from aboue. For as the holy spirit, who wrought heeretofore in others, worketh now also in them that haue receiued like grace: euen so it is said of that euill spirit in regard of the wicked, who are all led with the selfe same spirit of Sathan. Wherefore hee doth such workes in them whom hee now possesseth, as he wrought heretofore in their predecessours. So that in this sence it skilleth not though we say that the spirit of one entreteth into another, who succeedeth him in the same wicked works. But the Pythagorians of whom I now spake, take it not so, but as hath bin already declared. And to set the more color vpon this so strange an opinion, their prophaneenes is such, that they dare to alleadge those places of scripture, which were spoken of in the former discourse, whereby they labour to perswade themselves and others also with them, that the word of God confirmeth the same. No doubt therefore, but that they who haue yet such toyes in their head, are not without others also: yea, there is no question, but that there are wonderfull puddles of errors and of very strange heresies in their fantastical braines, so that they are ougly monsters among men, and would be abhorred of every one, if that which they carry enclosed in their frantike heads might be seene with corporall eies. But leauing this point, we are to returne to our principall matter into which we haue made some entrance, namely, the nature and originall, the pollution, purgation, and immortalitie of the soule of man: concerning which thing, wee haue heard the opinion of the Philosophers, and of many that follow them. Whereupon wee haue to obserue this, that notwithstanding any error in opinion which they held, yet they alwaies came to this point, that they concluded the immortalitie of the soule.

Now as touching the ancient Doctors of the Church and the late Diuines, they haue written diuersly of the originall of mens soules and of their entrance into their bodies: about which point there haue beene and are at this day, great disputations and controuersies, namely, amongst the Physicians and the Diuines. Some haue beene of that opinion touching the generation and beginning of the soule with the body, whereof we haue already spoken. But some restraine this to that soule which they call Vegetative and Sensitive, as hath bin shewed vnto vs, others comprehend also the reasonable soule therewithal. And besides that which we haue spoken already touching originall sin in the soule, they ground themselves vpon that which is written in Genesis, how that after God had created man, who was the last in the creation of all the creatures, hee rested the seventh day from the worke which hee had made, after he had accomplished whatsoever it pleased him to doe. Therefore they conclude, that from that time forward God created not any new creatures,

but hauing set such an order as it pleased him to appoint in the nature of things created, he preferred the same afterwards by his providence, whereby he worketh alwaies in the guiding and consideration of his creatures, although not after that manner whereby hee worketh in the creating of them. And thus he rested in regard of the worke of creation, so as he created no more any creatures in such sort and manner as hee did the first creatures in the beginning. Neuerthelesse, hee rested not in respect of the worke of his providence, which neuer ceaseth, but daily createth all those creatures that come newly into the world, by meanes of those seedes, which hee hath put into euery one of them according to their kindes, and by other meanes which hee hath ordained to that purpose. Hauing then laid this foundation, they conclude that mens soules are not daily created of nothing, nor in such maner as the soule of the first man was created, but by that meanes which God then appointed for the preservation of mankind. But because they know well enough that there is great difference betwixt the soules of men and of brute beasts, they agree that God useth other meanes in the procreation and producing of mens soules, then in that of beasts, by the concurring of his generall action, whereby he sustaineth and preserveth the natures of all things, according to that naturall disposition which he hath indued them with from the beginning, agreeable to that which is written, that In him we liue, & mooue, and haue our being. Therefore as God vsed other meanes in the creation of the soule of man, then he did in that of beasts, and placed it also in the body of man after an other fashion that was speciall and peculiar vnto man: even so in the procreation and production of mens soules, he hath his speciall order for them, which differeth from the order vsed in the generation of the soule of beasts. And indeede he sheweth very evidently, that hee ruleth after another fashion in the production of men, and namely, in regard of the soule, then in that of beasts, by the excellent gifts wherewith their soules are adorned, not onely in that their soules doe far exceede the soules of beasts, but also in that one soule excelleth another in the nature of man: as we see it in many to whom God hath given heroicall spirits, which are gifts that cannot proceede from the body. And so much for the opinion of these men.

Gen. 2. 7.

Others do not only deny the reasonable soule to be taken from any portion either of the diuine nature & essence, or of the body of man, but they say farther, that God by his diuine power and vertue createth it of nothing, after that the body of the infant is made perfect in the womb of the mother, hauing all the parts and members thereof. And being thus created of God he presently placeth it within that bodie, which he hath appointed for the lodging of it, that it may dwell therein vntill after the death of the body it depart immortall out of it, as it was created immortall, and was so indeede when it entred thereinto. These men ground themselves vpon that which we reade in Genesis, where it is said, that after God fashioned mā of the dust of the earth, he breathed into him the breath of life, & he was made a liuing soule. For it appeareth plainly by this testimony of Moses, that the soule of the first man was not onely not created together with the body, as the soule of beasts was, but also that it was giuen vnto him of some other nature and substance. For if there were no more in it then in that of beasts, and if it had no kinde of participation with the diuine nature, why should God inspire it into the body of man after another fashion then he did that of beasts? and what should that inspiration or breathing of God, signifie & import? We haue heard already what some answer vnto this. For they deny nothing of all this, but they say onely, that God did then establish this order now spoken of, which hee daily continueth in the generation of man. I omit heere many other opinions touching this matter, which come not so neere vnto the truth: namely a great controuersie betwene the Doctors in Diuinitie and in Physicke touching the vegetatiue, and sensitiue soule, and the time when the burthen beginneth to be nourished and to haue sense thereby: considering that it is a great deale better to enquire of these things to sobriety, and to leaue the resolution to GOD, who knoweth that which is hidde from vs, then by vaine questions and curious disputations to thinke to determine of the matter according to truth, and to the contentation of euery one. For as wee haue before touched, we can know nothing either of the generation, or original or of the substance and nature of our soule, or of the immortalitie thereof, but onely of those testimonies which by the effects it affoordeth vnto vs, and which God setteth downe in his word. Wherefore according to that which hath beene already handled, we must distinguish those things vnto which our mindes may in some sort reach, and of which wee may haue some knowledge, from them that are so hidden from vs, that we cannot know or iudge of any thing, but like blinde men, by groping and guessing.

This

This is a matter then of which we must speake very soberly, and with great reuerence of God, contenting our selues with that which it pleaseth him to make knowne vnto vs by the meanes afore said, and goe no further by desiring to know that which we cannot conceiue or comprehend, vntill such time as God himselfe shall giue vs more ample and cleere knowledge thereof. And I suppose we shall not erre, if we say the like touching the question propounded by vs in the beginning of our speech about this matter, namely, of the meanes by which the reasonable soule should be infected with originall sinne, seeing it is not engendered of that corrupt seede of which the bodie is bred. Let it then suffice vs to know, that albeit the soule cannot be defiled with sinne, as it is created of God, yet as God created all mankind in Adam, so when he fell, all the rest of the world fell with him, and in him was bereaued both of originall iustice, and of other gifts which he lost by his fall. So that albeit mens soules are created and produced of God pure and entire, yet they keepe not that purity still, neither can they be the soules of men and ioyned vnto their bodies, and so become members of mankind in them with any other condition, then with that into which the first father brought all his children by his sinne, as we haue before touched. Wherefore wee must not search for the cause of that originall sin wherewith they are infected, either in their creation, because they are created by God of a diuine and immortall essence: or in the generation of the body and in that seede of which it is ingendered, as if the soule tooke her originall and infection together with the body from the seed. Moreover, we must not (as the Pythagorians do) search for the corruption of soules in their entrance and coniunction with their bodies, as if they receiued it from them: but we must seeke it in that blot of sinne vnto which the whole race of mankind was made subiect through the fall and corruption of the first stocke, and in that decree of God, whereby hee hath condemned all mankind by his iust iudgement, without any further enquiry after the meanes and manner how it came to passe. For this cause Saint Paul doth bring vs backe to this consideration, when in propounding vnto vs the first stocke of mankind, he saith, that by one man sinne entred into the world, and by sinne death. And then he propounded vnto vs this stocke of sinne, so on the contrary side, he propoundeth to vs the stocke of iustice and righteousnesse, namely Christ Iesus, the new man, who is an other stocke of mankind regenerated, renewed, and reformed after the image of GOD. Therefore he saith, that as by the disobedience of one man, many were made sinners, so by the obedience of one, many are made righteous. Now as humane Philosophie knoweth not, either the corruption of all mankind such as it is, or the fountaine thereof, so it is ignorant of the meanes whereby it must be restored, neither knoweth it that the wound is so great and mortall, as that it cannot be cured but only by the hand of God. For which cause he was to giue vs his owne sonne to be the Surgion and Phisition. The ignorance heereof, is the cause why humane Philosophie so greatly magnifieth the nobility and excellencie of the soule, as it is well worthie being considered in the first nature, in which it was created. But the sequele of this matter we will heare of thee, ARAM.

The nature of the soule is not curiously to be searched after.

How the soule is stained with sin.

Verse 19.

Humane Philosophie is blinde.

The causes of errors.

Of those powers and properties, which the soule of man hath common with the soule of beasts: of those powers and vertues, which are proper and peculiar to it selfe, according to the Philosophers: of the difference and agreement that is betweene humane Philosophie and Christian doctrine touching these things. Chap. 87.

ARAM. Amongst the heathen, they that were most ancient, and neere to the true Church of God, & conuersed most with his seruants, had greater knowledge and better vnderstanding of the nature of God, of Angells, and of mens soules, and of other matters belonging to true religion, then they that were farthest off and succeeded latest after the other. For the farther off that the doctrine of heauenly things was drawne from the fountaine of it, the more hath it beene altered and corrupted both by ignorance ouerwhelming it, and by false vnderstanding of it, as also because euery one hath added to and taken away what seemed him best: and that, either to boast themselues that they may seeme some body, or to cover their thefts, that none might know from whence that thing was first taken and borrowed, that so they might be thought to be the first members thereof: or lastly, to please please and satisfie the curiositie & vanitie of the mind of man. No maruell therefore, if there were heathen Philosophers among the ancients, who beleued and taught many things agreeable to the word of God, and if there be now some amongst vs, who boast of their study in Philosophie, and yet haue no part of that first innocencie and purity, but haue their mindes filled with strange opinions contrary to all reason and trueth. Wee see well enough by experience what impiety raigneth in this our age. For there are an infinite number to be found of whose religion no man can iudge, except it bee herein that they thinke there is none at all, and therefore mocke at all religion, what shew soeuer they make to the contrary. But I know not why they shoud not blush for shame, when they heare from heathen Philosophers so many goodly instructions as they haue left vs, concerning the nature and immortalitie of the soule.

It is true that the reason of man cannot of it selfe contemplate the soule in her first and perfect nature, in which it was created: but it doth consider of it as it is at this present, and yet as though it were verie sound. Whereupon the Philosophers greatly magnifie the nobilitie and excellencie thereof. Therefore when they are to consider of those points vpon which they ground the powers and vertues of the soule, for the first they take the vegetatiue vertue, which it hath common not onely with the beastes, but also with the plants: and this comprehendeth three other faculties vnderneath it, namely the vertue of nourishing, secondly of encreasing, and lastly of procreation, as it hath beene already declared vnto vs. This vertue with the rest that are comprehended vnderneath it, is the basest, most earthy and vilest of them all: besides that it followeth the sensitive vertue, which may be referred as well to the internall as to the externall senses. So that we may deuide it into two parts, and more properly call that the sensitive vertue, which the soule hath in taking knowledge of corporall things, by corporall senses, and by their vse in the body. The other part that belongeth to the internal senses may more specially be called, the cognitive vertue. And because these two powers serue to encrease knowledge and vnderstanding, they are as it were the fountaine therof, or rather helps and instruments. The Astronomers, who refer all to the vertue of starres & planets, place the influence of the vegetatiue power with the parts of it, vnder the Moone, of which the soule (as they say) receiueth it: the other two parts of the sensitive power, of which I spake euen now, they place vnder the Sunne, as they doe the fourth, which is the will and vertue of desiring, vnder the planet Venus. The fift, which is called the angry facultie, giuing heart and courage to a man and moouing him to wrath, vnder the planet Mars. Then for the sixt they place the vertue that giueth motion from one place to another. For the seventh, that which the Physicians call the vitall vertue, and others the spirituall, because it containeth vnder it the power of respiration, and both these are attributed to the same, because it is a propertie of the sensitive power to moue and breath. Now all these powers of the soule are common to man with beastes, or at leastwise there is no great difference. But these which now follow are proper and peculiar vnto him, namely the reasonable power, of which the other that ensue are kinds, of which number the Philosophers or Astronomers place in the first ranke the vertue of speech, whereby the soule expresth her conceits, thoughts and affections. And although all men vse not the same words to vtter their thoughts each to other, by reason of the diuersity of languages that is amongst them, notwithstanding as the things which they vnderstand and conceiue, and by which they are moued to speake, are all of one substance and nature amongst all nations, so all the conceits and affections of men, which are signified by their language, are alike in the soule and minde, where they are written and ingrauen. This vertue they attribute to Mercurie, as the other that followeth to Iupiter, which they call the practicke and active vertue, whereby a man that hath his will at libertie, doth by counsaile and settled reason, exercise and bring to passe through arte, prudence, and wisdom, those things of which he hath sure knowledge. For it is not enough to haue the contemplatiue vertue, vnles the active also be ioyned vnto it to declare it by effect.

Thus you see where they place free will, which comprehendeth vnder it, first election, then action, which is the practicke that followeth it. And because the practicke dependeth of the theoricke, which is the speculatiue and contemplatiue vertue, and goeth before the active vertue, therefore they ioyne this to that, and so referre it to the planet of Saturne which is melancholike. And this is that vertue of the soule, whereby man hath vnderstanding, knowledge, and wisdom: and it comprehendeth the seats of such things as the mind is able to vnderstand & comprehend, as also those general rules and principles, which it must afterward bring into vse and practise. For this cause this speculatiue vertue must of necessitie goe before the actiue, because the practise is not very certaine without the theoricke. Afterward followeth that which they call the politike vertue, which hath for her subiect all morall Philosophy. They vnderstand by this vertue of the soule, that whereby a prudent, wise, and well experienced man, moderateth his naughty desires, and pernicious affections through his vertue, and whereby he declareth by practise and settled reason, that vertue and goodnesse, which is requisit in the publike societie of men, and that not only in his private behauiour, but also in his publik affaires. The principal vertues contained vnderneath it, are prudence, Iustice, fortitude and temperance, which are commonly called cardinall vertues, because they are chiefe and containe vnder euery one of them many other vertues, which depend of them, as branches doe of their stocke. He is accompted a ciuill good man and iust, that hath this vertue which is diuided into sundry kinds, according to the diuersitie of estates that are in common societie. For it is sufficient for a private person to haue so much of it, as whereby he may know how to guide himselfe honestly according to his estate. If he be a father of a family, he hath need of that prudence and skill which is necessarie for the gouernment of his house. If he haue any publike charge concerning ciuill affaires, it is needfull for him to haue that art and skill, and those vertues without which he cannot well execute his office, according to that place and degree in which he is set. For if he occupieth the roome of a Lawyer, or counsellor at the Law, he must haue skil and knowledge of the lawes. If he be a capitaine or souldier, he must be skilfull in militarie discipline. If he be a Iudge & magistrate, it is necessary likewise, that he vnderstand what belongeth to his office. If he be a diuine & pastor in the Church, the sciēce of diuinity, which is the knowledge of the holy scriptures, is necessarie for him not only so much as is requisit for his owne saluation, but also that he may be able to instruct others, & to direct the in those things that appertaine to religion. Besides, to all these vertues they adde the heroicall vertue, which is no vulgar and common vertue, but very rare and excellent, and if I may so speak, rather diuine then humane. In regard wherof they that were endued with this vertue among the heathen, were placed in a ranke & degree by themselves between God & men, and were accompted & taken for demy-gods. And these are those vertues, which the Philosophers by experience find to be in the reasonable soule, which are no fained or imaginative, but true vertues, neither are they found in the soules of beasts, as those are of which wee speake in the first place. Wherefore albeit man hath the vertue of desiring common with beasts, yet he hath reason to moderat his desires, which is wanting in beasts. Now al this doctrine touching the vertues of the soule, accordeth well with the doctrine of Christianity, so far forth as the soule agreeth with that nature in which it was first created of God. But that which the Astrologians affirme of the influences & infusion of vertues into the soule by the planets, as we heard, I take it to be a bird of their own braine, whereby they attribute to the creatures that which belongeth to the Creator onely. For although he vseth the creatures according to that order, which he hath placed in them, neuertheles when the question is of the reasonable soule, wee must ascend vp higher then the heauens, vnto which it cannot be subiect as the body is, seeing it is of a far more excellent nature. For how should the heauens, stars, and planets giue that to the soule, which theselues haue not? I verely beleeeue that when God created the soule of the first man, & placed it in the body that was before created of the nature and substance of the corruptible elements, he tooke not those vertues, with which hee endued and adorned it, either from the heauens or from the planets. And seeing he created all mankind in this first man after his image, which he imprinted in his soule, no doubt but that which yet remaineth in mans soule, proceedeth from the same fountaine: also what euill soeuer is befallen since, wherby this image abode not perfect, it proceedeth from sin, & from the nature of man corrupted by sin, and not from the heauens or planets. And as the Astrologians easily beleeeue whatsoeuer they haue imagined touching this point, and would haue the will of man subiect to their influences & constellations: so the other Philosophers abuse themselves greatly, in magnifying the vertues of the soule more then they ought to be esteemed in this corrupt estate of mans nature, not iudging the corruption to be so great as it is. Hereof it is also that they faile in regard of vertue, which they attribute altogether to the liberty of man, as if he could by his owne vertue moderate his affections, & make himselfe iust and righteous. Which fault proceedeth from hence in that they content themselves with a iustice that seemeth so to be before men, & put no difference betweene diuine and humane iustice: that is, betwixt that which is able to stand & approue it self in the iudgement of God, & that which men approue. For there is no iustice able to satisfie the iudgement of God, but that of Iesus Christ, which it pleaseth him to impute vnto his children, and in regard thereof to accompt them iust. But let vs returne to our matter.

We haue further to note, that besides the fornamed vertues, the Platonists attribute to the soule foure others, which they call contemplative vertues, as those that belong to the contemplative life, vnto which they are referred by them. The first is named the purgation or second death of the soule: for the first death of it say they, is her descending into the body of man, into which it is thrown as it were into a prison, and in a maner buried in vices. Therefore they say that the soule standeth in need of this second death, whereby she beeing purged from her vices is as it were dead vnto them, that she may liue vnto vertue: The second kind of these vertues is called pure or purified, because the soule beeing purged from all her euill affections, exerciseth good works by the same. The third is called by them an exemplary or patterne vertue in the minde of God: whereby they meane, that as God conceiueth and knoweth the Ideas, kindes and images of all sensible & intelligible thing, so he sendeth down from heauen this vertue into the soule, of man who is thereby purged and purified as wee haue already heard. And for the last they adde a fourth vertue, which they account greatest and chiefest aboue the other, and therefore they call it Divine, because it bringeth to the soule a vertue to doe more then humane workes, euen such as wee call miraculous workes. Which foure kinds of vertues appeare evidently to haue beene drawne by them from christian doctrine, but yet disguised after their fashion. As touching the first, it agreeth to that which the word of God teacheth vs of regeneration, and mortification of the flesh, whereby we die to sinne and to the diuell, that we may liue to righteousness and to God. The second agreeth to good works proceeding of faith, which being done in the same, purifie the heart, and to christian holinesse, which accompanieth and followeth iustification by faith. The third agreeth to gifts and graces inspired by the holy Ghost, and to the infusion of them into the soules of Gods true seruants: and the fourth agreeth to the giftes of prophecy and to that vertue of working miracles, which hath beene heretofore in the holy Prophets, Apostles, and Disciples of Iesus Christ. But to conclude this whole point, we are to obserue this, that what praise soeuer may be giuen to the Platonick Diuinity, yet it is in no respect to be compared with Christian Philosophy: because this is pure, and true, and endited by the spirit of GOD, but the other impure, disguised and counterfained by men, who haue mingled with their Philosophy, many things which they could either heare or learne out of the holy Scripture.

Moreover, as concerning the whole doctrine of the Philosophers touching the nature and vertues of the soule, we may truelie say, that of it selfe it reacheth higher, then those politike vertues of which we made mention euen now. For when a ciuill, good, and wise man hath attained to that politike vertue and to the highest degree thereof, he is able to goe no farther, except he be holpen else where, euen by the illumination of the holy Spirit. And indeede all those other vertues of the soule propounded by the Platonists, are but dreames and opinions in the ayre, by which the Spirit of error laboureth to disguise the doctrine of the holy Scriptures, which leadeth vs to those true supernaturall vertues, which the soule receiueth by the inspiration and infusion of the gifts and graces of the holy Spirit, who is the true Doctour, of whom we must learne this Philosophy, which is not naturall, but supernaturall. Now then being instructed and guided by him, hauing discoursed of the creation and nature of the soule, let vs enter into this goodly field of the immortalitie thereof, in which we know there are many ranged battels of enemies, who waite to enter into the combat with vs. It belongeth therefore to thee ACHITO B, to begin the skirmish.

How men can haue no certaine resolution of the immortalitie of the soule but by the Word of God: of the peruersenesse of Epicures and Atheists in this matter: Of the chiefe causes that hinder men from beleeuing the immortalitie of the soule, and of their blockishnesse and euill iudgement therein: How we must seeke for the image of God, after which man was created in his soule. Chap. 88.

ACHITO B. We are now fallen into a time, which discourseth vnto vs not only false religions, but euen an Atheisme, that is far worse. For they that are altogether without Religion without Religion are farther distant from true pietie, then they that follow a false religion: and yet at this day there are as many or more that declare themselves to be Atheists and Epicures, as there be of such as are taken for good Christians. And if in outward shew they pretend some exercise of Religion, it is but to cover themselves with the vail thereof, to the end they might not be esteemed and accounted for such as they are in truth. But in their heart and with their companions they doe but make a mocke of the holy Scriptures, and of all those testimonies that we haue in them of another life besides this, of Heaven, of Hell, of the blessed immortalitie, and eternall death of the soule. Now it is an easie matter to conuince such fellowes of error and lies.

But it is a thing worthy to be bewailed in all the affaires, opinions and counsels of men that when any question ariseth of the truth, and of that which is Good, no proofes or testimonies, how rich, or of how great authority soeuer they be, seeme sufficient to vs, and worthy to be beleeued. And yet if the question be of any euill, falshood and lies, no testimony, how slender and bad soeuer it be, but satisfieth vs very well. For by reason that we are euill and ignorant, full of blindness and darkenesse by nature, we are alwaies the readier to follow that which is like our selues, namely, wickednesse and falshood, lies and error: as we see it by experience in Atheists & Epicures, and in all infidels and scornors of God and of his Word. For there are many skilfull in Arts & humane learning, and in naturall Philosophie, who reprehend and condemne Epicurus, Lucretius, Pliny, and other such like Philosophers, Epicures and Atheists, in that which they haue taught and written of naturall life belonging to this life, and call them ignorant men and void of experience. But in that which they haue spoken against the providence of God, the immortalitie of soules, and all Religion, abolishing them wholly by their false doctrines and by Philosophy, they embrace and praise them, for the skilfullest and most excellent Philosophers that euer were, as hauing deliuered men from the greatest torments that could seize vpon them, and brought vnto them the greatest good that could befall them, by taking from them all feare of God, of hell, and of all punishment after this life, and all opinion and hope of Paradise and of a better life after this. In a word, they extoll them, as if they onely had found the beane in the cake, as wee vse to say, and as if they onely deserued to bee the kings of beanes among their fellowes. Forasmuch then as we are entered in this matter of the immortality of the soule, and seeing at this day so many Atheists herein follow the opinions of these Epicurian Philosophers before named, I say not onely more then they doe all the best Philosophers, but also then the authority of the holy Scriptures, and the testimony of God in them: wee cannot gather too many arguments, whereby at leastwise to cause them to ponder the matter more diligently, if they will not bee confounded wholly by naturall reasons, seeing they make so small reckoning of that celestiall and heavenly doctrine. It is true that it will be a very hard and difficult matter to perswade such in this point, as give no more credit to this testimony of the word of God, then they do to all humane and natural reasons that can be alleadged vnto them. For although the argument of those Philosophers that maintaine the immortalitie of the soule, are strong and waighy, yet they can neuer wholly and fully assure men of their immortality, except this testimony of God take all doubting from them. But that argument of all others is most forcible, which hee hath giuen vnto vs in the resurrection of Iesus Christ, whereby his soule was vnited againe vnto his body, and so wrought those heavenly works which followed his resurrection & ascension into heaven: and namely, by the gift of the holy Ghost, which he sent vnto his Apostles, and by the effects thereof, which according to the promise of Iesus Christ appeared so great and manifest throughout the whole world, and that in so short a time, that no prudence, wisdom, skil, eloquence, authority, power, or force of man, was able to hinder that vertue, or the course of the Gospel. But because Epicures and Atheists accompt these things for fables and are of so peruerse and monstrous a nature, that they had rather fight against Nature it selfe, and cleave to the worst opinions most vnworthy the nature of man, then to follow the reasons of the best Philosophers, grounded vpon a more sure foundation, let vs at leastwise put them to some further trouble, by vrging them to be fully resolued in that opinion, which is contrary to the immortality of the soule. For certainly I doubt not but they will be alwaies without resolution. And indeed from whence should they fetch this resolution of theirs, seeing they haue no certain ground of their false opinion, & seeing there are so many & so forcible reasons to the contrary? But we must note, that the principal cause that keepeth men from beleeuing the immortality of the soule is, partly their ignorance, partly their malice and perverseness. For some there are so blockish, that they measure all things according to the knowledge and reach of their bodily senses: so that they set downe with themselves to beleue nothing, but that which they are able to know and perceiue by them. Others there are who besides this are so wicked and perverse, that they would not onely have their soules not to be immortal, but wish also that there were no God, to the end they might haue no Iudge. For by reason they are so wholly addicted to the world, and to their carnall pleasures, they would haue no other God, or other life after this: but wish that all life might end with their delights, and the soule with the body, that so they might haue no accompt to make to any Iudge. Therefore they are of that number, whereof mention is made in the Booke of Wisdome, who make these discourses, saying, Our life is short and tedious, and in the death of a man there is no recovery, neither was any knowne that hath returned from the graue. For wee were borne at all aduenture, and wee shall bee hereafter as though wee had neuer bene: for the breath is as smoke in the nostrilles, and the words as a sparke raised out of the hearts. Which being extinguished, the body is turned into ashes, and the spirit vanisheth as the soft ayre. Our life shall passe away as the trace of a cloude, and come to naught as the mist that is driven away with the beames of the Sunne, and cast downe with the heate thereof. Our name also shall bee forgotten in time, and no man shall haue our works in remembrance. For our time is as a shadow that passeth away, and after our end there is no returning: for it is fast sealed so that no man commeth againe. Come therefore, and let vs enjoy the pleasures that are present, and let vs cheerfully vse the creatures as in youth. Let vs fill our selues with costly wine and ointments, and let not the floure of life passe by vs. I omit other speeches of a voluptuous, wicked, and vniust life, which they purpose to lead, exercising all iniustice violence, and cruelty, without all regard had to any right or iustice, either to poore or rich, young or old, but chiefly against the seruants of God, who approoue not their kinde of life, but reprove and condemne it. Therefore it is sayde after all the discourse, that they imagined such thinges and went astray. For their owne wickednesse blinded them. They doe not understand the mysteries of God: neither hope for the reward of righteousness, nor can discern the honour of the soule: that are faultlesse. For God created man without corruption, and made him after the image of his owne likenesse. Nevertheless, through enuy of the diuell came death into the world: and they that hold of his side, prone it. But the soules of the righteous are in the hands of God, and no torment shall touch them. In the sight of the vnwise they appeared to die, and their ende was thought grievous, and their departing from vs destruction: but they are in peace. We see then that these men go no farther then they can see with their bodily senses: and because they see, that man liueth by breathing and cannot liue without, and that he dyeth when his breath faileth, they thinke that the soule of man is but a little winde and breath, and so is scattered and vanisheth away as it were winde and breath, or as a cloude in the aire. The same iudgement they are of in regard of the blood, because life leaueth the body with the blood, as if it had no other soule but the blood or breath. And forasmuch as the eye discerneth no difference betweene men and beastes in death, they iudge also that there is no difference betweene their soules. But if they be resolved to giue credit to nothing but to their corporall senses, and in death consider onely what difference there is betweene men and beastes, they will not beleue that either beastes or men haue any soule at all that giueth them life because they see nothing but the body onely. And then by the like reason we must conclude, that not onely the whole man is no other thing but this body which we see, but also that there is nothing in all the world, but that which may bee seene by the eyes and perceiued by the other senses, and so all that which we haue not seene & known by them shall be nothing. Which being so, men shall differ nothing from beastes, as indeede we can say no better of these men. For beastes thinke of nothing but that which they behold and perceiue by their senses, and goe no further: which is so farre from all science and discipline, and from all iudgement of man, as nothing can be more. Therefore they that beleue nothing but their corporall senses, deserue to be compared not only to little children, or fooles who when they see pictures, or their face in a glasse, suppose they are liuing men, because they goe no farther then they see, but even to the brute beastes, who haue lesse sense and vnderstanding then children. It is wonderfull to consider how men take such great pleasure and paines to become brutish. For if they doe but see a smoke come out of a place, they will iudge that there is some fire within, although they behold it not: and if they smell any ill saour, their their nose will tell them that there is some place infected, or some carion lying not farre off, albeit they see it not. What is the cause then, that when by their senses, they perceiue some what more in men then in beasts; they are not induced thereby to thinke, that of necessity there must be somewhat within them, which causeth the to differ much from beasts? Which is not by reason of the body, but of the soule that is not seene but onely by her actions, workes and effects. Whereupon it followeth, that if their actions differ from the actions of that soule whereby beasts liue, the cause also from which they proceed, must needs differ: and so consequently, that there is great difference betwixt the soule of men and the soule of beastes. For let them consider onely the diuersitie of arts, which man exerciseth his hands, and the variety of so many witty and wonderfull works as are wrought by him, which cannot proceede but from a great spirit, and from a passing excellent nature, the like whereof is not to be seene in beasts, or in any thing they can doe. Besides, doe they not see how the spirit of man discourseth throughout all nature? what reason is in him, and how his speech followeth reason? which are such things as haue a certaine vertue and the image of a diuine spirit shining in them. Wherefore, albeit wee should make man wholly like to a beast, by reason of his body, both in regard of his birth and death, yet we must needs confesse, that hee is of a farre more excellent nature in respect of that great and manifest difference, which wee see is in his soule. If then the soule of man bee mortall as well as that of beastes, to what purpose serue those graces which it hath aboue the other? and from what fountaine shall wee say they flow in it, and to what ende were they giuen vnto it? But for this time I will leaue these Atheists, hoping that to morrow wee will not leaue any one naturall reason able to vrge them in their damnable opinion, which shall not be laid out at large. And I demand of them that haue any taste of the holy Scriptures, and yet seeme to doubt of the immortality of the soule, or at leastwise are not fully resolu'd therein, how man is said to bee created after the image of God, if hee shall be altogether dissolued and brought to nothing? and where shall we then seeke for this image in him? It is certaine, that this is not in the body, seeing that God is a spirituall nature and substance, and not corporall. Then it followeth, that this image is to bee sought for in the soule, and not in the body. And if it be in the soule, wee must necessarily conclude, that it differeth very much from the soule of beasts. For indeed, if they were both one, why should it rather be written of man then of beasts, that hee was created after the image of God? And if man be the image of God, especially in regard of the soule, it must needs be then of a diuine and immortal nature: otherwise, there would be no good agreement between the image and the thing of which it is an image, therefore a corporal thing cannot be the true image of a spirituall thing, if there be no resemblance or agreement of nature betwixt them.

Reasons to shew their soule of men to differ from that of beasts.

The image of God is to be sought in the
soule.

For although a corporall image should bee of another matter then the thing is of, which it doth represent, neuerthelesse, there is alwaies some resemblance when both the one and the other is of a corporal matter, and when the image hath some agreement in forme with the thing represented. Now if any be desirous to seeke for the image of God in a corporal thing, we shall finde as many of them as there are creatures in the whole world. And yet it is not said of any creature, no not of the Sunne it selfe, not of the Moone or Stars, that haue no soule, nor yet of the liuing creatures themselves, which are endued with soule and life, that God said in their creation, Let vs make them after our image and likeness, neither that he created them after his image, as it is written of man. If then there be no immortality of the soule of man, where shall we finde the image of the immortalitie of God who is immortal? And if there be no immortalitie in man, but that his soule is, either the temperament of his body, or his vitall spirit, as in beasts, God shall haue no image that shall more neerely resemble him in man then in beasts: neither shall he haue any spirituall image agreeable to his nature, in any creature vnder heauen.

Now if any reply and say, that this image is to be sought for, not in the immortality of the soule, but onely in reason and in the other vertues, wherewith it is adorned aboue the soule of beasts, I say, that these things are in such sort linked together, that they cannot be separated. Wherefore he that taketh away the one, taketh away the other: because the soule of man should not haue that which it hath more then the soule of beastes hath, if it were not of another nature then theirs is. And we know well, that whatsoever it hath more is not like to any creature vnder the heauens: and that it cannot agree but to God, or to natures that haue some participation with the diuine nature, which cannot bee mortall, but immortall. So that when we see so many signes and tokens which testifie vnto vs, that man hath a celestiall and diuine birth, it followeth that he hath in himselfe some greater thing, that is more noble and excellent, then can be seene or touched with hands. It is true, that they who stay onely in the corporall senses, as wee haue said, shall neuer pearce to the contemplation of these things: but they delight rather, for their confirmation in that beastly opinion, to heare the common bye-word vsed amongst the vulgar sort, that no man knoweth what becommeth of the soules of men after the death of their bodies, nor into what countrey they goe: because no body as yet euer brought any newes from thence, and therefore no maruell if no man either doe or can know what is done there. Which speeches albeit they be very friuolous, yet are they heard many times from them that thinke themselves to be none of the meanest. Therefore it will not bee peradventure without profit, if we answer them more at large to morrow, going forward with our reasons and arguments of the soules immortality against the Atheists: of which matter, AS ER, thou shalt beginne to speake.

Luk. 16. 26.

AS ER. We said yesterday, that they who stay onely in their corporall senses, as bruite beasts doe, propound commonly against the immortality of Soules, that which is vsually spoken of the common people, namely, that it is not knowne what becomes of mens soules after the death of the body, or to what countrey they goe, because none euer returned from thence to bring any newes. Wherefore (say they) no body can tell what is done there, neither can any thing be knowne. Now before we make answer to so friuolous and false an argument, I would gladly demand of them whether there were nothing at all of those new-found Ilands, (which were lately found in our time) before they were discovered by them, who not onely were neuer there, but did not so much as once heare of them before. For no body went thither from hence, neither did any come hither from thence: so that there was no more intelligence betweene them and vs, then betweene the living and the dead, or betweene them that are altogether of another world: therefore also their countrey is called the new World. Now then shall it be thought, that this people were not at all because they were not knowne of vs, nor their manners and kinde of life? And yet now the time sheweth evidently, that notwithstanding any distance of place that hath beene betweene them and vs, there we meane sufficient to communicate and trafficke together and those more easie then any is betweene the soules already departed out of their bodies, and vs, who yet remaine in the world with our bodies. For concerning the distance and difficultie of the places, who doubteth, but that it is farre greater betweene heauen and earth, Paradise and Hell? Therefore also Abraham speaking of the place and estate of the elect and reprobate in an other life, saith to the rich man, There is a great gulph set betweene you and vs, so that they which would goe from hence to you, cannot: neither can they come from thence to vs. And this wee may say in like manner of our selues, and of those that are already departed into another life, in regard of their returne vnto the living. For it is ordeined, that they shall not returne againe into the world, as also that they shall depart hence but one. And they that goe from hence, doe it not with soule and body ioined together: for it is not a voiage like to those which we make in this world, when we goe from one countrey to another. Now as the Lord hath determined how long the soules shall abide in their bodies in this life, so he hath ordeined and set the time in which they ought to depart, & the place where they are to be receiued, according to the estate of every one, even

untill their returne into their bodies at the resurrection. If they be soules of the reprobate, they are detained in hell in eternall fire, wherethere is weeping and gnashing of teeth: if they be the soules of Gods elect, they shine as the Sunne in the kingdome of heaven, in a life accompanied with perpetuall ioy and happinesse. But we must vrge them better that require testimonie for the immortality of soules by their returne into this world, or of some that haue come from another world. For it is an easie matter for vs to bring them as credible witnesses as any can be, to tell them most certaine newes, if they will beleue them, according as they deserue it. And for the first, haue we not Iesus Christ, who first came downe from heauen and became man, to bring vs newes, and to declare the same vnto vs in his owne person, not onely before his death, but also after his resurrection? Besides, how many other witnesses haue we, that haue testified most certainly of the same? who saw with their eies and touched with their hands, euen to the number of more then five hundred, according as S. Paul testifieth? Moreouer, they that were raised as well by him as by Elias and Elizus, and by the Apostles and disciples, may they not serue vs also for good witnesses to assure vs, not onely that soules are immortall, but also that their bodies shall rise againe, and that God is of sufficient vertue and power to do it as he hath promised? I omit here the testimony which the Angels haue giuen both of the resurrection and ascension of Iesus Christ: besides that of the holy spirit, which is the chiefest of all, with signes and gifts wherewith hee came accompanied, and those workes and effects that followed them. Wherefore seeing we haue for this point the word of God that is most certaine and cleare, which teacheth vs what we ought to beleue and hold, let vs rest our selues in the testimony thereof and not desire to make further enquire. For it is hee that said to Moses, I am the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Iacob. Whereupon Iesus Christ concludeth, that Abraham, Isaac, and Iacob doe liue yet after their death, seeing God is the God of the liuing, and not of the dead, that is to say, of them that are yet in being, and not of them that are nothing at all. For otherwise, if all men should so perish by death, that nothing of them should remaine in life, at leastwise in regard of the soule, then should he be the God of nothing. And although it seemeth that Iesus Christ alleadged this place against the Saduces, not onely to proue against them by the doctrine of Moses, the immortality of soules, but also the resurrection of bodies, wee may well gather, that if it bee fit to proue that bodies arise, it is much more strong to assure vs of the immortality of soules. For when the Lord spake these wordes, Abraham, Isaac and Iacob were not alieue in regard of their bodies, but onely of their soules. And yet Iesus Christ alleadged it to confirme also thereby the resurrection of the dead, although at the first sight it might seeme not to be very fit and firme to proue that so much as the immortality of soules. But if it bee narrowly looked into, his argument shall be found to be very well deduced and grounded vpon inuincible reason. For Iesus Christ had respect to that promise which G O D made to those holy Patriarkes of whom he spake, and which was not made onely to their soule, but to the whole man together compounded of body and soule. Wherefore all they to whom it was made, and to whom it appertaineth should not haue the whole effect of it, nor the full fruition of that which it containeth, if they were not whole inheritors thereof both in body and soule. For if it were otherwise, the promise should be accomplished but in one part of man, and not in the whole man. Whereupon it followeth, that seeing the promise is not of a temporall benefit, but of an eternall, therefore the whole man that must enioy the same, must of necessitie liue an euermore life, being of the same nature that the benefit is of which he must inherit. Wherefore seeing the course of mans life is broken off by death in regard of the body, the body must necessarily rise againe to liue againe with his soule in a better & longer life, to the end that the whole man may possesse the inheritance, which is promised him of God: or else the promise made by God to his seruants is altogether vaine, or the testimony which the holy Scripture beareth is wholly false, and so also the Scripture that propoundeth the same vnto vs. But none may once thinke either of these two last points, without great horror of blasphemy contained in them. So that the first point concludeth very strongly, according to that ground which it hath most certaine in the word of God. Whereunto may be added further, that seeing the soule of man is created, not to liue alwaies without a bodie, as the Angels doe, nor yet to wander from body to body, but to be knit and ioined to that body, which is assigned to it of God, it must needs be, that being part thereof, as of her lodging, she should once againe returne thither. Besides, seeing the body hath serued the soule, either in obeying God, or in disobeying his will, the nature of Gods iustice requireth, that it should be rewarded also with the soule, according to the qualitie of those workes whereof it hath beene an instrument. Therefore according to that which we haue discoursed of this matter, the resurrection of the body doth so depend of the immortality of soules, that it followeth necessarily vpon this: so that if wee haue assurance of the one, wee ought to haue it of the other, seeing both of them are certainly grounded vpon the iustice of God, which cannot be iust, vnlesse he iudge men both in body and soule according to his word, and according as euery one liueth. But seeing the matter of the immortality of soules, and that of the resurrection of bodies are sundry questions, and that we are to handle but one of them, wee must returne to our first point of the soule touching the immortality thereof, which is easily beleued of all that approue of the doctrine of holy Scriptures and that giue credit to the word of God. For they are thoroughly resolu'd thereof. Yea, we may know by the writing of all antiquity, that the common opinion of all people and nations of what religion soeuer they haue beene, hath beene this, that mens soules were immortal. Wherefore in regard of this point, wee are to fight onely against Epicures and Atheists. And because they will not beleue the word of God, but deride it as tales made vpon pleasure: I am of opinion that now we are to search chiefly for those testimonies, which God hath giuen vs in nature touching the immortality of the soule: euen the actions and effect thereof, by meanes of which we come to the knowledge of hidden and secret causes, from whence they proceede. Therefore consider AMANA, what you minde to speake vnto vs of this subiect.

Of naturall reasons, whereby the immortalitie of soules, may be prooued against Epicures and Atheists: and first of the argument taken from the facultie of knowledge which the soule hath, and from that knowledge of eternitie which is in it: how it appeareth, that it is not begotten of this corruptible nature, because it ascendeth vnto God: and how by a speciall benefit of God, it is daily created, and not by the vertue of nature. Chap. 90.

A*MANA*. Seeing Epicures and Atheists giue credit to naturall Philosophy in things whose causes it proueth by their effects, they haue no reason to refuse it in the consideration of the nature of mens soules. Now it is very certaine, that if we will take this course, besides the testimonies of God in his word, touching the immortality of the soule, which way soeuer wee turne our eyes, whether aboue vs or beneath vs, on the right hand, or on the left, wee shall finde euery where arguments and reasons concluding the same. For we haue nature, and the necessitie of causes, proportion and similitude, life, the excellent dignitie of man, the goodnesse of God, and the profit of mankind proceeding from his bountifullnesse, which with one common consent, and as it were, all with one voice teach vs, and cry out that the soule cannot be mortall.

How wee know the hidden things in nature.

An argument taken from the knowledge of the soule to proue
it immortall.

First then we obserue, that the true and naturall essences of all things are not knowen of vs by themselves, but continue hid in the secret closets of euery one of them, vnto which our minde being burthened with this masse of the body, and ouerwhelmed with the darkenesse of this life, is not able to reach. Therefore wee must enquire by the accidents adhering vnto them, and principally by their actions, whereby our reason discourseth, and concludeth of euery thing, what it is, and of what quality. For euery thing hath his actions, and workes, according to it owne substance and nature, and by them declareth and maketh it selfe knowne: so that if we consider the actions of the soule wee shall by them know the nature and immortality thereof. Let vs then consider her first and principall action, which is to know, and this importeth also to vnderstand, to comprehend, and to conceiue. Whereupon we haue to note, that there is no power of Knowing, that can accaine to the knowledge of any thing, but it hath some agreement and proportion with the nature of the same thing: because knowledge is as it were the Image of things, which is imprinted in the soule as in a glasse. Now it is certaine, that a looking glasse cannot represent the image and similitude of a spirituall thing, because it selfe is a corporall thing, which hath no agreement in nature with that which is spirituall. Likewise it cannot represent any thing thing belonging to the other senses but only that which concerneth the sight: and therefore it cannot represent either sounds, smells, or tastes, because the use thereof is only for the eyes neither doth it agree with any of the other senses, but onely with the sight. And as for our externall senses, they cannot perceiue those things that haue neither quantitie nor bodily substance, because they themselves are corporall, neither yet can they perceiue things that are ablent. And the internall senses, as the fantasie & the imagination, cannot perceiue spiritual things, as namely, either God or Angels: but only the spirit of a man doth perceiue, know and comprehend them, which power & faculty no other creature vnder heaven hath. For if it were otherwise, it could not in any wise comprehend a thing that surmounteth it with an infinit greatnes, & with which it hath no agreement at all. For further confirmation of that which I say, let vs consider of Eternity, as it is whole and entire of it selfe: then let vs diuide it into that which was since the creation of the world, & finally, into that which followed the same, and which shal be for euermore. When our spirit entereth into the consideration of that which was before the creation, our thought is not able to comprehend it, so that it is overwhelmed with the greatnesse thereof: but wee doe well vnderstand and comprehend that part of eternity, which shall follow vs hereafter throughout infinite ages. Whereby it appeareth, that this first consideration of it, is too great for our soule, as hauing no proportion therewith, nor yet agreeing thereunto: but it is otherwise with the soule in the consideration of that other eternity, for the fruition whereof it was created. For the soule is not eternall as God is, as though it had no more beginning then he had: and therefore it hath no agreement with him in this respect. The soule then entereth into a bottomlesse gulfe, when it discourseth of an eternitie, of which it is not partaker: but it hath agreement with the eternitie of GOD as Angels haue, in that it is created immortal, to liue an eternall life with him: which appeareth in that it is able to comprehend the same. Therefore S. Iohn in the beginning of his Gospell leadeth vs euen to the gates of this first eternitie: But forasmuch as it is a gulfe in which we shall be swallowed vp, if wee enter farther into it, he proceedeth not forward, but stayeth vs there: and calleth vs presently vnto the meanes whereby God manifested himselfe, telling vs how hee did this by his eternall word: and first by the creation of the world, then by those other meanes, which he setteth downe afterward: all which our soule comprehendeth well, and so cannot the soule of beasts doe. Wherefore when we consider God in his essence and nature before the creation of the world, and the time that was before that, we are then overwhelmed therewithall, and see no whit at all into it. But if we enter into the consideration of the times after the creation of the world, and into those which shall follow still after vs vnto all eternitie, we looke into it more clearly, and are not so much dazeled therewithall, because our soule more capable of this consideration, then of the other, which was before all creatures. From hence we may conclude, that the soules of beasts and plants that haue not in them this cogitation or apprehension of eternitie, are produced and taken out of the power and vertue of that matter, of which they are engendred: but the spirit of man is more specially bred in the body by God, above all the powers of the matter and nature of the same. For nothing ariseth higher, or passeth beyond that thing of which it receiueth essence and being, and those powers and strength that it hath: for if it did, then should it not receive being from thence, but of some other thing before and above that, or else further off, vnto which it tendeth. We see this in all the senses both externall and internall, which are common to vs with beasts. For they know nothing else, beside that which is of this nature which we see, neither doe they ascend higher: but our spirit not content with the sight and knowledge of the heavens, starres and Angels themselves, mounteth vp to God, and being come thither can goe further. What other thing els doth this signifie, and declare vnto vs, but that the soules of beasts are engendred of this corruptible and mortall nature, beyond which they cannot lift vp themselves, but that ours are produced of God above the power of this nature? And so that may be said of our soule, which is spoken of a spring water, namely, that it ascendeth as much vpward as it descendeth downward, but can goe no higher. For when a man would carry the water of a spring any whither and would haue it mount vpward, it will be an easie matter to bring it as high as the spring-head, from whence it floweth: but no higher except it be forced by some other meane then by it owne course and naturall vertue. Notwithstanding, it will easily descend lower. And so fareth it with our spirit. For as it came from God, so it is able to mount againe to the knowledge of him, and no higher: but it descendeth a great deale lower. And as for our senses they re-maine lower then the workes of nature, and pearce not to the depth of them, but are alwaies busied about the externall face of them. Neither is it to be doubted, but that Moses meant to teach vs these things by that which he rehearseth of the meanes vsed by God in the creation of man, which differed from that he kept in the creation of all other creatures, either living or without life. For we haue heard what deliberation and counsell he vsed, before he put hand to the worke: how he fashioned the body, and how hee placed the soule therein by and by after. Therefore in that the Prophet describeth the creation of the body apart, and then that of the soule, he giueth vs to vnderstand, that we must seek for something more high & excellent in that of man then in that of beaſts, whose soules were created with their bodies, and of the selfe same matter with them. Moreover, he teacheth vs this very plainly when he saith, that God created man after his owne image and similitude: which he did not say of beaſts, as we haue already heard. Therefore there must needs be in the soule of man some other power & vertue, then that by which it giueth life to the body, and which is common to it with those of brut beaſts. So that as God gaue to this dead body taken out of the earth, a soule that endued it with life, motion, and sense: so he imprinted & ingraued his image into the soule, vnto which immortalitie is annexed. Therefore when Moses saith, that man was made a living soule, no doubt but by the name of soule hee meaneth another nature and substance then that of the body. And in that hee calleth it living, hee declareth plainly, that the body hath not of it selfe and of it owne nature, that life where-with it is endued, but from the power of this soule. And although he there maketh not any speciall mention of the other vertues thereof, it is because he considered the capacity of the people with whom he liued, vnto whom he would frame himselfe, being content to speake opely of that power of the soule, which appeared best without, & which the external senses might most easily know & perceiue by the effects therof. But I thinke it wil not be vnfit for this matter, if we return to that question which before we touched concerning the creation of the soule, namely, whether, since it was created by God in the first creation of man, it be still created after the same sort as it were by a new miracle, in them that are daily borne in the world, or whether it be naturally created, but yet of God by a certain order appointed for that end by him. Now albeit it be very requisite, that we should be sober and not rash in this matter, for the causes already set down, notwithstanding we wil here propound the opinion of some learned men, grounded vpon that order, which God hath accustomed to obserue in his works & in his creatures. For seeing he hath set a law in nature for al other creatures according to which he createth & produceth them, and not by any new miracle, it is more likely that he createth soules naturally, and that he hath ordained a stedfast law for mankind but differing from that of beaſts, so much as his creation differed from theirs. For hauing once established an order, hee vseth not to change it into a diuers or contrary order, but keepeth still the same, except it be that sometimes he vseth extraordinary means by way of a miracle. For although all his workes be great miracles, and chiefly man: neuer the lesse we call none by that name, but onely those which he worketh by supernaturall meanes, not against, but beside the common order of nature. But that which I say, derogateth nothing from the nature and immortalitie of mans soule. For although it be placed in the matter which is already prepared and appropriated for the fashioning of the bodie, yet doth he this above the vertue of the matter and of the worke of nature, by a law which he hath established to that effect. For this cause hee doth not onely giue a soule to them that are begotten by a lawfull mariage, but to those also who are brought forth in whoredome, whether it be adultery, incest or any other suchlike. For although that honesty which is enioyned mankind by God, be not kept in such a birth & generation: but contrarieth the same, yet it is not contrarie to the law of generation ordained by God: as that generation is which is by buggery, wherein not onely the Law of honesty is violated, but also the law of nature. We wil conclude then, that it is not only true, that our soule is not brought forth by the power of nature, but by the benefit of God only, but also that it is expedient & very behoofeful, yea necessary for mankind that it should be true: and because it is behoofeful & necessary, it is true also without all questiō. For God hath omitted nothing that is agreeable to his glory, & profitable and expedient for mankind. For seeing the soule is placed within the body, not by the vertue of nature, but properly and peculiarly by a speciall benefit of God, man oweth the chiefest and best part of himselfe, not to nature, but to God. VVhich is the cause why hee should acknowledge him as the only father of his spirit, and consecrated the same wholly to him alone: not yeelding any right and interest

terest therein to any other besides him onely, who is soueraigne, almighty, and the onely father of spirits. For if the question be of the body, and of all the senses thereof, many may claime an interest therein vnder God, namely fathers and mothers, the children themselves, nature, the kindred, the countrey, friends, Kings, Princes & Lords. But the soule belongeth to none but to God alone, which he willeth & commandeth should be reserved to him onely for our happinesse, because he only is the author and creator thereof. If it be so then, that our soule is not begotten or produced by his nature, which is the handmaide of God and worker vnder him, but by God alone, it followeth very well, that nothing in nature can extinguish it, but God onely who is able to doe it if he please. Now it is not likely or credible that God would make a thing by it selfe, and that after a different maner from other things, which should haue nothing besides the creation of it, and then within a while after would destroy it. For if it were otherwise, why would he obserue another meane in the creation of man, then in that of beasts? Why would he not rather haue bestowed vpon nature, the power of the generation and corruption of mans soule, as he hath done that of other living creatures. Wherefore would he seeme to reserve that thing as proper to himselfe, which he would make subiect to the law and common condition of other things? Thus much then for those arguments, which we may take from the knowledge that God hath giuen to mans soule, and from his constant worke in the creation of it, to proue the nature and immortality thereof. Now wee are to consider what arguments wee haue to the same purpose, in that vertue of desire, which is giuen vnto it. These things then wee may learne of these

AR AM.

Of the argument for the immortalitie of the soule, that may be taken from that naturall desire thereof, and of perpetuities, which is in it: of another argument to the same purpose: of the desire which men haue to continue their name and memorie for euer: an argument to the same ende taken from the apprehension and terror which men haue both of the death of the body, and also of the soule and spirit.

Chap. 91.

AR AM. These three things are so linked and knit together, namely Gods religion, his diuine providence, and the immortalitie of the soule, that they neither may nor ought to be seperated in any wise. For if our soules were not immortal, no reward or punishment for good or bad doings were to be looked for: and then God should not seeme to haue any care ouer vs, which if he haue not, why should we worship him? Our hope should be in vaine and religion vnprofitable. But if without the grace and goodnesse of God we cannot liue, and if he wil be sought vnto of vs by praier, then religion is very necessary, and the immortality of the soule certaine. And euen as a man cannot renounce those excellent gifts, which naturally are planted in his spirit and minde and in that reason which God hath bestowed vpon him, but hee must renounce himselfe, and become like to the brute beast: so fareth it also with him, when he renounceth his immortalitie. But seeing wee are now in handling the powers of the soule, to shew that it dieth not, and seeing we haue spoken of knowledge, we will consider what arguments to the same end may be taken from the vertue of desiring that is naturally in it.

Three things vnseparable.

Heretofore we learned, that all knowledge both in man and beast, is giuen to this ende that they should desire whatsoeuer they know to be good, and eschue that which they know to be euill. Concerning the knowledge of our senses, they conceiue well inough what it is to be present, and so doe the senses of beasts, of which and of our whole nature, wee may iudge both by our externall and internall senses that are common to vs with them, & so we may discern of all such like things. But the appetite or desire of beastes goeth no further then the time present. For that naturall desire of their owne preservation which is in them, proceedeth not from any knowledge which they haue of things, but from the workmanship of nature, and from that naturall inclination which they haue thereunto, without any motion of reason or vnderstanding.

Whereupon it followeth, that their desire to preserve themselves, and their power of procreation proceedeth not from their knowing vertue, that is chiefest in them, but from the

the Vegetative vertue which is the basest & most abieft. But man goeth a great deale further. For man hath knowledge of perpetuity and of eternitie, as we heard in the former speech: and because he knoweth that eternitie is a good and profitable thing for him, he doth also desire the same. This desire then is naturall: and if naturall, it followeth also that it is a very meet and conuenient thing for vs, and so consequently, that it is not given to man without cause and to no purpose. We must then conclude hereupon that it may bee accomplished, and that of necessitie it must besometime or other. For if it were otherwise, to what purpose should this knowledge serue, which man hath of so great a benefite, and which also moued him to desire the same, if he could neuer attaine to the fruition thereof? And why should God teach the same to men, if he would not make them partakers of it? Were it not rather to debase, then to aduance, them aboue beasts, whereas bee hath created them Lords, and as it were his last and principall piece of worke, in his worke of creation? Should it not seeme to be not onely a vaine thing, but also (if I might so speake) as though God delighted to torment men, to cause them to desire that thing, of which they should neuer haue any participation? were it not better for them, at leastwise, as good, that in this respect he should haue created them like to bruite beasts? For so they should liue a great deale more quiet, and not torment themselves as they doe, after a thing, which is altogether vnpossible for them to attaine vnto. Now we haue a very euident signe and testimony in vs, of the continuall being of this desire of eternitie, in that longing which men haue to make their name eternall, as much as may be, and that their memory might remaine in all ages that should follow long time after the. And which is more, this affection is so natural & imprinted so deepe into mens hearts, that euen they who deny the immortalitie of soules, and who thinke that every man doth wholly vanish away by corporall death, doe couet notwithstanding the immortalitie of their name, and to haue a good report amongst men still after their death. Hereof we haue very good prooue in the last Will and Testament of Epicurus himselfe, the Captaine and Standerd-bearer of all Atheists and Epicures who haue receiued their name of him. For he appointed therein, that the day of his natiuity should be yearely celebrated, and that at certaine times assigned by him, a banquet should bee made for those of his sect, in remembrance of his name. Whereby wee see that this dogge himselfe, who made no difference betweene the death of men and of beasts, and who denied vtterly the immortality of the soule of man, could not for all that plucke out of his owne soule the desire of immortality: but doth what lay in him to make himselfe immortall after his death, by the perpetuity of his name and memory. Wee may take the like argument from that which men vsually appoint at their death, touching their funerals, sepulchres, and tombes. For why is it, that they will haue sumptuous funeralles, and stately & magnificent tombes? Why haue many caused Churches and Chappels to be erected, themselves to be engrauen, and their eschutchions to be hung vp, where they haue laid themselves? It is certaine, that if they desired not to make their name as immortall as they could, and their memory eternall amongst men, their death would not bee so ambitious, neither would they leave behind them such marks of their ambition, and of their desire of immortality. And as great men afford this testimony of their desire, so the common people are not without some one or other for their part. For a poore Artificer, as a Tayler or Shoemaker, or some such like, if he be able he will appoint to haue a stone laid vpon his graue, in which his name shall be engrauen, and his marke, or some such like thing: to this end that the Suruiours and they that come after him should know that he once liued and was in the world, and that he would still liue, at leastwise, in name and memory. And this is further confirmed by them, who albeit they cannot continue their name and memory by any good deedes and valiant actes, yet they strue to make themselves immortall by wicked and execrable doings. As among others wee haue the example of Herostratus, who set on fire the Temple of that great Diana of Ephesus for no other cause, but onely that hee might bee spoken of, and that the memory of him might remaine and continue for euer amongst men: as indeede it hath done, notwithstanding the contrary endeavour of the Ephesians, who by a publike Edict ordeined, that his name should neuer bee written in any place. But it may bee objected vnto mee that this argument deriued from the desire of men to continue their name to prooue the immortality of soules thereby, is not very fit nor of great force: because this desire is rather found in men that are most foolish, vaine, carnall, and wicked, then in the wiser sort of men, and such as are more graue, spirituall, and vertuous. For who couet more this immortality rality of name and memory, then they that are most vaine glorious and ambitious, vnto whose ambition death it selfe can bring no end, but it receiueth and liueth still therein? We see also, that they who least of all beleue the immortality of soules and scoffe most at it, are greatliest affected with this ambition, and labour most to become immortall after that manner, because they expect no other immortality. All this I confesse is true, yet mine argument continueth stil firme. For first we haue alwaies this testimony from them, that they know and acknowledge a certaine immortality and perpetuity, & desire to enioy the same as much as they may, thinking to continue the same euen after their death: which knowledge and desire is not to be found in brute beasts. And whereas the vaine and worst men are more moued with this foolish desire, then the wisest and most vertuous men are, the reason thereof is good and euident. For the wisest men and such as are endued with most vertue make least accompt of this temporary and fading immortality, which is but as it were a winde that goeth from mouth to mouth, or is but in paper, parchment, wood, stone, brasse, or in some such corruptible matter: because they expect a better perpetuity that is more certaine, more glorious, and of longer continuance, of which they are certainly perswaded. Which perswasion can not be vaine in them, seeing it is grounded vpon the testimony of Gods Spirit, which saith, that the iust shalbe had in euerlasting remembrance, not only before men, but also before God and Angels. But the other sort of men busie themselues about an immortality, which deserueth not to be accompted so much as a shadow and image of true immortality: because the desire thereof is infected and corrupted with that darknesse of error and of ignorance, which sinne hath brought vpon the mind of man, with those peruerse affections that proceede from the same, and with their euill education and instruction, who are not taught in the word of God. By means whereof this naturall desire of true immortality degenerateth into a foolish desire greedy of fame & name among men: (euen as when good seed falleth into bad ground) but still it proceedes from a good beginning and fountaine, if it were not corrupted. As we see also that it falleth out with the greater part of men in the naturall desire they haue of skill and knowledge, which albeit it be in them by nature, yet they turne it into a vaine and foolish curiosity, that endeouereth to know that which is not onely not profitable, but very hurtfull and dangerous for them, in stead of seeking to know that which is more profitable and necessary. But besides that which wee haue already spoken, our affections also tell vs plainly, what the nature is aswel of our spirit as of our senses both internall and externall: and what difference there is betweene them.

 For if the Spirit entred into a cogitation of it owne death, the internall senses, with fancy and imagination are not greatly moued or troubled therewith, but passe it ouer well enough, as if they had no feeling thereof, supposing that this corporall life will last a long time: but the spirit is so confounded and troubled, that it feareth and flyeth nothing more then it. And surely I doubt not, but that they, who being pressed and oppressed with great euills, desire death through a blind fury of their mind, and wish to bee wholly extinguished, would change their purpose and abhorre that kind of death, and thinke it to be a greater mischiefe then all those which they suffer, if they might haue leasure & means for some smal time to come out of their despaire, and to returne to their right minde, that so they might haue some rest from the troubles of their spirit, and thinke seriously vpon the death thereof.
 And as all the senses are presently troubled, and as it were, carried out of themselues through the cogitation of corporall death: so the spirit contrariwise, if it be sound, quiet, and well settled, abideth firme, and derideth the ignorance, error, and terror of the senses, correcting and reprobuing them for the same. Wee may then conclude from the euidence of these things that the death of the Spirit is contrary to the nature of it, and therefore is affraid of it, and ab-horreth euen to thinke of it, or to make any mention thereof. But the senses care not but for this bodily life which the Spirit contemneth in regard of the other: whereby it appeareth, that the death of the body doth affect & touch it nothing at all, but the body only, & those things that are ioyned vnto it, as namely, both the external & internal senses. For this cause, those men that are carnall and led most by their senses, thinke little either vpon the one or the other, except it be when they see themselves in danger of corporall death. For, perswading themselves that they shall liue long in this world, or at leastwise gathering to themselues as much hope therof as they can, they think nothing at all in a maner of death during their whole life, no more almost then if they were borne immortal, vntil such time as they see in good earnest that they must dislodge. The are they awaked out of their sleep, & if they be not altogether become brutish, they are constrained to think both vpon the death of the body, and of the death of the spirit: and the lesse they are prepared against them both, the more astonished and amased they are in themselves. Contrariwise good and iust men, who of a long time, yea all their life haue thought vpon both, finde themselves lesse troubled a great deale, because they are resolutely perswaded and assured of a better life. Moreover, wee finde by experience, that when the spirit is troubled with affections, or confounded through fancies and imaginations, or ignorant, vicious, prophane, wicked, without feare of God and void of religion, it is a great deale more mooued at the cogitation & remembrance of corporall death, then if it be found, well disposed and settled, quiet, skilful, innocent, religious, and fearing God. Whereupon we may consider and learne, which of these two iudgements is more certain and true, either that of a spirit that is troubled, diseased, ignorant, euil, without feare of God, and void of religion: or that of a spirit, which hath all those perfections rehearsed by vs, contrary to these vices. It is an easie matter to iudge. Therefore if we attribute more, as in reason we ought, to that Spirit whose iudgement is most true and certaine, the conclusion that I haue made shalbe confirmed thereby. And as by the difference of desires, we may easily iudge of the nature and essence of mans soule, so we may do the like by those delights wherein it taketh pleasure. But I leaue thee ACHITO B, to go forward with the discourse of this matter.

Of the argument that may be taken from the delights and pleasures of the soule to prooue the immortality thereof: an argument to the same end taken from the insatiable desires and pleasures of men, euen from such as are most carnall: of the testimony which they may find euen in their vices to prooue the immortality of their soule. Chap. 92.

The right

Nobility.

ACHITO B. It hath beene a saying heretofore, that it belonged not to a vile person to deny God. Which Prouerbe came of this, that the nobility and gentlemen were so ill taught, and so ignorant of true nobilitie, that they reserued this occupation to themselves as proper to their estate, turning it to their glory, and endeavouring to bee feared by this meanes. And surely these were faire Armes and goodly Scutcheons to set forth the Nobilitie of their estate by, namely, horrible and execrable blasphemies, which the very Iewes and Turkes would neuer suffer among themselves. I would to God we might now say rightly, that this was once, but is no more: and so likewise, that there were not some among them that thinke themselves the greatest men, who haue this in their thoughts if they dare not speake it openly, that it belongeth not to men of courage to beleue in God and in his Word, or to thinke that there is a iudgement to come, at which men shall appeare: but that this appertaineth to the simple and foolish, not to these great and noble spirits, which flie above the clouds, and indeed know more then they ought to leade them into hell.

An argument
of the pleasures of the soule to shew
the immortality thereof.

But as by the difference of appetites and desires, we haue shewed them that the soule cannot be mortall, which concludeth a diuine providence and a second life, as we declared before, so it is an easie matter to proue the same by those pleasures in which the soule taketh delight. For by how much the more those things that bring delights, do resemble the vertue of the soule that is delighted, and the greater affinitie, proportion, and agreement they haue with it, so much the greater, sweeter, and more pleasant are the delights, as also more firme and of longer continuance. Indeed it may be objected vnto mee, that if wee looke to this we shall find, that the greatest part of men take more pleasure in those delights which they can receive by their senses, which are more earthly & brutish, then in others that are more naturall to the spirit, and more spirituall & heavenly: and therefore the iudgment that we can gather from hence of the nature and essence of the soule, may seeme not to agree to this we speake of. It is very certen that those men are of such a brutish nature, that a man may well doubt whether they be men or no, & whether they deserue not rather to be reckoned in the number of beasts, to which they are more like then to men, except it be for their face: in which respect also a man may compare them with Apes. For if they be led by the same desires and lusts, and satisfie themselves therein as brute beasts, and goe no further, wherein doe they differ from them? & to what purpose serueth that which God hath bestowed vpon their soules more then vpon the soules of beasts, if they content themselves with a brutish life & pleasure as they do? For where is the vse of reason & vnderstanding which God hath bestowed vpon them them more then vpon beastes? And if they vse them no more then beastes doe that are altogether void of them, who can know whether they are partakers of them more then they? And so consequently, how shall that definition commonly giuen of man, agree to them, wherein he is called a liuing creature partaker of reason? Therefore when wee enquire of the nature and substance of the soule, we must follow that rule, which is vsually propounded in searching out the nature and essence of all other things. For when a man would haue true knowledge of them, he taketh not in each kind of them that which may be, in some of the same kinde, lesse perfect and monstrous. As if there be occasion to iudge of the nature of mans body no man wil take them that haue some defect of Nature, or that are more deformed and monstrous then others: but the soundest, goodliest and most perfect bodies. We must doe the like when we search into the nature and essence of the soule. For to know it well, wee must not make choice of men that are borne brutish, so that a man can know nothing in them whereby they differ from brute beastes, except the outward shape of a man. Yea there are some borne with lesse sense and government of themselves, then beastes haue. The like may be saide of them, who being better borne, voluntarily become brutish of themselves. For this cause, we must chiefly consider what effects the noblest and most excellent soules bring forth, if we will iudge of the nature of all other soules that are of the same kind. For albeit the soules of some me are more brutish then of others, yet it followeth not but they are all of one & the same nature & substance, seeing they are all of one kind: but the difference between them proceedeth from hence, that some are more degenerated from their true and proper nature, then others are. Neuertheles this changeth not their natural essence but that alwaies continueth one & the same in all: as the ill dispositiō of bodies taketh not from them that nature & essence which they haue common with others, notwithstanding they differ from them, as a sicke and deformed body differeth from a sound and perfect body. Now there is no doubt, but that the noblest & most excellent soules take more pleasure in the internall senses then in the externall, and more in reason then in fancy and imagination, but aboue all in the contemplation of the Spirit. And among those things which the spirit doth contemplate, it delighteth most & staieth longest in them that are spirituall and eternal, that are highest & of greatest souerainty. And as the spirit longeth most after these pleasures, and retaineth them with greatest affection, so it is lesse weary in searching for the and in the contemplation of them. Whereupon it followeth, that spirituall and eternal things are more conformable to the Spirit, then those that are corporall and temporary: and that it hath greater participation and agreement with heavenly things: then with earthly. For it is marueilously delighted & contented with spirituall things, as if they were his own things which is by similitude, proportion, and agreement of nature: as contrariwise, both the internall and externall senses please themselves in corporall things, and are not able to comprehend or attaine to the other, but onely by coniecture. Whereas if the Spirit were as mortall as the senses, then the excellentest Spirits, and such as approach neere to the heavenly Spirits & to the nature of God, would giue themselves to transitory & corruptible things as much as the senses doe, and would search after them as earnestly as it doth after true and perfect pleasures. But we see by experience that they ascend vp a great deale higher. Yea the Spirits euen of most carnall & brutish men, in that they neuer meete with any pleasures in transitory things that doe fully content and satisfie them, thereby giue euident testimony, they are borne to enioy greater pleasures then they can find in all this nature, and that they are of another nature, surpassing them which mounteth aboue corporall and temporary things. For who euer saw an ambitious man satisfied with honours, or a couetous wretch with riches? And from whence cometh this that they are so insatiable, but only because the spirit that God hath giuen them, is of so noble a race & of such an excellent nature, that how much soeuer it be fallen from his first nature & nobility, yet it can neuer content it selfe with any thing, that is of another nature more base & vile then it owne, as that which is too much vnworthie and vnbecoming the spirit, & very much disagreeing from the essence of it. For although, being buried in this body, as in a sinke of all carnall and brutish affections, it cannot so well perceiue it owne nature, dignity, and nobility, nor acknowledge the same so well, as the noblest and most excellent spirits, and such as are farthest from this stinking puddle, are able to do, neuerthelesse without thinking thereupon as it were, it hath euer more a secret sense of it owne nature and dignity, which keepeth it from being contented with any thing whatsoever, although it bee with neuer so great liking and abundance, except it enioy that thing which is most proper and agreeable to his naturall disposition, which is of a more high, noble, & excellent nature; then any thing proceeding from this mortall and transitorie masse. But because it is buried in this darkenesse, which sinne hath brought vpon the mindes of men, the same thing happeneth to the spirit, of which we haue already spoken concerning the immortality and eternitie of name and renowne. For the right and naturall desire of true and immortall honours, and of eternal riches agreeable to the nature of mans soule, is degenerated into this false and corrupted appetite of worldly honors, and temporall riches. Notwithstanding this is manifested heereby, that as euery spiritual waies searcheth after God as a blinde man goeth by groaping, as we haue heard already: so it seeketh after riches and honours agreeable to it owne nature. But because that darkenesse with which it is overwhelmed, hindreth it from knowing them well, and so consequently from taking that way, which it ought to enter in that it may attaine vnto them, therefore it changeth them into others, that are of a differing and cleane contrary nature. So that it can neuer finde out or attaine to that which it seeketh, because it is ignorant thereof, and so seeketh for it vnder a maske, which it taketh for the true face, and vnder a shadow, which it taketh for the very body whereby it commeth to passe that the maske and shadow remaine with it, instead of the very face and body that are lost by meanes of them. In which the same thing happeneth to the spirit that doth in the matter of Religion, when it forgeth vnto it selfe new and strange gods and idols, instead of the true God whom it searcheth after, because it knoweth not who he is, although it seeketh him, & desireth to find him. Wherefore being thus deceived, & not knowing it, neither the meanes wherby it is deceived, it stil desireth, because it perceiveth very wel whether it wil or no, that it hath not attained to that which it wanteth, as indeed it might well know the same, if it were not become very brutish by reason that it neuer findeth any contentation in any thing that it doth, or can attaine vnto. By which things we may further learne, that men shall finde euery in their vices, testimonies of the nature, essence and immortality of their soules, whereby they may be convicted, and namely in their ambition & couetousnes, which ought to admonish them of that that hath been set down, and to cause them to thinke more diligently thereupon. We may say the same of their lust. For although it be in the number of those pleasures that are most earthly and brutish, and which the senses themselves both externall and internall ought to be soone weary of, for the reasons before heard, neuertheless they shew plainly how insatiable this appetite is in them, in that no kind of lust can content them: insomuch as they are carried headlong therewithall euery beyond the bounds of nature, within which brute beasts containe themselves. And truly all these things ought to driue vs into admiration, and cause vs to consider the iust iudgement of God vpon men, and how he is reuenged of them for dishonouring him, and their owne nature, by suffering it to degenerate and waxe beastlike, in forsaking spirituall, heavenly, and diuine things, for those are corporall, earthly, and brutish. Therefore God depriveth them of that vnderstanding which hee had given them, that they should torment themselves after such things as vexeth their spirit, as it were damned soules, and that so much the more miserable and with lesse contentation, as they enioy more of them. For what a torment is ambition and couetousnes, and other affections and vices that accompany them? And if we speake of lust, we see what is the vengeance of God vpon them, who going beyond the bounds of nature, so dishonor their bodies, and their owne nature, that there is no essence or nature whatsoever, vnto which they may be compared. For none doe so much peruert their nature as they: I meane not beasts onely, but not the diuels themselves. And although they be so beastlike, as to consider no more of the nature and essence of their soule then they do of beasts, yet the very figure of their bodies should make them to thinke, that God hath not made it differing from beasts, and namely in creating the head and face vpwards, but that hee hath also endued them with a soule differing from theirs, to the end it might be correspondent to the body in which it is. But it belongeth to thee ASER, to prosecute this argument, thereby to shew vnto vs the immortality of the soule.

Of the testimonie that men haue of the immortall nature of the soule in their very body, by the composition and frame thereof: of that which is in the motion and rest of their soules: how the creation of the whole world should be vaine, and how there should bee no providence of God, no religion, no diuine iustice if the soule were mortall: of the multitude and qualities of the witnesses that stand for the immortallitie thereof. Chap. 93.

ASER. That good king Ezechias complaining in his sicknesse, said, Mine habitation is departed, and is remooued from mee like a sheepebeards tent: I haue cut off like a weauer my life. This holy man compareth his body and the life of man in it, to a tabernacle & lodge; or to a tent and pavilion, which are no firme lodgings but remoueable and such as may be transported from one place to another, as souldiers carry away theirs, when they raise their campe to pitch it in some other place. And indeed a mans body in this world is as it were a lodging assigned for his soule to abide in a while, not to dwell there alwayes, as it were in one place. For this life, is like to a military life, and as a continuall warfare, vntill such time as we depart hence, and that God cutteth it off, (after we haue finished our appointed dayes) as a weauer cutteth off the threedes at the end of his web after it is finished. Therefore Saint Peter also calleth his body a tabernacle when he saith, I thinke it meet as long as I am in this tabernacle, to stirre you up by putting you in remembrance, seeing I know that the time is at hand that I must lay downe this tabernacle, euen as our Lord Iesus Christ hath shewed mee. S. Paul also vseth the like manner of speech when he saith, For wee know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle be destroyed, wee haue a building giuen of God, an house not made with hands, but eternall in the hea-uens. For therefore we sigh, desiring to be clothed with our house, which is from heauen. And to this agreeth that which is written in the Epistle to the Hebrewes. For here we haue no continuing city, but wee seeke one to come. Here truely are notable testimonies of the second and eternal life, against them that doubt of the immortality of the soule. But according to that which is giuen vs in charge to discourse of touching this matter, wee must bring them other testimonies euen in their bodies, seeing their spirit cannot mount vp to celestiall and diuine things.

We may easily iudge, if there be any light of nature remaining in our mind, that God would haue vs know, by the composition and stature of our bodies, how the soule and spirit dwelling within them should be affected, and whether it ought to looke. For why would God lift the head and face of men vpwards, and not the head of beasts, but that he would admonish them thereby, that they are of a celestiall nature? and that they must alwayes looke, not to the earth as beasts do, but to heauen, as to their native country, from whence they received their Originall, in respect of their principall part, which all Atheists & Epicures doe renounce? And if the body be lifted straight vpward, the spirit is much more, which ascending by degrees from inferior things, maketh no stay vntill it come to the heauely & diuine things: & hauing at length attained vnto them, it stiaeth there and contenteth it selfe therein. In regard whereof, as in naturall things wee know by their moouing and resting which is their naturall place, so by the same reason we may iudge of the naturall place of mans soule, which is in perpetuall motion, and can find no rest here below on the earth, as the soules of beasts can: which because they are altogether earthy, and all their naturall and proper good coming from no higher place then from the earth, their snows also are continually bending towards it: and the more earthly and brutish they are, the more downwards do they alwayes bend. This we may easily perceiue, if we compare not onely the beasts of the earth with birds which hold more of the nature of the ayre, and liue most therein, but also if wee compare the beastes of the earth one with another. For albeit all of them haue their snows inclining towards the earth, yet the hogge hath his head more bending downward then others haue. For it is fashioned & bowed after such a fashion, that no beast can lesse lift vp the head and stretch it towards heauen then the hog, neither is any so much troubled as that is, which by force it is compelled to looke vpward. The same may be said of the Moule, and of other such like beasts. Therefore if the Good that is proper and peculiar to the nature of man, consist not in this eternity and celestiall immortality of which wee speake, to what purpose is his head lift vpward, and his eies looking towards heauen, especially seeing God hath ioyned these things with a soule that is partaker of reason and vnderstanding; For among the beasts, we finde one fish, that hath the eies set in the top of the head and therefore it is called by the Græcians Vranoscopus, which signifieth as much as a Beholder of heauen, or looking towards heauen. But because it is not partaker of vnderstanding and reason, more then other beasts are, and seeing the soule of it differeth not from theirs, we may easily iudge, that the eies of it were not set in that place for the same reason that man hath his lifted vp towards heauen. Shall we say then that God hath created man and endewed him with so many graces and singular properties, to make him more wretched then beasts in this life, who otherwise is so miserable, and compassed about with so many euils on euery side? For whereto serueth the disposition of his nature, but to torment him the more by looking vp towards heauen, and by that knowledge which hee hath more then beasts haue, thereby encreasing in him a vaine desire of such a happinesse as he can neuer enioy? And which is worse, the more noble spirit that any on hath, the more learned and vertuous he is, or the more and longer oppressed he is with the miseries of this life, the more would this vaine desire pricke and torment him. And if there bee some, who like beasts passe over all these things without any sense and feeling, this befalleth them, either because they are of a heavy, sleepey, and blockish spirit, or else because they are drunken with that which is commonly called Fortunes fauour, namely, with the honours, riches, and pleasures of this world. So that wee must conclude vpon this speech, that because beasts doe here all that they haue to doe, according to those powers and gifts that are naturally in them, therefore they liue and die here: but because the Spirit giuen to man, cannot doe here according to his naturall disposition, it followeth necessarily, that as it is borne in an other place, so it must haue anot her place wherein to effect that which it hath to doe. And contrariwise, if the soule of man be mortal, al that he hath to do is in this life, as it is with beasts:

and then also it followeth, that he was created in vaine and without cause. For God created nothing, but hee propounded to himselfe the end for which hee created it, and that such an ende as is agreeable to the nature and dignity of euery one of his workes, else all things should haue beene created in vaine by him. Now if he created man onely to liue in this world, as he did other creatures, then did he not in his creation propound to himselfe an end befitting the excellency of such a nature. Which thing the greatest Philosophers amongst the heathen haue after due consideration bin constrained to confesse. And if a man for whose sake the whole visible world was created and who onely can, will, and knoweth how to vse all things contained therein, was created and receiued this life in vaine, what shall we thinke of all other things that were created because of him, and for his sake? Shall not the whole worke of creation be in vaine, and vnworthy the infinite maiesty and wise-dome of God the Creator? and he that is the Governour of the world, shal hee not be spoiled of all prouidence? Who ought not to abhor the very cogitation of such a thing? And yet the religion of God, his prouidence, and the immortalitie of our soule are so fast linked and ioyned together, and depend in such sort one vpon another, that they cannot be separated, neither indeed is it lawfull to separate them. For he that abolisheth the one, shaketh also that faith which we ought to hold of the rest: because if our soules be not immortal, there is neither punishmēt nor reward, either for vertue or vice, or for the good or ill deeds of men. For we see euidently, how all things are mingled and confused in the course of this present life, that they are turned into a common robbery, that the worst men make themselves Masters and Lords of the world, as if it were created onely for them, that they might bee in it as Gods vpon the earth: and contrariwise that good and iust men may seeme to haue been created onely for a pray to the wicked, and to bee lesse accounted of them then the brute beasts. Which if it were so, then should God haue no care of men: & if he haue no care of them, how shall hee bee their GOD and Creatour, and why should they rather then beasts call vpon him and honor him? For if it were so, what hath he done, or what doth hee yet more for them vnto whom hee hath giuen his law and commandement to call vpon him, to honour and serue him, then he doth for beasts to whom hee hath giuen no such law or commandement, and who do not call vpon him nor honor him according to the same as men doe? And what may we accompt all religion, all feare and reuerence of God to be, all holinesse, honesty and vertue, but superstition, and a vaine and foolish opinion & fancy of the mind of man? Not withstanding there hath alwaies bin a common testimony & euery consent of religion among all nations, euery amongst the most Barbarous and rude people that

that ever were found. Neither ever were any so ill taught but they haue put some difference betweene vertue and vice, and betweene honestie and dishonestie. It can not bee then, but that religion and vertue, narrowly engrauen in the heart of man, are good things, yea far better then their contraries. Whereas if God had no more respect to one then to the other, and were not to iudge thereof, to what purpose serueth this difference which men make betweene them? and what profit shall they reape to themselves by esteeming better of that which is good, then of euill? Good men should not onely receiue lesse profit by vertue then by vice, but further they should be damned by the same: & wicked men should euer haue the better: yea they should be rewarded instead of being punished. For the best and iustest men are commonly a pray vnto the wicked. And who shal deliuer them out of their hands, seeing for the most part they are the strongest, and haue in a manner the government of the world in their power, so that the most innocent persons are at their mercy as it were, except God should let them haue iustice either heere in this world or in some other? And if God should faile in doing iustice, vpon what right should the iustice that men vse against malefactours be grounded? Shall there be more iustice in men, who are altogether iniustice themselves, then in God who is the fountaine of all iustice, yea iustice it selfe? All this must be so, or else we must confesse, that all these things testifie vnto vs, that God hath care ouer vs, and that there is another place & time of rewarding euery man according to his works, then in this world, and here in this life. For this cause Saint Peter calleth the day of the last iudgement, in which all shall appeare before God, the time of the restoration of all things: foretold of God by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began. For considering that all things are so confused and troubled in the world, that it seemeth there is no difference betwixt the blessings and curses of God pronounced in his law, and that all things are turned topsie turvy by the malice of men, the Lord hath ordained a place & time, in which he will put an end to this disorder, and will restore all things to their right estate and good order. Now if the Lord hath appointed that euery one shall bee rewarded at that time and place, it followeth that then and there also we must search for the end for which man was created, and that his soule shall liue there. And if the soule then liueth, and in that place, it followeth well also that there is the end of it. For we take the end for that which is the last and most perfect in euery thing. So that if the question be of the authoritie of men, and multitude of witnesses for the confirmation of that, which hath bene hitherto saide of the immortallitie of the soules of men, we shall haue for this purpose all those, who from the beginning of the world amongst all people & nations, haue beleued and thought that there is a God, that there is a Diuine nature and providence, and consequently any religion: yea even those barbarous and savage nations, which were found out of late dayes in those new Ilands, commonly called the new found world. And if the qualitie of the witnesses is to be considered, we shall still haue almost all on our side. For if wee looke vnto the most barbarous and strangest nations that are, the testimony of nature which all of them carry in their hearts, compelleth them to range themselves one this side. And if wee come to others that haue bin more ciuill and better instructed, we shall haue a greater aduantage. Or if the question be of the greatest, and of such as by the consent and testimony of all, were accompted, and were indeede best learned and most vertuous, we shall not onely finde them to haue bin on our side, but also that they haue condemned as ignorant men and vnworthy to liue, them that haue bene of a contrary opinion, betwixt which men and the other there is great difference. For those amongst the Philosophers that denied the immortallitie of the soule, were such as did abolish also diuine nature and providence, and all religion, and such as placed the soveraigne good of men in pleasure: which kinde of men were alwayes worthily taken to be the vilest & most abiect, and as it were the skum and dregges of the professors of Philosophie. For to the end we may the better vnderstand this, by mine aduise wee will consider of the best arguments that are alleadged by Philosophers to prooue the immortallitie of soules, that they who will not credite the testimony of the holy Scriptures, may feeble themselves vrged in their conscience with the sayings of Ethnickes and heathen men, who shal rise vp in iudgment against them to aggrauate their condemnation. Now it belongeth to thee, AMANA, to follow this matter.

AMANA. There is in all men a naturall desire of knowledge and wisdom: yea a man may perceiue that molt barbarous men desire naturally to know, vnto what Art soeuer they apply their spirit, iudging the same to be commendable and honest, as contrariwise they accompt it vnbecoming a man and dishonest, to be ignorant, to erre, and to be deceived. From this desire the wisest and molt famous among the Philosophers tooke a very good argument to prooue the immortality of the soule. For seeing this desire is naturall, and that in this world all the knowledge and wisdom that men can haue, is the very small, and as it were nothing in respect of that which they want, they conclude necessarily, that there must needs be some other place and time then in this life, wherein that which is here begunne but slenderly, is to be accomplished and made perfect.

An argument taken from the desire of wisdom to prooue the immortalitie of the soule.

1. Cor. 13. 12.

An objection made by some philosophers.

The answer.

The reason from whence they deriue their argument, is that common saying, that God and Nature the minister of God doe nothing without cause. Wherefore seeing this desire of knowledge and wisdom is naturall in man, it cannot be in vaine, neither is it given vnto him, but that it should attaine to some end and perfection. For to what purpose serued the corporall eies of liuing creatures, & for what cause should they beginne them, if they could neuer see, or were to liue alwaies in darknesse? So likewise, why should the eies of the soule and minde be giuen to men, thereby to behold celestiall and diuine things, which cannot be seene with bodily eies, if they could neuer view them, but in such darknesse as they do here behold them? To what end also should man be naturally pricked forward with a desire to know the truth & to haue skill, if he could neuer soundly enioy his desire, but should remain alwaies in ignorance for the greatest part of those things, which he desireth to know & which are of so great waight, that whatsoeuer he is able to vnderstand and know in this world, is nothing or very little in regard of that which yet remaineth behinde for him to know? For not to speak of those things in which all humane philosophie must acknowledge her ignorance, let vs come to that vnderstanding which we may haue by the holy Scriptures revealed vnto vs of God. For although the knowledge we haue by the, surpasseth without all comparison all humane philosophie & science, yet S. Paul compareth it to knowledge that is very obscure, to a light that is seenethrough thick & darke clouds, & to an image presented vnto vs in a glasse, in comparison of that molt high and perfect knowledge and vnderstanding, which is reserued for vs in another life, and whereof we haue here but a very little taste & weake beginning. Therefore if we could neuer goe further, would it not be a vaine and ridiculous thing, if God had giuen this desire onely to men, & neuer would vouchsafe to let them haue the effect of it? And if it wereso, that GOD had not ordeined another time and place, for the finishing of that which is here begunne in this life, it seemeth that the complaint made by some of the greatest Philosophers against Nature, should not be without some ground of reason. For what iust cause is there, that he should giue a longer life to some beasts then to men, seeing it skilleth not whether beasts liue long or no; because long life cannot makethem more learned, or more wise then they are at their birth? But it is otherwise in man. For seeing that knowledge and wisdom are his greatest Good, whereby he approacheth neerer to the nature of God, and of which all his other good things chiefly depend, it seemeth to stand with reason, that God should haue giuen a longer life to men then to beasts, that so they might the better attaine to so great a good, so necessary for them, in regard of which especially, they are preferred before beasts and differ from them. For we see by experience, that we must die so soone almost as we beginne to taste of Sciences, and to waxe wise. But we haue no cause to make this complaint against the wisdom, prudence, and goodnesse of God, who hath granted vs life long enough, wherein we may learne here as much as we neede, (if wee could vse it well) both to passe away this life, and also to attaine to the other, in which we shall abound in knowledge and wisdom and

and be fully satisfied therewithall. And although God hath giuen vs a life twice as long in this world as that we now enioy, so that we might liue as long as the auncient Patriarkes, whose yeares were so many, especially before the flood as Moses testifieth, yet al that which we could possible learne during the time of so long life, would be very little in cōparison of the knowledge reserved for vs in that Eternitie. For the eies of our spirit and minde are not able to endure so great brightnesse of heauenly knowledge and wisdom, whilest it is here shut vp and as it were imprisoned in this body of sinne; and in a manner wholly overwhelmed with darkenesse but it fareth with the spirit in this respect, as it doth with the Owle in regard of his eyes, and of the light of the Sunne. Therefore every one hath better cause to assure himselfe, that God hath appointed an other time and place for the full accomplishment of this desire of knowledge and wisdom that is so firmly engrauen in the nature of men, then to accuse God, as if he offered them iniury to deprive them thereof by the shortnesse of their life. Now let vs come to other particular reasons of Philosophers concerning this matter we haue in handling. Although Aristotle so famous amongst them bee very obscure and wauering where hee handleth the same, so that it is a very hard matter to vnderstand what was his opinion and resolution therein, neuertheless he dares not plainly say that the spirit of man is of a bodily nature & corruptible matter, or that it is mortall as the body is. But in one place he saith, that if the Spirit be able to vnderstand without the fantasie, it may be separated from it: but it cannot vnderstand without it, then it cannot be separated. Which is al one as if he saide, that if the spirit could vnderstand without the senses, & the vnderstanding and reason without fantasie and imagination, then a man might certainly conclude, that there is a difference in nature & substance betweene these things, & that there may a separation be made: so that the destruction of the one doeth not bring with it a corruption of the other. Wherefore none may conclude the mortality of the spirit that is capable of reason and vnderstanding, by the immortality either of the externall or internall senses. But Aristotle leaueth it doubtfull in this place, whether this separation may be made yea or no, and whether a man may conclude thereupon, that the spirit is of an other nature and substance then the senses are, and so consequently immortall. But it followeth not, that if the soule being in the body vnderstandeth things bodily, that is to say, by the bodily instruments that are outward, and then by the conuenience of the internall senses, therefore it can vnderstand nothing but that which they declare and bring vnto it. For after the internall senses haue gathered together the images and similitudes of those externall things that are offered vnto them, and so retaineth them fast being secluded and separated from all matter, the vnderstanding is to receiue from thence the first and simple knowledge of things. So that as the qualities of externall things are the matter subiect of the internall senses, so their images conceived by the internall senses, and purged from all bodily matter, are the matter subiect of the vnderstanding and spirit. And the spirit labouring about them draweth out certaine motions, and knoweth many things from them, which cannot mooue the senses, and which the senses cannot know. And yet the spirit is first mooued by these images, as the senses are by externall things. But wee must declare these things somewhat more familiarly. We vnderstand already, how corporall things are the subiect and objects of the corporall senses, and that the bodily senses receiue and know them corporally, even such as they are presented vnto them, every one according to his nature and office. But they cannot receiue or perceiue any more then that which is laied open vnto them, and manifesteth it selfe outwardly. Now after the outward senses haue thus receiued them and their matter couered with their qualities, the internall senses, to which the externall are seruiceable, conceiue the images without the matters and qualities of those things whereof they are images. For the eye cannot see either the Sunne or the light of it, nor yet any other creature discovered by the light, except it be present before it. But the Fantasie and imagination receiue and conceiue the images of things, even in darkenesse, although the things of which they are images, apparant to the eyes, nor yet are perceiued at that present by any corporall sense. We see then already how these images are separated from the matter of which they are images, and how the internall senses behold them without their matter and bodies, as the externall senses looke vpon them being ioyned with their bodies.

Aristotles opinion touching the immortality of the soule.

How the vnderstanding cometh to the knowledge of outward things by the senses.

How the outward senses looke vpon things. How the internall senses receiue the same things.

Then haing receiued them thus purged from their corporall matter, the spirit receiueeth them yet more pure, and goeth further in the knowledge and vnderstanding of them then all the senses do, comprehending other things, of which the senses can have no knowledge or apprehension. And thus the Spirit beholdeth and vnderstandeth corporall things corporally, that is by meanes of those instruments which it hath in the body, and spirituall things it beholdeth spiritually without those instruments. Whereupon it followeth, that although it vseth the senses and such kinde of instruments, neuertheless it is not so tied vnto them that it cannot be separated, or do nothing without them, or not know and vnderstand that which they are not able to conceiue or know. So that it is no hard matter to beleene, that the soule is of another nature & substance, as a man may iudge also by this that it is the fountaine and beginning of motion begun by it selfe, & not by any other, but as we haue already declared. Likewise by this, that it is capable of the knowledge of infinite things, of which it retaineth the memory, and that it inquireth into secret things separated from all corporall matter, which cannot be perceiued by any sense: & that it doth so many and so great things without the helpe of any bodily nature. Whereupon the Philosophers conclude, that it is of a simple nature, not compounded, and so consequently that it is immortal. For that nature, which is adorned and decked with such vertues, & with the facultie to vnderstand, the like whereof is not in the body, and which can vnderstand by it selfe without the vse of the body, cannot be compounded of an earthly & mortall nature, nor haue any part thereof mingled with it selfe, but it is stayed and sustained by it selfe, it subsisteth of it selfe and is immortal. Hereof also it followeth, that if the soule of man be of such a nature, then it cannot be rent in sunder or diuided, or pulled into peeces, or haue any thing in it that can be separated from it: & so it must needs be that it cannot die or perish. And therefore the best and most excellent Philosophers hold that sentence as immouable, which Aristotle saith in another place, namely, that the spirit is a thing separate and distinct from the senses and from the body, as an immortall thing from a mortall: and that it commeth from without, and else-where then from the body, as we haue already touched it in another place. Whereby to my thinking, he hath declared very plainly, that hee did not take the soule of man to be mortall. But yet it is somewhat hard to iudge what his opinion was, because he doth not shew himselfe so openly as the matter requireth. Yet whatsoever he thought or resolved with himselfe, the soule shal not be therefore any whit the more mortall or immortal. For the immortality thereof dependeth not vpon his opinion, or of any other mans whatsoever. Neuertheless seeing so subtil and sharpe a Philosopher durst not affirme that it was mortall, every one of any sound mind may well iudge, that he knew there were too many arguments to the contrary, and those so waightie, that they deserued to be diligently, examined, and were not so lightly to be reiected. For he was not so shamefast & modest, but he durst boldly reiect and condemne the opinions and sentences of all others that were as well in his time as before him, how great and famous personages soeuer they were, when he thought hee could doe it with any shew of reason, insomuch as he spared not his master Plato. Therefore albeit wee had no other resolution from him touching this matter, but this only that he was in doubt, and durst affirme nothing on either side, yet his authority ought to preuaile much with vs against them who depende only of humane Philosophy and reason, & are so easily induced to approoue rather of the mortality then of the immortality of the soule. For at leastwise they may imagine, that so great a Philosopher who is in such wonderfull estimation amongst all learned men, did not iudge their reasons frivolous & vaine, who maintained the immortality of the soule, as our Epicures and Atheists thinke, because they are more blockish & foole hardie. And therefore they boldly condemne that which either they will not or cannot conceiue and comprehend, not considering what a confusion of things their opinion worketh in all mankind. For besides that which wee haue spoken to this purpose already, if it were so that the soule were mortall, the wickedest and most desperate men should haue that which they desire most, and which is most expedient for them: and that should befall the best and iustest men, which they abhorre most, & flee from as very hurtful for them: contrary to that which Salomon saith in the Proverbs, That the wicked shall fall into the euill he feareth, and that the desire of the iust shall be accomplished. In regard whereof good men should haue far greater reason to feare death, then the wicked to desire it. For what good man is there of noble courage, who will not greatly abhorre death when he thinketh with himselfe, that it consumeth and swalloweth vp the whole man, as if he were buried in perpetuall darkenes? What consolation will serue him, and what comfort can a man offer him, that will be able to surmount the feare and horror of death, but that he will expect and suffer it with great impatiencie and dispaire, when hee shall be through necessity brought vnto it? As for that consolation, which is taken from the necessitie of nature ture, and from the common condition of all men, it is very leane if there be no other. We see by them who are so greatly tormented, that they wish and aske after death, as after a haven wherein they may be deliuered from that tempest and torment in which they are, although the greefe which they suffer breede such vowes and desires in them, yet if they haue but a small respite, they gather some consolation to themselves by some assurance, that their grieft will in time cease, or else that time and custome will make it lighter vnto them, and will teach them to beare it patiently.

To be short, life is so acceptable and beloued of euery one, that such as are most miserable and wretched cannot be brought to leaue it but with great grieft, no not those who destroy themselves with their owne hands. Whereby we may iudge, how much more better it is to them that haue not all these occasions to desire it. For euery one may imagine, what extreame grieft it would be to a good man, who for liuing honestly all his life time, and for all the good which he had ener thought, spoken or done, should not onely receiue honour nor recompence in this world, but which is no worse, (as it commonly falleth out among men) should receiue nothing but euil for good. And yet in the meane time he should see the woorst men, that wholly giue ouer themselves to dishonor & despite God, enioy, the honors, riches, & pleasures of this world: and contrariwise himself to haue nothing but dishonour, shame, confusion, famine, pouerty, miserie, sorrow, torment, & oftentimes cruel death. What comfort can such a body haue, if he thinke that there is no other reward after this life, nor any better estate for him then for the wicked & abominable person in the world? And although none of al this should euer happen to good men, yet what contentation could they find in all the rewards which they should receiue in this world for recompence of their vertue? It is an easie matter to iudge by this, that the memorie of the name & praise of well doing doth not alwayes take effect, neither is it alwaies due to the that haue it, but oftentimes very vniustly giuen. But from thee, ARAM, we shall receiue more full instruction touching this matter.

Of that praise and reward which wisdom and vertue may receiue of men in this world: how miserable it is, if there be no better prepared for them else-where: how death would be more grievous and lamentable to the best learned and wisest men, then to the ignorant and foolish: if the soule were mortall: how the best and most certaine iudgement of men is for the immortalitie of the soule: of them who not beleeuing the same, say that it is good for men to be in such an error. Chap. 95.

ARAM. If the Philosophers might draw many arguments of great waight from the naturall desires of men, to prooue the immortality of soules, this which we haue now to propound of that purpose and reward, which euery one naturally desireth, is of great consideration touching this matter. For it is very certaine, that the best and most iust among men, albeit they could auoide all hurt from wicked men, wherewith commonly they are rewarded from procuring their good, yet they should not enioy any true & sound contentation in any of these rewards, which they might haue in this world as recompence of their vertue. But rather whilest they were expecting & hoping for them, they should be euer in doubt and feare of missing them, by reason of the inconstancie of men, and of the vncertainty of all humane things. So that nature might well seeme to haue giuen vnto them this desire of praise and of reward, if they should neuer enioy their desire else-where but in this present life. Whereof we may easily iudge by the reasons that are to be set downe.

For the first, the memory of a mans name and the praise for well doing doth not alwaies come to passe, neither doth it fall out aright in regard of all, but is for the most part very vniust. For how often is glory and honour attributed to vices, yea to very execreable crimes & to the wicked, whereas it ought to be giuen to vertue and to good men? And if these haue sometime any commendation, yet it is very sparing. But it falleth out much woorse, when vertue receiueith blame in stead of praise. And when something is giuen to the vnto whom it appertaineth, it cannot be stretched out farre, by reason of the diuersity and contrariety of natures, of minds and opinions, of the manners of men, and of people and nations. For how often cometh it to passe, that some condemne & blame that which others approoue and praise? Yea many times one and the same man will contradict himselfe through the inconstancie of his iudgement, now dispraying that which before hee had prayed, and contrawife. On the other side, albeit fame and commendation should bee neuer so great, yet it could not bee of any long continuance, considering that time consumeth, and bringeth an end to all that is vnder the heauens. Moreouer wee see what great alterations are daily wrought by time: and although praise were perpetuall among the liuing, yet what could it profit the dead? or what feeling can they haue of that, more then of blame and infamie? For the praise which good kings and Princes haue purchased by their vertues, and the memory they haue left behinde them among men, can profit them no more in regard of the world, then the memorie of that infamie and dispraise, which tyrants haue left behinde them can do them any hurt. For how well or ill soeuer men speake and thinke on of another, the dead haue no sense at all thereof. Yea it is likely, that they care not greatly for it, & that they rest neuer the lesse at their ease for all that. Therefore we may well conclude, that notwithstanding al the praise and reward which wisdom & vertue can receiue from men in this world yet they are still very miserable, if there be no better provided for them elsewhere. And if wise and vertuous men hope for another reward, they must needs beleue a second life, in which they shall be recompensed for their good and iust works. But further, when a learned and wise man hath by his spirit discoursed and gone through the heauens, the planets and starres, beasts, men, and through al nature, yea hath reached to the Angels, and euen to God himselfe the Creator & king of the whole world, and hath passed through al histories both new & old, and hath gotten the knowledge of al things contained in the, that haue come to passe in the world: I pray you let vs consider what he can be told of, that wil be more grievous, more bitter & fearefull vnto him, then of death, and what consolation can he receiue when he shal vnderstand, that his soule which hath seene & beheld so great riches, so many goodly and excellent things, and which hath bin as it were the storehouse & treasure of them, shal be wholly extinguished in the midst of such a goodly, pleasant, and wonderfull scaffold and theatre, that is so excellently adorned with all kind of beauty, so that it shall neuer be againe at any time or in any place, nor shall haue any more sense and feeling then the soule of a beast hath. What is hee, who after such a consideration of death, should not haue great cause to feare it, in so great miserie as may befall him in his life? Doe we thinke that these men among the Heathen who heretofore slay themselves to eschew the hands of their enemies and that shame and infamie which they feared to receiue among men, & who haue accounted it an act of great vertue & constancie to kill themselves in that maner for the auoiding of shame, would haue done that which they did, if they had not thought that there had bin another life besides this? At lest wise Cato Uticensis for his part testified this vnto vs, who the same night in which he had purposed to kill himselfe (which he did because he would not fall into the hands and subiection of Iulius Caesar, against whome he had taken Armes in that ciuill war) caused those Dialogues of Plato to be read vnto him, in which hee maintaineth and confirmeth the immortality of the soule, according to the doctrine of his master Socrates. We may then iudge by the contrary, what consolation it is to a good and wise man, against all the miseries that can befall him in this world, if he knoweth and is assuredly perswaded, that there is a resting place prepared for him not therein to be deprived of all sense of good and euill, as they imagine who seeke for rest in death without all hope of another life, but a place of happines for them that with a good heart and Will haue given themselves to vertue and holinesse, which is appointed by God, who is all iust almighty, & all good. For what rest can that thing find, which is not at all? So that if man be no more after the death of the bodie, then death cannot bring him any rest at all. And therefore we may say of this rest, that as God is not the God of the dead but of the liuing, according to the testimony of Iesus Christ, so rest is not for them, that are not, but for them that are. For rest presupposeth a being, because the thing it selfe must needs be, as well as the rest that belongeth to it: otherwise neither of them both should haue any being. Thus then wee may iudge, after so many reasons taken from nature, and hauing had so many testimonies as haue hitherto beene alleadged, from the authority and sayings of men, on which side the truth is most certaine, whether with them who haue all good and wise men on their side, or with the other, who haue none but foolish and wicked men.

We haue then in this matter which now we follow, the iudgement, authority and sentence of all the greatest and most excellent men in the world, with the greatest and chiefest part of all mankind. Vnto whose testimony we further may add religion, iustice, holinesse, and al vertues which are so grounded, and laide vpon the immortality of mans soule, that if this foundation be taken from them, they are altogether ouerthrowen. For albeit they haue haue their chiefest foundation in God, neuerthelesse he hath so ordained and ordered them, that they cannot take place, if there bee no immortality of soules, and that for the reasons already declared. It followeth then well, that truth is on their side. For truth will rather stand for them, then for vices, villanies, and notorious wickednesse, vnto which the mortality of the soule is more agreeable then the immortality. And if all the Philosophers were not able to attaine to the knowledge of the soules nature, nor define the immortality thereof, we ought not to be greatly abashed, if such as were most ignorant, vile, and abiect of them (as they are called by some of the best of the Ancients) abused themselves so grossely, and spake so vnreuerently, seeing many of the greater sort and of good account, fell so shamefully, and shewed themselves to be worser then beasts in some things wherof a man may iudge by the outward senses. For haue there not some beene found, who albeit they saw the snow white, yet they durst maintaine that it was blacke, and that pepper was white; and although they felt the fire hote and burning, yet affirmed that it was cold? But for this time let vs leaue the opinions of Philosophers, and speake somewhat of them, who although they do not beleue the immortality of soules, nor yet all that is spoken of GOD or of religion, say not withstanding that it is good for the life of man, that men should bee of that opinion, without which humane society could not bee kept inuiolable, neither would men doe any thing, as they ought, if they were not as it were with a bridle kept backe by this feare, that there is another life after this, and that there are gods to take vengeance of such as haue done euill. And therefore they say, that feare was the first that made gods. Hereof they conclude, that religion is nothing, but onely in opinion, yea that it is nothing else but superstition, which proceedeth from this foolish opinion. But seeing this error serueth for the benefit of mans life, it is good, say they, to vpholde it, and to confirme men therein.

Of such as say it is good to keepe men in this opinion of the immortality of the soule, and yet themselves beleue it not

And they that vse this speech, are none of them that are taken to bee fooles and ignorant persons, but of the greater and skilfuller sort of people, yea of the wisest men of the world according to the iudgement of men. For when wee speake of good men and such as are wise, wee must iudge of them according to the matter which we handle, and according to the iudgement of God in his word. Therefore, if according to this reason wee iudge of these men of whom we now speake, they shall bee found to be the grossest and most blockish beasts that the earth beareth. For all science, wisdom, and greatness, separated from vertue, are not the things themselves indeede, but brutishnesse rather, and vile basenesse. And if wee iudge otherwise, what is all the knowledge, wisdom and greatness that is in all men, in respect of that which is one Diuell onely? For what want the diuels from being Angels like to those blessed Angels that continue still in their obedience vnto God? If there bee any question made for greatness of spirit, they are all spirit. If for such wisdom and knowledge as that cunning and wise men of this world haue, of whom haue worldly wise men learned their skill but of them, in comparison of whom they are but young schollers? If the question bee for greatness, what King or Prince in the world is so great as they? For who is called the Prince of this world by Iesus Christ, the God of this world by Saint Paul, principalities, powers, worldly gouernours, and the princes of the darknesse of this world? Are not the Diuels so called, who rule and gouerne the great ones of the whole world, that are great indeed according to men, but not according to God? What then doe they want of being celestiall Angels, but vertue and goodnesse? But because these men of whom we speake now, beleue not that there are Angels or Diuels, wee will beate them with other arguments. For of these men also there bee some that say, we must liue as the most doe, but follow the opinion of the fewest. Now then, when they would haue men to bee perswaded to vertue, and to doe their duty by lying and error, namely, by intertaining in them an opinion of religion, and of a second life, although there bee no such thing, is not this, a very proper means to call all truth into question, and to trample all vertue vnder feete? For if any propound the immortality of soules vnto men, not as if it were a true matter, but as a fayned and false thing which yet they would haue them beleue as true, to the end that through the feare of Gods iudgement they might bee kept backe from euill, and lead vnto goodnesse, every one may guesse easily, how men will dispence with themselves, when they once know, that whatsoever is spoken and propounded vnto them, is but a scarre-crowe to make them affraide, as we vse to deale with little children and with birds by puppets and strawe men, and such like things. And who will first perceiue and finde out these subtilties, such as are most ignorant and foolish, or the other that are more skilfull and wise? It is easie to iudge, that they who haue best wits and are best learned, will sooner perceiue the same then the other.

Now what will follow hereupon, but that they being freed from the feare which held the in before, shall by the same means be let loose and sundred from the bond of all religion and vertue, as if it were cleane broken: as it hath and daily doth happen to them that maintaine this opinion, and to those also that haue bin taught & instructed in their schoole. And consequently this also will follow, that the quicker and sharper wit a man hath, and the greater knowledge and vnderstanding is in him, the more wicked and bad he will prooue. For if he vnderstand that religion is but religion in name, and indeed is nothing but foolish superstition, and if he iudge as much of the immortality of the soule: hauing thus shaken off all religion, he will cast away all feare of God, & not suffer himselfe to be bridled in any sort, either by any terrour of the iudgement to come, or reuerence of the deity, but only by the feare of mens lawes. And if this take place in men, we may well thinke what licence they will take to themselves to commit the greatest sins & abominations in the world, especially if they be in darknes, and think no man seeth them, & that there is no other iudge that perceiueth them, to who they must one day giue an account. And if they be so great, that by their power they may violate all lawes both diuine and humane, as tyrants commonly vse to do, who shall stay them from living like sauage beasts among men? So, that as euery one by dexterity of spirit, by doctrine and instruction, shall approach neerer to that perfection for which man was created of God, the more inclined, ready and armed he will be to commit all kind of malice and wickednesse. For how can he doe otherwise, when that secret of the schoole shall be disclosed vnto him, and when he shall learne, that whatsoever is here taught concerning religion, vertue and honesty amongst men, is but fained and inuented for the nonce to keepe men in feare? Surely this will cause him to let loose the raines to all licentiousnesse. Now what corruption of the spirit and mind of man is there comparable to this? or what will sooner turne it aside from that perfection in which the soueraigne & chiefe good of it consisteth? Therefore seeing the cause standeth thus, this opinion of theirs cannot be true, but overthroweth it selfe. For whatsoever corrupteth the spirit and turneth it from his perfection, is contrary to the nature thereof.

That which corrupteth
the spirit is contrary to the nature of it.

Wherefore we must conclude, that it is far otherwise, & that this saying of theirs is as true as if one should say, that the perfecter a man is, the more he is vnperfect, the better he is, the worse he is: and the more truly he is man, the further off he is from the nature of a man, and more like to the nature of sauage beasts. Who then can doubt of the truth of the soules immortality after so great a multitude of arguments, and of so strong and so mighty witnesses, who fight in battell array, as it were a strong army, against them that vphold the contrarie? But we haue others no lesse worthy to be considered of, which we beare within our selues, and which are so common to all, that there is no man whatsoever, but he feeleth and perceiueth them, whether he will or no. Therefore it shall be good for vs to speake somewhat thereof also, to the end that the matter we haue in hand may be the better and more perfectly vnderstood, to the confusion of Epicures and Atheists: and that we may still acknowledge more and more the testimonies of the image of God in vs, and who we be, and what good or euill things are prepared for vs in the immortality of the second life, according as we shall be conformed and reformed to the will of God, or els as we shall be remooued from that image and giue credit to impiety and lies. Now it belongeth to thee, ACHITOB, to discourse of this matter.

Of those infernall testimonies, which all men carry within themselves, to conuince them that doubt of the immortality of the soule, and of the iudgement to come which shall be in eternall happines for the good, and perpetuall torment for the euill: how the very Heathen acknowledged as much by reason taken from the testimonies of nature. Chap. 96.

ACHI. The manifold miseries & scourges of Gods wrath wherewith me are daily oppressed, should minister vnto the iust occasio to think, how odious their sins & wickednes are are to God, and that he will not leaue them unpunished, neither in this life nor in the life to come. For as he giueth to his children of his goodnes, and of those good things which hee hath prepared for them in another life, by the benefits which he communicateth vnto the in this: so he setteth before our eyes testimonies of his wrath and of his iudgement, and of those evils and torments which he hath prepared for the wicked in another life, by them wherewith he vseth to correct and punish them herein this world. But besides this, every one hath within himselfe testimonies either of eternall blessings or curses to come: which may easily conuince them that will not receiue the authority of the Scriptures, nor any natural reason to prooue the immortality of the soule. For they beare about them all their witnessses and their owne condemnation: and therefore it will be an easie matter to conuince them, although not to confound them. I say to conuince them, because a man is then conuinc'd, when he is compelled to acknowledge in his conscience, that hee hath no reason whereby hee is able to gain say and withstand the truth declared vnto him which condemneth him. But yet if he be obstinate, headstrong malicious and peruerse, he neuer ceaseth for all that to kick against the pricke, and to perseuere in his obstinacy and peeuish malice. For when reason faileth him, he armeth himselfe with impudency, like to a bold murderer, and to a shamelesse strumpet that cannot be made ashamed. But howsoeuer wicked men labour to blind their mind, and to harden their heart against the iudgement of God, yet the same is neuer declared vnto them, but they feelee themselves pricked & pressed therewith, wil they, nill they: not that it fareth with them as it doth with Gods children, who are touched therewith vnto repentance, but as S. Paul speaking of the wicked and obstinate, saith, that God hath given them a pricking spirit, because they haue a bitter heart, which stirreth them to whet themselves as it were more and more against God, and to despise him, when they feelee themselves pressed and vrged by his word and by his iudgements.

Now then God having created Angels and men, that they should know him and follow his will, gaue them a nature endued with vnderstanding, and hath set within them rules of iudgement, and of certen knowledge, which are vnto them as lawes in nature, and hath also placed in them the will with the affections, as ministers & practisers of those rules and lawes. This selfe same diuine prouidence hath appointed also that the affection of ioy should be naturally in men, which commeth vnto them by reason of some good which they receiue or looke for when they obey his lawes that commandeth them to do iust things, as contrariwise, he hath put in them the affection of sorrow and heauines to take vengeance of the rebellion against his lawes, & of the transgression of them. For as God hath decreed, that the nature of man should lead a ioyfull life, and should by this means of ioy be preserved in the knowledge of God his creator & in his obedience, & so rest in him: so also he hath appointed flames of wrath & griefe to destroy this nature, when it doth not conforme it selfe vnto the rule of his heavenly wisdom & will. Therefore we may wel say, that we cary about with vs, as it were our paradise and our Hell, & haue already in this world true beginnings of the both. For so long as we conforme our selues to God and follow his wisdom and wil, so that we submit our will to his, and desire not to be wise but in him and by him, nor iudge any thing good or euill, but according to his iudgement, neither will any thing but that which he willeth, and take no pleasure but in obeying & pleasing him, we cannot be thus affected towards him, but we shall receiue an vnspokeable ioy by that mutuall participation of loue which is between him and vs, and by that tast which we receiue thereby of his goodnesse, bounty, grace, and fauour towards vs, which is the toppes of all happinesse. For as the nature of men was created of God, to the end it might be conformable vnto him, so also it was ordained by him that it should liue, not to be extinguished and vndone through griefe, which is an euill that corrupteth and consumeth, as wel as diseases. Therefore if it were conformable to God, so that mens hearts agreed vnto reason and right iudgement, they should alwayes reioyce in well doing, both before and after the deed done: and so we should bee already as it were in Paradise. And although God be euery where in regard of his nature and diuine essence, which is infinite, neuerthelesse we meane according to the stile of the holy Scriptures, that he is properly and specially there, where he sheweth himselfe good, gracious, and fauourable. For this is more proper to his nature in regard of vs, and that which maketh him more louing and amiable to vs, and which is most necessary for vs, and in regard whereof he calleth himselfe properly our God and our Father. But as he kindleth the sparkles of loue in their hearts that are vpright and sincere, that loue and honour him, which worketh in them so great ioy and consolation, that all other ioy and pleasure are nothing vnto them in respect of that: so contrariwise, if we turne aside and separate our selues from him, opposing our selues against his wisdom and wil, as rebellious subiects to their Prince, violating all his lawes and statutes, he kindleth in vs fire-brands of his wrath and furie, which work in vs extreame griefs, so that we cannot beare them, but are consumed by them. For in this corruption and peruerseness of nature, our heart burneth with the flames of this infernall fire with which it is kindled, and which strue against reason and right iudgement, even before it hath committed the fault: neither doth it feare afterwards to comit the same, how great and enormous soever it be. But forasmuch as it belongeth to the iustice of God, to destroy that nature which is disobedient vnto him, he hath established this order, namely, that sorrow and griefe (as it were the hangman) should punish and destroy them that are guilty, as criminall persons are punished by the appointment of iustice. Wherefore although wicked men are oftentimes blockish and lulled asleepe, and as it were void of all sense and feeling, so that they feele not this griefe to the quick, neuertheless, in the end it is throughly felt of them, so that it vtterly destroyeth them. For it is like to a fire which hauing beene covered or smothered, afterwards kindleth againe, and gathereth strength, when it is recovered and receiueth aire, if it haue matter whereupon it may worke. For besides that naturall griefe which hath this office, God addeth thereunto horrible feare and terror, where by he ouerwhelmeth the wicked, as if he thundred vpon them: so that euen here they feele their Hell, and the fire of Gods wrath taking hold of them, yea they carry about them their internall furies, which are vnto them in stead of Hangmen.

How men carry about them the matter of two fires.

Deut 4. 24.
Heb. 12. 29.
Esay 66. 24.

Thus we may learne, how we may carry about with vs the matter of two fires, the one celestially and diuine, the other infernall and diuillish. Wherefore let vs consider well with our selues, which of them we had rather haue kindled in vs, and which we ought to desire most, either that which giueth vs both light and heat, and preserveth vs in the hope of true life: or else that which burneth and consumeth vs and doth wholly deprive vs of that life. Now surely they are very wretched, who desire not that which is most agreeable to their owne nature, and vtterly detest and abhor the other. For as we delight in the fire, because it giueth vs light and warmeth vs: so we feare greatly to be burned and consumed by it. Now both these sorts of fire we find in God. For he is a fire to giue light and warmeth to them that approach and draw neere vnto him, and desire to walke in his light, but contrariwise he is a consuming fire, ioyned with smoake and obscurity, to them who by rebellion and disobedience rush against him. For this cause the fire of hell and of Gods wrath, which is prepared for the diuell and for all the reprobate, is called eternall fire in the holy Scriptures, that is neuer put out: and the pains and torments of the damned are likewise called darknes without, where shalbe weeping and gnashing of teeth. And to the end we might know the nature of this fire the better, God hath put sparkles therof within vs. Wherefore we are only to consider what matter we bring to kindle and encrease either the one or the other, either for the preservation of our nature and life appointed vnto vs by God, or els for the overthrow and destruction therof. And by the sense and feeling, which we may haue hereof that ioy, gladnes and contentation, which the knowledge of God and obedience to his will bringeth to our hart, we may also iudge whether there be a paradise, and another life & other ioy besides this, which we receiue by corporall pleasures, as beasts doe. For this ioy that cometh to vs from such pleasures, is common to vs with them, and vsually it endeth in sorrow and sadnesse. But they haue no other that commeth vnto their soule, of which they may haue any apprehension as we haue. And by the same consideration, wee may also in some sort iudge of that happines in which we shall be in the other life, when this ioy shalbe perfect in vs wherof we haue here but a very smal tast, in respect of that we shal haue, when we shalbe fully reformed according to Gods image, so that both our vnderstanding, reason & wil shall be made conformable vnto him, because we shalbe wholly swallowed vp in his loue. Contrariwise if here we feele a Hell which we carry about vs, and which greatly tormenteth vs, after we haue offended the maiesty of God, especially when we haue committed some horrible crimes, this also is another argument wherby we may iudge whether there be not a Hell, & vengeance fro God to be executed vpon his enemies in another life. For that sorrow, which our crimes committed doe breed in our hearts, is within vs as a brand of this fire of Gods wrath, which is daily kindled in vs more & more. Wherefore if there be in vs already such vehement heate therof, when as yet the Lord doth kindle but a little the fire brands of his wrath in our hearts, how great shall it then be, when all his wrath shalbe set on fire? certainly they are very dul that do not well consider & vnderstand it. Now we haue heard heretofore how

how the heathen Philosophers concluded the immortality of mans soule by the nature thereof, affirming that it is not created or compounded of corruptible matter, but is of a celestiall and diuine nature; by reason of that knowledge which it hath, not only of particular and corporall things, as the soule of beasts hath, but also of vniuersall and spirituall things, and namely, of God, of numbers, of order, of the difference between vertue and vice, and between honest and dishonest things. For the knowledge of all these things is so naturall to mens soules, that they are with in them, albeit they haue not receiued them from without, either by doctrine or instruction. Whereby a man may easily iudge, yea it followeth necessarily, that they are created of a more excellent nature then is that of the elements, of a nature that is incorruptible and perpetuall. Wherefore it is very euident, that this knowledge, thus naturall to mens soules, is a certaine testimony, that they are not borne at all aduenture, but are created by great art, and by a wonderfull providence of that diuine and eternall nature, by which they haue their being, namely God their Creatour, for which cause also the knowledge of him shineth in vs. So also we may well iudge, that God hath not in vaine placed in our nature the knowledge of the difference, that is between vertue and vice, between things honest & dishonest, and that griefe which is to take vengeance in vs of those vices & crimes of which we feele our selues guilty. And therefore the Heathen themselves concluded, that there was not only a diuine iustice and nature which discerned good men from euill, but also that there was another life after this, in which this iudgement should be made. For they considered what great torments the wicked feele in their heartes and conscience, after they haue committed horrible crimes; and that there is none so audacious and obdurate, not the greatest mocker and contemner of God and of his iudgments that can be, who can alwaies exempt himselfe from this colour and paine, notwithstanding he labour with all his might to the contrary. For there is alwaies a certaine secret vertue of Gods iustice, which goeth beyond them all, and euermore punisheth the wicked. Now it is certen, that these things come not thus to passe at all aduenture.

Naturall reasons to prove the immortality of mens soules.

In like manner it is not possible, that this knowledge which men haue to discern vertues from vices should be a casual thing, and come thus to passe at aduenture, without the certaine providence of God. For if it were so, that there were no punishment appointed for vices, and no more benefit or ioy prepared of God for the good then for the euill, it should follow that all this knowledge should be giuen to man in vaine. For it should doe him no more good then if he were without it as brute beasts are. Moreouer, seeing all the wicked are not punished in this life, it followeth necessarily, that there is another life wherein they shall be punished, and in which also God will acknowledge the iust, and cause them to enioy that good which he hath prepared for them. For God cannot be God, but he must be all good, all iust, and almightie. If he be good, he cannot hate the good or them that doe it, but loue them so, as that he cannot do otherwise. For how should he not loue his like? And as he cannot hate goodnes or good men, so he cannot loue euill, nor the wicked that follow after it, but hateth them necessarily as contrary to his nature. Now Loue is of that nature, that it cannot but desire and procure the good and honor of him whom it loueth: as contrariwise, hatred cannot but desire and procure the the hurt and dishonour of him whom it hateth. It followeth then necessarily, that God being good and iust, loueth good and iust men, desiring and procuring their honour and their good: and contrariwise, that hee hateth vniust and wicked men desiring and procuring their confusion and ruine. And if he haue this desire and this will, no doubt but he can easily and doth also execute the same, seeing hee is all iust and almightie. Truly this conclusion cannot seeme to be ill grounded, and those Heathen Philosophers, who thereupon haue concluded the immortality of soules, and the iudgement of God in another life, had good reason so to doe. For it is taken not only from the nature of man and from the image of God after which he was created, but also from the very nature of God. So that whosoever gain-saith the same, hath no more reason then if he said, that there is no God, and that God is not God, & that man is not man, & that he differed in nothing from a beast, neither God from the diuell. And so not onely all nature should be overthrowne, but God also, the authour and Creator thereof. For we see almost vsually, that the wickedst men haue the greatest honors in this world, & liue most at their ease, as we haue already shewed. If then there be a God, and any providence and iustice in him (now who can so much as think there is none, but he may also perswade himselfe with all that there is no world nor any creature, and that himselfe is not the same he is?) it must I say, of necessitie follow that if God be, there is also another life in which that iustice shalbe performed performed, which is not here executed, and in which both iust and vniust shall receiue every one the reward of his iustice or iniustice. For it is impossible, that God who is so good and so iust a nature, should create mankind in that sort, as if hee had created the best and iustest part thereof, onely to misery and wretchednes, and the worst to ioy and happinesse. Now continuing our discourse of those internal testimonies, which every one of vs beareth within him of the immortality of the soule, we will speake to morrow of conscience, which presseth men to stand in awe of God and of his iudgements. It is your part, A S E R, to intreate of this matter.

The end of the twelfth daies worke.

The thirteenth daies worke.

Of the testimonies which every one may take from his conscience: of that feare vnto which all men are naturally subject to prooue the immortality of the soule, and a iudgement of God vpon the iust and vniust: how that which the Atheists say, that feare causeth gods amongst men, serueth to overthrow their damnable opinion. Chap. 97.

A S E R. The wicked may flatter themselves, and labour as much as they list to rocke themselves asleepe in their impieties and horrible vices, yet they cannot preuaile so much, but they haue continually a warning peece ringing in their eare, and an Apparitour rapping at their doore without ceasing, so that they cannot alwayes sleepe at their ease. For that is ever true, which the Lord sayde to Cain, Why art thou wroth? and why is thy countenance cast downe? If thou doe well, shalt thou not bee accepted? and if thou dost not well, sinne lyeth at the doore.

Which is as much as if he had saide, that if Cain doth as Abell doth, hee shall bee receiued of God with that honour that hee is receiued, and shall goe with his face looking vpward: but if he doe otherwise, his sinne shall awake him well enough, and not suffer him to haue any rest in his conscience, but will so presse him, that he shall be as a man that lyeth alwayes in a portall, or neere vnto it: who can take no rest for any long season, by reason of commers & goers that goe in and out by it, or that knocke at it every houre to haue it opened. And therefore it is commonly said, that Repentance euer followeth after sinne. For, howsoever it may be slow in comming, yet it cannot be without great heauines and sorrow: which no vniust person can eschew, but he shall be sure to feele it very sharp & vehement. For he must needs feele & haue experience in himselfe, that of euill nothing but euill can befall him in the end, and that when he feeleth what euill sin bringeth vnto him, he cannot but be grieved that he hath committed it, and wish that the thing were, to do againe. Therefore every wicked man feeleth himselfe accused and condemned by his own conscience, which is a certen testimony vnto him, that there is a God and a iudge, whose iudgement he cannot auoid. But before we proceed in this discourse: it shalbe good for vs to know what conscience is properly.

We are then to know, that although sin hath greatly troubled the mind which God hath given vs, by the darknesse of error and ignorance wherewith it is filled, yet it could not so wholly blind it, but stil there remained in it some sparkles of that light of the knowledge of God, and of good & euill, which is naturally in men, & which is borne with them. This remnant that yet remaineth is commonly called by the Diuines Sinterefsis: which is taken from a Greek word, that signifieth as much as if we should say, Preseruation, whereby that remnant of the light and law of nature that remaineth in vs, is still preserved and kept in our soule after sin. And to this word Sinterefsis signifieth that knowledge of the Law which is borne with vs: and it is so called because it alwayes keepeth in man, yea in the most wicked that can be, an aduertisement or instruction, which telleth him what is right and iust, and that there is a iudgement iudgement of God. Some distinguish betwene Syntereſis and Conſcience, others take them both for one and the ſame thing, calling this Syntereſis, the very conſcience it ſelfe: where as others ſay it is the naturall iudgement, and ſome the light of our minde and ſpirit. The Philoſophers, who had ſome obſcure knowledge, ſaid that there are certaine Anticipations in our nature, by which they meant the ſelfe ſame thing in a manner. For by theſe Anticipations they vnderſtand thoſe principles of knowledge and naturall informations, which beeing as it were rules, wee haue not learned of any Maſters, neither by uſe or experience but wee haue drawne and receiued them from nature, whome God hath appointed in this reſpect to bee our miſtreſſe. For this cauſe the Philoſophers vſed this word Anticipation, or ſome other of the ſame ſignification in the language wherein they wrote, before wee receiue theſe naturall rules from nature, as from our mother, before wee receiue any other, either by learning of our maſters, by uſe, or by ſtudie. For to Anticipate, ſignifieth as much as to preuent and to take before it. is true, that theſe rules of nature are in greater number, and more certaine in ſome then in others: and ſo are poliſhed and encreaſed more by ſtudie, by uſe, by experience, and by exerciſe. Now by what name ſoeuer this light of our minde, and this naturall cenſure is called, by which we iudge what is right and iuſt, or otherwiſe, ſure it is, that of it owne nature it is alwaies carried to that which is true and good. And from hence cometh the approbation of vertues, and diſlike of vices, from which alſo the lawes and commandements of men touching manners doe afterwards flow, and ſo the conſcience that is within euery one, to the ende it may argue, reprove, and condemne him for his owne faults. So that there is no man but hee hath a Iudge within himſelfe, except he be altogether deſtroyed of ſenſe and humane vaderſtanding, and ſo beeing turned into a brute beaſt, committeth all vncleannelle euen with greedines, as Saint Paul ſpeaketh to the Ephesians. And although ſome men that are moſt forſaken of God fall ſometimes into this ſenſeleſſeſſe, yet it continueth not alwaies with them, but God afterwards rowſeth them vp well enough, and cauſeth them to apprehend and fee the rigour of his iudgements. For although nature were ſo put out and ſmothered in them, that no ſparkle of naturall light to reſiſt their iudgement, appeared in them, nor yet any flame of Gods wrath, which burneth the heart that is turned aſide from him, yet hee hath other meanes to kindle the ſame againe and to ſet it on flaming euen after ſuch a manner, that it amazeth them, as if it thunder downe vpon them. Therefore it ſaith with them as it doth with drunkards and frantike perſons, who know not whether they haue any ſoule or ſenſe, any minde or conſcience, ſo long as they are drunke & out of their wits, vntill ſuch time as they haue ſlept their full, and are reſtored againe to their right wits. So that howſoeuer this word Conſcience is vſed, it is properly a iudgement that is in our mind, whereby we approve that which is well done, & reprove the contrary. According then as our iudgement is vpright and ſound, or weake and corrupted, good or euill: ſo alſo haue we our conſcience either more right or more crooked. But as it cannot otherwiſe bee, but that they who haue eyes ſee the light, although they will not ſee it, or ſay they do not ſee it: ſo it cannot be but that the eyes of the minde beholdeth the naturall light that is in it, & thoſe things that are diſcovered vnto it thereby ſeeing it proceedeth from God, who is the fountaine of all light, and who will neuer ſuffer it to be ſo cleane extinguished in man, but that ſtill there remaineth ſufficient to condemne him withall. Therefore the very Heathen could ſay, that a wicked perſon could neuer be abſolved by himſelfe, nor yet eſcape and flee from his owne iudgement and condemnation, he being iudge of himſelfe. So that although the wicked and vniuſt, oftentimes eſcape the iudgement of men, yet they can neuer ſaue themſelues from their owne iudgement, which their conſcience alwaies executeth after the perfection of their proceſſe. For it exerciſeth foure offices againſt them. The firſt is, the office of an accuſer: the ſecond, of a witneſſe, & ſo it is as good as a thouſand, as we uſe to ſpeak: the third of a iudge, the fourth, of an executioner and hangman. For ſeeing the iudgement of the conſcience is ordained & eſtabliſhed by God from heaven, in that which is well done there alwaies followeth ſo it, tranquillitie, reſt, and ioy of heart: and in that which is wickedly done, dolour and torment, which puniſheth the offence & taketh vengeance of him that hath committed it. Hereof it is that none liue in greater feare, then the greateſt contemners of God, that are moſt giuen over to all kinds of vice and wickednes, and who declare moſt evidently by their works, that no feare of God or of his iudgements holdeth them in. For as they liue as if they carried death alwaies in their boſome, how good a face ſoeuer they ſet vpon the matter outwardly. And becauſe they caſt all feare of God farre from them, hee vouchsafe them not the honour to giue them a hart to feare him, as they ought, but he be-teth downe their pride in such sort, that he causeth them to stand in feare not onely of men, of tempests, of thunders and of lightnings, but he terrifieth them also by dreames, and maketh them to tremble at their owne fancies, yea they quake oftentimes at flies, and mice, and such contemptible things: but yet so as this feare commeth from a higher cause.

For it is sent of God who thus derideth his aduersaries, making himselfe terrible in his creatures to them that know him not, neither feare him as their Creator and the Creator of those his creatures. I say then, that although we had no other testimony in vs of any God, or of any diuinity and diuine nature, & so consequently of his iudgement in a second life, yet this ought to suffice vs, that cometh from feare, which is a naturall perturbation in man, as we haue heard. For whosoever feareth, declareth plainly thereby that there must of necessity be some power aboue him that is able to hurt him. For he that is assuredly perswaded that nothing can hurt him, is voide of feare.

The greatest persons liue
in most feare.

Now there is no humane power, or creature whatsoever it be, that is able to deliuer man from all feare, no not the greatest Emperours, Kings, and Princes themselves, who are most feared and redoubted, and who cause all men to tremble vnder them, beeing as it were terrestrial Gods amongst other men. Nay these men themselves are so farre from being deli-uered from all feare and terrour, that very seldome any liue in greater feare then they do, as they declare plainly in that they must alwaies haue a great garde of men about them, and yet cannot euer auoide those dangers which they feare. For it often commeth to passe, that they are slaine, either by poison or sworde, or by some other kind of violent death, and that by such as should haue kept them, or whom they trusted most, as is to be seene by daily experience. But albeit there were no other feare then the feare of death, which is commonly greatest in the wicked, & which they cannot finally auoide, yet they cannot but liue alwaies in feare. And liuing so, they must acknowledge wil they nil they, that there is some other power greater then their own, which causeth the to feare, & before which they must one day appeare. For if it were otherwise, why should they feare? Now whilest we seeke this power, wee must of necessity come to one soueraigne power, vnder which all other principalities are ranged, & which hath no other aboue it selfe. And being come thereunto, we must with-all conclude that this power cannot be humane, but must needs be diuine, & so consequently eternall & infinite: or at leastwise they must confesse, that they cannot comprehend this power. This being so, I thinke we may fight against the Atheists with the same reason wher-by they would perswade themselves, that there is neither God nor Diuinity, but only in the opinion and fantasie of men: and that their feare, vnto which they are alwaies subiect, hath put this opinion of God into their heades. Therefore they alleadge that which a Heathen Poet sayd, agreeable to this opinion of the Epicures, namely, that feare was the first that made Gods in the worlde. For men being possessed therewith, and not finding such helpe amongst all the creatures, as can deliuer them from all those dangers which they feare, they must seeke for an other without the creatures, which can not but be a diuine power, if there bee any at all, as in truth there is. Whereupon if the Epicures and Atheists will giue no credite, I wold faine know of them, what is the cause of this terrour and feare which is of such vertue and power in the hearts of all, that no creature whatsoever, being partaker of reason & vnder-standing, can go beyond it, or is able to plucke it wholly out of his heart, & vtterly to extinguish it: as every one feeleth by experience in himselfe, and as these men of whome wee speake, confesse by their owne sayings. Therefore I can hope for no better from them in defence of their impiety, but that they should stirre maliciously against the testimonies of their owne conscience.

The difference betwixt the feare in men and in beasts.

We say then that feare is not without a speciall providence of GOD giuen to men after an other manner then vnto beastes who indeede haue some feare put in them, to the end to keepe themselves from hurtfull things before they take and vse them: but this apprehension of theirs goeth not beyond the euills which may befall them in this life, as that doth in men which reacheth a great deale further. For they that haue committed some horrible crime, cannot bee without feare although they did it so secretly that no body could come to the knowledge of it, or else were so mighty and powerfull, that they stood not in awe of any humane power whatsoever. Now if they that haue not this authority and assurance should reply vpon me, that they are afraid least men should come to the knowledge of the fact committed by them and so they should be punished, I demand of them from whence this feare commeth, but from an apprehension which (will they, nil they) is in them, and proceedeth from

from a certaine sense and feeling of nature, which causeth them to feare that their offence shall be discovered by some other means then humane? As if nature testified vnto them, that there is some diuine providence and vengeance, which watcheth ouer offences, and discloseth them how secret soeuer they are, and causeth them to be punished. As experience teacheth in many, whose secret crimes haue bin discovered by wonderfull & incredible means so that all men are astonished at it, and are constrained to confesse, that there is a diuine iustice, which will not suffer horrible facts to remaine alwaies hid & unpunished. Therefore how secret & close soeuer they carry the matter, this diuine iustice rappeth continually at the doore of their conscience, as it were an Apparitor or sergeant, calling the to iudgement: so that whether they will no no, they must alwaies liue in feare. And this also hath beene the cause that hath alwaies induced me (I speak not of Atheists, who are brute beasts & not men to seeke after some power out of their own nature, & aboue all creatures, to gard and defend the from the euill which they feare. For notwithstanding their diuersity of opinions touching the diuine nature, all with one consent from time to time haue euermore yeelded publicke and constant testimony, that there is some diuine essence and power, that can helpe or hurt them. Whereupon it followeth, that they cannot be without feare of it, or else not without some hope, that by the helpe thereof they shall be kept from the euill which they feare and obtaine that good which they desire. Wherefore if Epicures and Atheists say, that feare was the first shop in which the Gods were forged and made in the world, I will take their saying against themselves. For thereby they are compelled at least to confesse, that feare hath constrained men from time to time to seeke after some God: and that the same is a publicke testimony of nature, which hath caused them to lift vp the eyes of their minde beyond the reach of brute beasts, and forced them to thinke that there is some diuine power and nature. And by the same reason also they may learne, that this is no light fancy & vaine opinion entred into the braine of man, but a naturall, firme, and constant motion and knowledge, which no age of man could euer abolish, nor any thing else in the world. Yea this hath bin daily confirmed in them more & more, and shal be continually, notwithstanding these swinish Epicures grunt in their sties, and these dogged Atheists barke against God and his providence, against his iudgement and the immortalitie of soules, which is the principall foundation of religion, and the establishment and preservation of humane society.

Strong reasons against Atheists.

Feare is a natural testimony of diuine essence.

Now then after so great a multitude of strong arguments and powerfull testimonies, which like a mighty army fight in battell aray to maintaine the truth of the soules immortality, who can doubt thereof in any wise? Let them that vphold the contrary bring forth their arguments and testimonies against ours and place them in the front of the battell, as it were army against army, that all may know on which side not onely the number, but the strength also is the greatest. For the greatnesse of the number would do small good vnles strength also were ioyned therunto. For we must not so much reckon as waigh the sentences, nor consider so much how many men affirme a thing, as what manner of persons they are and of what waight their testimony is, as also what they affirme, & with what reasons. If we fall into this consideration, I doubt not but that every way the advantage will bee on our side for the truth: namely, in regard of multitude, authoritie, nature, reason, and which is more, the testimonie of God, who alone is sufficient. Now to the end that this may be well knowne vnto vs, let vs heare, AMANA, the best arguments that our aduersaries can bring for the ground of their error.

Whether Epicures and Atheists be reasonable beasts, yea or no: and what reasons they bring to overthrow the immortality of the soule: of the false opinion of Pliny touching the same, and of his friuolous and brutish reasons to this purpose: of the brutish conclusion, vnbecoming the whole race of mankind, which hee maketh of this matter, and of the iudgement of God vpon him. Chap. 98.

A*MANA*. Many men by reason of their ignorance in the Latine tongue, thinke that Animal is a beast, whereas it signifieth a liuing creature, and comprehendeth vnder it as well men as beasts, euen every creature endued with a liuing soule. And therefore when they would shew the difference that is betweene men and beasts, they take the contrary species or kinde for the whole, and say that a man is a reasonable beast not considering that they speake contraries. For there is as great difference betweene a beast and reasonable, as betweene a man and brutish, or brutishnes. For seeing it is the naturall property of every beast of what kind soeuer it bee, to bee brutish, it cannot bee that any should be reasonable, except peraduenture Epicures and Atheists will say that they be such beasts. And indeede they should haue wrong offered them, to be reckoned among men, seeing they doe voluntarily make themselves brutish. If then they will not confesse, that they are beasts altogether vncapable of reason, I demand of them whether they bee reasonable beastes, and whether they will argue this matter whereof wee intreat, with reasons or no, seeing they will not rest in the iudgement of humane reason, and of naturall Philosophie, and seeing all the holy Scriptures, holy Doctours, wise Ancients, and most notable personages, seeme vnto them to be no better then toyes and fables. Let vs come then to the reasons of these vnreasonable beasts without reason.

Atheists fitly resembled to Spiders,

Is there any point in all humane Philosophie that is better grounded and laded vpon so strong, firme, and well concluding reasons, and that hath more or so many reasons as this, whereof we dispute at this present? How many things doe these fellowes beleue according to naturall Philosophie, for which they haue not so many nor so euident reasons? And how many things should be doubted of, except so many arguments could be brought for their prooffe and confirmation, as we haue alleadged, and as might yet be found out for their matter. Now what can they alleadge on the contrary side? For if they beleue nothing but what they see, and whereof they haue experience, I demand of them, how many thinges there are in humane philosophie whereof they are thoroughly resolued, and yet haue no experience at all in them neither can haue any certainty, but onely as they giue credit to such as haue written of them, who yet are deceiued themselves oftentimes, and so haue deceiued others? And yet they are not so hardly brought to beleue their reasons, as to giue credit to them that maintaine the immortalitie of soules, which is a matter of so great consequence and waight. And as Spiders turne into poison the sweetest liquors they sucke, so they maliciously gather the reasons, testimonies and places, not onely of Poets, Philosophers, and others, but also of the holy Scriptures, which they thinke will serue to confirme them daily more and more in their errors, and in their false and wicked opinions, how little likelihood soeuer they seeme to haue, and how slenderly soeuer they make for them. In the meane season they dissemble and make shew that they see not all the other reasons that fight directly against them, which being in number infinite, are so cleere and so certaine, as nothing can be more. There are many of them that haue no other reason but their opinion, who can alleadge no other thing but this. It is not so, or, I beleue it not, or, I doubt of it, or, Peraduenture it is otherwise. And in truth none of them all in a manner haue any reasons of greater shew, or that can vrge them that haue neuer so little iudgement, as we may easily iudge by the examination of one of their cheife Masters and strong pillars, I meane Pliny, by whome we may iudge of all the rest. For if he, who is so much esteemed among them, shewed himselfe to be such a grosse & blockish beast, & so far froe reason in that which he wrot touching this matter, a man may soone guesse what can be in the others, who are no body in respect of him, or at leastwise haue not gotten so great credite & authoritie. But let vs heare the reasons of this venerable Doctor. First, he derideth all that men haue spoken or written of the being of soules after the death of the bodies, accompting all this to be but toyes & dreames and then he propoundeth his resolution, that there remaineth no more of a man after his corporall death, then there was of him before hee was conceived and borne.

Plinies brutish

of the soule.

Plato his opinion of the creation of soules.

After that he laugheth at the vanity of men in that they are so foolish as at the very time of their death voluntarily to flatter and beguile themselves, in promising to themselves life even after life: some by the immortality of the soule, others by the transfiguration thereof, & a third sort by attributing sente to the dead and by honouring their soules, and making a god of that, which hauing bin a man, is now nothing at all. I maruaile not if Pliny mocked at many foolish opinions that were among the Heathen touching this matter, and namely, the fooleries of the Pythagoreans and Platonists, which I doubt not but he meant by the transfiguration of soules, whereof he maketh mention. For Plato was so far from yeelding that the soule of man was mortall, that he will not confesse the soule of beastes to be so, because according to his opinion of the creation of soules, he thinketh that there is but one kinde of soule for all sorts of bodies that haue life, and that soules passe and repasse from one to another, as we heard, vntill that being well purged they come to the place of the blessed. Likewise this authour of the naturall history had reason to deride the folly and vanity of men against the immortality of the soule. 625

in deifying them that died, and in making them immortall gods that had beene before but mortall men. But from these fond opinions he had no reason to conclude, that if soules did not passe and repasse from bodies to bodies, and if men could not become gods after their death, therefore they ceased to be men any longer, and nothing remained of them but their ashes, so that their soules also perished as well as their bodies. But what reasons hath hee to vphold this conclusion? For the first he alleageth, that men breath not otherwise then beasts doe, because he seeth nothing of the soule of either of them, & goeth no further then to the externall senses, as if the soule of men as well as of beasts were nothing else but a breath. Whereby, we see what a grosse beast he sheweth himselfe to be: we may say the same of him, in that he requireth both the internal and externall senses after the death of a man, & the same offices, which the soule performed in the body when it dwelled therein, concluding that without these things there could be no good for man after death. Then he taketh this for another argument, that there are many other things in the world, which liue a great deale longer then man doth, & yet we attribute no immortality vnto the. After, he demaundeth whether man goeth after death, what lodging he hath, and what a multitude of soules there should be in the world frō the time it hath bin a world, if al they should liue that haue bin & so cōcludeth that they should be but as it were so many shadowes. We haue sufficiently answered all these goodly argumētts before, when we spake of brutish men, who rest only in the witnes of their senses, & goe no further then beasts doe. Besides, what an argumēt is that for so great a man, to say that we attribute not immortality to many things that outliue mē, & therefore why should we rather beleue it of mens soules? There are not only many beasts, whose life is longer then the life of men, but also many trees, and therefore we must aske of man, why we should thinke that he is rather capable of reason, & more excellent then other creatures are, and that he hath a soule of an other nature & more noble then they? But I will further vrge these arguments against himselfe, according as wee made answere to the complaint of some Philosophers, who accused nature because she had granted longer life to many beasts then to men, seeing it was so necessary for them. For seeing Nature hath endued man with so many goodly gifts and so excellent, wherewith she hath not adorned beastes, certainly she should be a stepmother, and no true mother, or if shee were a mother yet shee should be a very cruell mother, if she had giuen longer life to beasts then to men, & had not reserued a better and a longer for them. But this reason would not greatly moue Pliny, who is the man himselfe, that gaue these goodly titles to nature, vnder which name, he blasphemed God whom he knew not. Neuerthelesse this argument will be of force with them that waigh it aright, considering the prouidence and goodnesse of God towards mankind. He addeth further, that this fantastickall opinion is entred into mens braines, because they would neuer faile but be eternal. But this pretended reason is so far from confirming his opinion, that contrariwise it greatly weakeneth the same, in that it agreeth with the argument for the immortallitie of soules, that was taken from this naturall desire which God hath not giuen to men in vaine, as hath bin shewed vnto vs by good reasons. Moreover he iudgeth it great follie to keepe bodies in hope that they shall liue & rise againe, according to the vaine promise of the Philosopher Democritus, who did not rise againe himselfe. But I maruell not if Pliny spake so of the resurrection of bodies, seeing he held that opinion of the mortalitie of soules: and seeing those Philosophers who mainrained the immortallitie of soules, did not so much as once dreame of the resurrection of bodies, except this Democritus only, at whom I much more wonder, then at al this which Pliny writeth of the mortality of soules. For it seemeth that Democritus could not learne this of reason & of natural philosophy, vnles it were so that he builded his doctrine vpon the same foundation that he tooke from his Mootes concerning the matter of which all things are made. For according to this opinion hee taught, that all the essences that ever were, should in time haue their beeing againe by the meeting together of those matters, of which they had bin compounded. Surely a very fond opinion for a Philosopher, so that Pliny may well deride it, although the argumēt he maketh against himselfe is not strong enough to ouerthrow his imaginatiō. For he would haue had Democritus to haue confirmed his opinion by his owne resurrection. But his Philosophy did not insinuate so much that it should haue bin done so quickly, but after the reuolution of many Ages, which Pliny should haue staied for before he could haue euicted Democritus of his foolish opinion, if he had no better argument to ouerthrow it. Now if this Philosopher did not lay this ground for his opiniō which I haue mentioned, I would haue thought that he might haue vnderstoode the same by some speech come to his eares, of the doctrine of the holy Patriarkes and of the Hebrews touching this matter, by means of the Egyptians amongst whom those good Fathers long dwelt, because they that wrote the lives of the Philosophers, put Democritus in the number of them that descended into Egypt to learne the wisdom of that people, as Pythagoras, Plato, Orpheus, Socrates & Pherecydes with others, did the same. But let vs returne to Pliny and heare his other reasons such as they be.

He accounteth it great folly in men to thinke, that by death a man may enter into a second life: & thereupon breaketh forth into an exclamation, as if men were out of their wits so to thinke. But he would have found it no lesse impossible that generatio should come of corruption, & that of seed, which is but as it were a little slime, a man could be engendred, or a beast, if experience had not taught the same. And because he hath not seen a soule liue after the death of the body, nor a dead man risen againe, therefore he concludeth, that there is neither mortality of the soule nor resurrection of the body. But we may call to minde that which was vttered to this purpose, when we spake of the similitude that is betweene our first & second birth. I omit that which he saith of the rest and quietnesse taken away for euer from men that are borne, if that diuision of the soule separated from the body which some Hea-then Philosophers made, should take place, namely, when they so diuided it, that the sense of soules remained aboue, and their shadowes beneath among the dead: for all this is but fopperie. Neuerthelesse the argument taken from the common consent of men touching the immortality of soules remaineth still, and is confirmed euen by Pliny himselfe in this place, although peraduenture he neuer thought it.

The conclusion of Pliny touching this matter.

Let vs then come to the finall conclusion which he maketh of this whole matter. Hee calleth it deceit of wordes, and foolish credulitie, whatsoeuer men speake or beleue of their immortality, & accompteth it as a poison that destroyeth the chief good of Nature, which as he saith is death, adding further that by this means death shall be doubted, or (as soe read it) the griefe of him that is to die shall be doubled, when he shall thinke vpō that which is to come. For if it be a sweete & pleasant thing to liue, to whom can it be pleasant to thinke that he did once liue? Therefore he setteth this down for his last resolution, that it is more easie and certaine for euery one to beleue himselfe and that whereof he hath experience in him- selfe, then to trust any other: and to fetch his assurance from that which a man was before he was borne. Thus we see how he laboureth to perswade, that no man can be blessed in the life to come, because the chief good thing he can haue in nature is taken from him, except hee be wholly like to beastes in his death, and except hee beleue that there remaineth no more of him after death, then there was before his conception and natiuity. And to confirme and assure himselfe in this opinion, hee would haue euery one to fetch an argument and prooffe hereoffrom the similitude of that estate in which hee was before hee was conceived or borne, to compare it with that which followeth his death that a man may iudge of the one by the other. But what reason is in this? For is there the same reason from not being to being, that is from being to not being? We knowe well how man is come from not being to being, but can wee hereby bee so assured, that he shall bee no more after hee hath beene, as wee know he hath beene after a time wherein he was not? And whereas he would haue vs giue more credite to our owne experience in our death, then to all that can be saide by others, I would demande of him what that is of which we haue experience, and whether we ought to conclude, that wee die wholly as beastes doe, because to the sense of man we see no difference betwixt their deaths and the death of man. It seemeth this is his meaning.

death.
Plin. Nep.
epi. ad. Oct.
Tac.

But as they of his coate aske who euer came from the dead, to testifie that soules are immortal, so we may aske of him, who euer returned frō thence, to assure vs of that which euery one may haue experience of in his death, & whether they perceined themselves to be altogether like to beastes after the same. For they can haue no more certaine testimony of this by their senses, then they haue of the other point. Also I would gladly aske of him how hee found himselfe, when he was choked neere to the mountaine Vesunius with smoake, & with the smell of brimstone issuing out of the same: and what consolation hee found in death, which he saith is the greatest good of Nature. Whereby he shewed how smally hee had profited in the knowledge of God the creator of Nature, by the contēplation of his works therein. No maruaile thē if knowing him no better, he called her stepmother & cruel mother, seeing that according to his Philosophy, the greatest good which she bringeth to mē, is death: & seeing she neuer doth thē better turne, then when he bringeth thē back againe to that estate in which they were before they were cōceiued or borne into the world. According to which

which conclusion, a man may well approve of that desperate sentence of theirs who affirm resolutely, that it were good for men, either never to be borne, or to die presently after their birth. So that the first and chiefest benefit of nature should be, never to be borne; and the second, to be borne before the time, or to be as soone dead as borne.

Moreover, it should follow by Plinies Philosophy, that nature had made men with such a condition, that they cannot but be miserable, if they live after this life, and if death doe not wholly destroy them; and if they be not resolutely perswaded of this to have no hope at all of another life. For that which he saith importeth as much. Is not this then a goodly resolution and conclusion of so great a searcher of nature, whereof he hath written the history? With what eyes did he looke vpon all that which he might have seene? How much differed they from the eyes of beasts? and what profit reaped he by that knowledge which he might have more then they? In truth we have in this man a wonderful example of Gods iudgement vpon the learned and wise men of this world, who so vilely abuse that reason, knowledge, & vnderstanding which God hath giuen them. And forasmuch as this dog was permitted to vomit out such horrible blasphemies, both against God and against nature, and yet receiued no punishment for the same from man, therefore God himselfe tooke vengeance of him by smoke, whereby he was choaked to death. For seeing he esteemed the soule to be no better then a little winde or breath, he deserued well to loose the same in the midst of smoke and brimstone. But we haue spoken enough of him. Now you may, ARAM, tell vs some more lies rather then reasons, wherewith Atheists fortifie themselves against the truth of this matter we haue in hand, and how we ought to consider of the iudgements of God vpon them.

A*RAM*. It is a great matter when men iudge of things, not according to reason, but according to their affections: because then their eares are closed vp against all reasons, as we haue the example of the Iewes, who were the enemies of Iesus Christ. For after they had once resolved not to acknowledge him, neither to receiue him for the true Anointed of the Lord, but to reiect and condemne him with all his doctrine and workes, no reason was euer sufficient to remoue them from thir theis purpose. But to confirme them in their obstinacie there needed no great arguments, no not in shew, as it appeareth in that difficulty of theirs to beleue his resurrectio. For neither all these witnesses of which they had so great a number, nor all their doctrine, nor all their holinesse, nor all their signes and miracles, were of any force with them in regard of that testimonie, which the theeuish and murdering Souldiers corrupted with money gaue them to the contrary, and that by a lowde lye which overthrew it selfe.

Therefore we may easily iudge what the minde of man is, when it is corrupted and perverted, and when men suffer themselves to be carried away with their euill and froward affections, so that God doth euen blindfold and forsake them. We see many such examples in this matter, which we now handle touching the immortality of the soule. For on the contrary side, what are the strongest reasons, which these doggish Epicures and Atheists, enemies to God, to mankinde, and to all nature, against whom we now dispute, can alledge for themselves? What would they doe if they had as much against vs, as we haue against them? How would they lift vp themselves against those that maintaine the contrary, and tread them vnder their feet? We heard in the former speech the strongest arguments vpon which their error leaneth, whereby we may know what a bad foundation it hath. O, there are who say, that in the light of faith the soule is immortal, but in the light of nature it is mortall, so that whilest they would seeme Philosophers, they shew themselves to be ignorant and grosse beasts. For there is but one onely truth both of nature and of faith, truth neuer being double, but alwaies one. Therefore if the soule be immortall in the light of faith, it cannot be mortall in the light of nature, but onely in the darkenesse thereof.

For we see how this small remnant of naturall light, that yet remaineth in the corrupt nature of men, sendeth them with one common & publike consent to this truth of the immortallitie of mens soules: so that none, besides those in whom it is as it were vtterly put out, and whom God hath by his iudgement wholly reiected and cast into a reprobate sense, but acknowledge the same. How then would this light of nature shew it selfe, if it had still continued in integritie? Therefore I demand of these men, what it is which they call naturall light, and whether it be not the reason of man: and if it be that reason whereby men differ from beasts, I aske againe of them, whether any thing that may be knowne by arguments and reasons, although they were all gathered together, and examined narrowly hath greater and more euident light of reason then this hath. Neuerthelesse I agree with them herein that the light of faith maketh vs a great deale more certaine of all this matter then any reason that can be alleadged: because that is the light of Gods Spirit, which illuminateth the eies of the minde a great deale more clearly then any naturall light can do, as being grounded vpon the testimony of God himselfe. Some also there are, who perswade themselves, that Salomon putteth no difference between the soule of men and of beasts, and that hee doth not affirme, that one of them is more or lesse mortall or immortall then the other. I considered in mine heart (saith the Wise man) the state of the children of men that God had purged them: yet to see to, they are in themselves as beasts. For the condition of the children of men, and the condition of beasts are euen as one condition vnto them. As the one dieth, so dieth the other: for they haue all one breath, and there is no excellency of man above the beast: for all is vanity. All goe to one place, and all was of the dust, and all shall returne to the dust, who knoweth whether the spirit of man ascend upward, and the spirit of the beast descend downward to the earth? But they are greatly deceiued that thinke to defend their impiety by this saying of Salomon. For it is most certaine, that his meaning is not to conclude that it is so indeed, as he speaketh in that place: as it appeareth manifestly by his final resolution in the same Booke made of the matter he hath in hand; wherein he concludeth touching the body of man, that dust returneth to the earth as it was, and that the spirit returneth to God that gaue it. Now wee man well thinke, that this excellent man, or rather the Spirit of God which spake by him, would not contradict himselfe, especially in the very same Booke. Wherefore we must rest in the conclusion he maketh therein, in which he giueth vs the meaning of all his former speach. And as for the place alleadged by vs, which, as Epicures and Atheists thinke, maketh for them, hee would giue vs to vnderstand thereby, what a man may iudge of the life and soule both of men and beasts, and of the difference betweenethem, according to that we see and perceiue by our corporall senses, and that may be comprehended by the minde and reason of man, if we haue no other testimony that looketh beyond this life, in which these dogs and hogs, and all carnall and brutish men stay themselves. For if there remained no more of man after his death then there doth of a beast, both the one and the other would come to one passe. Nay, the life of man should bee so farre from happinesse, that it would bee a great great deale more miserable then that of beasts. So that it should seeme to bee better for men to passe away the time merrily, and to liue like beasts, according to the Philosophy of Epicures. And although they should take this course, yet in the end all would be but vanity, according to Salomons theame, which he handleth in his Booke of the Preacher. There fore being to set the conclusion of his booke, he saith, Remember now thy Creator in the daies of thy youth, whiles the euill daies come not, nor the yeares approach, wherein thou shalt say I haue no pleasure in them. Now if there were no difference betweene the soule of men and the soule of beasts, both which the Prophet calleth by the name of Spirit, taking spirit for soule, what profit should men reape by this instruction and exhortation? For what greater benefit could he look for, who from his youth had giuen ouer himself to the seruice of God, and had alwaies remembred him, then he that forgate him and turned himselfe away from him? Thus yee see how Epicures and Atheists feare not to prophane the holy Scriptures, by snatching at some places of them very maliciously, to the end to set some colour vpon their damnable opinion against the immortality of the soule. But wee see what a goodly bulwarke they are able to make, euen all one with the rest of the arguments, which wee haue already heard of the same matter. And although they alleadge heere in defence of their cause, Lucian and Lucretius, two other Patriarcks and Patrons beside Pliny, whom they accompt as principall pillars of their impiety, yet wee can heare from them no other arguments of thy youth, whiles the euill daies come not, nor the yeares approach, wherein thou shalt say I haue no pleasure in them. arguments worthy to be so much as once thought vpon, besides those which wee haue already handled. But we may obserue the like iudgement of God vpon them, that was vpon Pliny the great searcher of Nature. For Lucian, according as Suidas testifieth, was torne in pieces and eaten of dogs: and Lucretius being madde and frantike slew himselfe. For hauing abused so vilely that good wit and skill, which God had giuen him, did hee not worthily deserue to loose it vtterly, and to haue lesse of it then brut beasts? Hee became so brutish, that hee would not acknowledge, that any either God or man had brought so great a benefit to the whole race of mankinde, or that was for this cause more worthy of greater praise then Epicurus was, because by his Philosophy and doctrine hee abolished all diuine providence, and so consequently, all Diuinity and immortality of the soule, all hope of an other life, all Religion and conscience, all difference betweene vertue and vice, betweene honest and dishonest things, and reduced all nature both Diuine and Humane, into meere brutishnes. This beastly fellow thus admiring Epicurus concludeth, that men cannot but be wretched and miserable all their life time, so long as they haue any opinion of all these things, because they will hold them in continuall feare, and so consequently in perpetuall torment: but being dispossessed of all such thoughts, and so of all feare of God, it will follow thereupon, that they shall haue no more conscience to resist or gainsay them, whatsoeuer they thinke, speake, or doe. And so their conscience shall not torment them with any feare and terror, especially of any iudgement of God, but will suffer them to be in quiet, and not hinder in any respect their carnall pleasures and brutish affections.

The iudgement of God vpon Lucian and Lucretius two Arch Atheists. Euseb. Hier. Crin. de Po. Lat.

The doctrine of Epicurus commended by Lucretius.

Now when they are come to this point, they accompt themselves happy. For then they all of them, not only as Kings and Princes, but euen as it were gods, feare no other power aboue themselves, and hauing no body to hinder their pleasure, but that they may freely follow their one hearts lusts. So that the last and best conclusion of all this Philosophy will be this, that men cannot be happy except they become very beasts, and being spoiled of all things wherein they excell them, waxe altogether brutish and retaine nothing at all of mans nature, but onely the outward shape of man. Therefore we may iudge by the examples of these personages of so great skill, and so highly esteemed among men, what man can do by his naturall light, if it be not guided by God but vtterly forsaken of him: seeing those selfe same men who haue beene such great inquisitors and admirers of nature, haue fallen into execrable beastlinesse, and such horrible blasphemies, as in a manner to say, that God or Nature had brought men into the world, onely to make them more miserable and more wretched then all other creatures: so that they can finde no better happinesse and felicity for themselves, then during their life to become like to beasts, or plants, or some other insensible creatures: or else after their death to be brought to nothing, as they were before their conception & birth. Is it possible for a man to thinke of a stranger thing, more against God, more vnworthy mankinde, or more iniurious to all nature? For the Atheists themselves that reiect God, do yet confesse if they be Philosophers, that nature doth nothing without cause: or if they confesse it not, they haue testimonies enow in nature to conuince them of it. And yet if their doctrine were true, God and nature haue done worse in the creation and production of men, then to doe something without cause. For this were a cause most vnworthy of God and of nature, to create and bring forth men into the world onely for this cause and to this end, that they should be more miserable and more wretched then all other creatures: and to make mankinde onely to beholde in him the perfection of all misery and unhappinesse, as though God and Nature tooke pleasure in beholding such cruell pastime, as is the view of mans miseries in such a cursed estate. Wherefore seeing al the doctrine & Philosophy of these dogs bringeth with it so many, so strange, so beastlike, & so horrible absurdities, euen once to thinke of them, being so vnbecoming God, all mankind & whole nature, & so contrary to al the testimonies, which the whole world affordeth vnto vs in the behalfe of Gods eternall providence over all his creatures, I thinke there is no body, except he bee as brutish as the Authours and Teachers of such kinde of Philosophy and doctrine, but he can easily iudge, that it is altogether impossible to be true, or to haue any foundation and ground in reason, seeing it confoundeth and overthroweth all reason and all nature. Which causeth me to be so much the more abashed, & that there are men found euen among Christians, yea a great number, who rather follow the false opinion of these masties, and giue greater credit to the sottish and vaine arguments which they propound, both against God and all diuinity, and against all nature and truth, then to the true sentence of so many ver-

tuous, learned, and holy men, as haue bin in the world from the beginning, and to the common and publike testimony of all mankind, and of all people and nations. But if God hath not spared the very heathen, who so shamefully abused that knowledge, which he gaue them of his works in nature, & of the testimonies of his diuine nature and providence manifested vnto them therein, but punished them with such a horrible iudgement, as to deliuer them vp into a reprobate sense, & into a worse estate then is that of brute beasts: we are not to marvel if he deale so & more hardly at this day with them that deserue a great deale more than they did, because he hath manifested himselfe more cleerly without all comparison to these men, if they would see and know him: yea we ought to thinke it more strange if he dealt otherwise. For the more meanes he affordeth vnto men to know him, the greater iudgement they deserue when they abuse the same, and labour to blind themselves by their owne ingratitude & peruerse malice. As for vs, we cannot (God be thanked) doubt in any sort of the immortality of the soule, seeing we see on our side the aduantage, euery way in defence thereof, namely, multitude, authority, nature and reason, and which is most of all, the testimony of God who alone is sufficient. I doubt not but that some, to whome God hath giuen more knowledge and greater graces then to vs, are able to alleadge other arguments & reasons for the confirmation of this matter, which we haue omitted. For truth is not vnprovided, but hath great abundance of all sorts. But we haue alleged the cheifest, taken out of the writings of learned men that haue written best of this matter, especially of them that in our time haue written most Christianly.

And although there are other reasons then those which we haue set downe, yet I thinke there are enow in our discourses to stop the mouthes of all Epicures and Atheists, at leastwise to conuince them if wee cannot confound them. For what can they alledge against them that is of any great shew or strength? It may easily be iudged by their best arguments discoursed vpon by vs. What will they haue more? Doe they expect or desire of vs that we should point with the finger at soules when they depart out of bodies that die? Then they should be no soules and inuisible spirits, but bodies that may be seene. And yet vnlesse they may behold them comming forth, as doe smoke from the fire, they will not beleue that they depart at all from the bodies, or that they haue any being at all. Surely I thinke that these men who would so faine haue soules to be mortall, and to be extinguished by death with their bodies, would not beleue that they were departed, and that they once liued, their bodies being dead, no not although they had seene them come forth visibly: but would perswade themselves that they were some illusions, and that their eies had some mist before them: so strong is a lying perswasion in a man, when hee will iudge of a thing not according to reason, but according to his affection. Now seeing wee are come to the end of our purpose, namely, to lay before our eies as it were a naturall historie of man, by the consideration of the matter of his body, of the aduersity of that matter, and of the forme that God hath giuen it, together with the profit and vse both of the one and the other: and also by a description of the parts, powers, vertues and faculties of his soule, thereby to be instructed at large in the nature and immortality thereof, by causing the soule to behold her selfe in the glasse of her marvellous actions, and all to this ende that wee should know our selues as it becommeth vs, there remaineth nothing now but that wee should draw out a generall instruction from these aduertisements and lessons, which God giueth vs in the admirable composition of our nature: to the end that hereafter we should become more fit for the contemplation of this diuinity, by the consideration of the wonderfull workes thereof in the heavens and in the earth, or which we desire (if God giue vs grace hereafter) to discourse. Therefore doe thou, ACHITO B, put an end to the cause of our present assembly and meeting, by some goodly discourse vpon all these matters of which we haue intréated.

Of the image of God in the soule of man, and of the image of the world in mans body : of the coniunction that is betweene God, the Angels, and men : of the sundrie degrees of Good that are therein : of those lessons and instructions, which we ought to receiue from the wonderfull composition and coniunction of the soule and body.

Chap. 100.

ACHITO B. If we could diligently consider of the naturall history of man, which we haue prosecuted hitherto, we should find in it a goodly glasse wherein we might behold God who is inuisible, making him after a sort visible vnto vs, and come to the knowledge of him by his workes, euen as the soule is made, as it were, visible to vs, shewing it selfe vnto vs by the body wherein it dwelleth, and by those workes which it effecteth in the same. Therefore first let vs set before our eies the whole frame of the world, as it were a great body : then all the parts of it, as the members thereof : and lastly, let vs consider God, as the soule of this great body, working in the same, and doing all his workes there according to that order which he hath set therein, euen as his soule hath his operation in the body of man, and in all the members thereof. Thus doing, as we know that there is a soule in the body, and another nature besides that which is corporall, which worketh in the same, as we perceiue by the effects of it : so by the workes done in this visible world, we may iudge that there is another nature that doth them, which being inuisible, is some other then this whole frame which we behold, and farre more excellent, filling the same, and being in all the parts of it, as the soule is in the body.

But whilest we propound to our selues this glasse to looke vpon, let vs beware we fall not into their fond dreames, who both thought and affirmed, that this world was the body of God ; and that he was the soule thereof : dwelling in it as the soule of man doth in his body. For if it were so, then should God be mortall and corruptible in regard of his body, so that still some part or other should perish, as we see that corporall things daily corrupt. On the other side, God should not be infinite and incomprehensible as hee is : for the world doth not comprehend and containe him, but he comprehendeth and containeth the whole world. VVherefore neither is the world God, nor God the world, but the creator of it, by whom it is and consisteth. And albeit we behold him not with our eies in his nature and diuine essence, yet we must not therefore conclude as Atheists doe, that hee is not at all, no more, nay much lesse, then the soule is, because those workes whereby he manifesteth himselfe in the world, are farre greater without comparison, then those which the soule worketh in mans body. Besides that, all the workes of the soule are the workes of God seeing it receiue from him that life and vertue that is in it. Forasmuch then as the soule is the image of God in man, as his body is the image of all this great world, in which God worketh as the soule doth in mans body : let vs consider diligently, how God hath distributed the powers, vertues and offices of the soule in the body, and in all the parts of it, as hee manifesteth his glorie, vertue and power in this visible world in all the parts of the same. For the first, there is agreement herein, that as one onely soule is in one body, and is sufficient for all the parts & members thereof : so there is but one God in the world, who is sufficient for all creatures. Again, if we cannot conceiue how the soule is lodged in the body, how it giueth life vnto it displaying all her vertues, and doing all her workes therein, but onely so farre forth as shee giueth vs instructions and testimonies thereof by those diuers effects which we see in euery part and member of the body : no maruaile then if we cannot behold with the eye, nor comprehend how GOD is euery where, filling heauen and earth, and how hee displaieth his power and vertue, working in all his creatures, guiding and governing them, and preserving them by his diuine providence and vertue. For if we cannot comprehend the creature, or the nature thereof how shall wee comprehend that of the Creator ? Iesus Christ said to Nicodemus, If when I tell you earthly things, ye beleeue not, how should ye beleeue, if I tell you heavenly things ? We may say the like heere, that if it be impossible for vs throughly to know the earth or the body or soule of man, or the nature and vertue thereof, how shall wee know the heauens and spirituall natures, or God and his workes ? For if it be beyond our reach to discern them in our selues no not the workes of our soule, how shall wee comprehend his workes in the whole world? Notwithstanding, if we can well consider of that coniunction and agreement that is betweene God and his creatures, with the disposition of those sundry degrees which every one of them holdeth in this coniunction, even from the highest and most celestiall things, that approach neereſt to the nature of God, unto those things that are lowest and most terrestriall, then shall we see God as it were present before the eyes of our spirit, and by the contemplation of him wonderfully content all the parts of our soule. Therefore to prosecute this point, let vs note, that God created and fashioned in his Angels, images of himselfe that are altogether spirituall, (as indeede himselfe is all spirit) and not inclosed or shut vp in any bodies that are of an earthly and corruptible matter. Besides, it pleased him to make another kinde of his image in the nature of man, which should hold the second degree next to the Angelicall nature, in which hee represented himselfe more excellently then in any other visible nature and creature, namely, in a nature that came neereſt to his own, next to that of Angels, and in which the bodily & visible nature was ioyned unto a spirituall and invisible nature. Now for the better vnderstanding hereof, we will set downe a coniunction of three kinds of good things, which are in diuers degrees. The first is, God the Creator, who is the createſt of all, and the soueraigne good of all his creatures, and is a nature without any qualitie or accident whatsoever. For all that is in him, is substantiall and essentiall. This good is such a nature, as hath all his moving of himselfe, and receiveth it not from any other then from himselfe, but giueth moving to all creatures according to their nature and measure. And yet all the motions in God are without any change, either of time or place, or howsoever: so that he abideth still immovable and may alwaies say, I am the Lord, I change not, as it is in Malachie. For he is ever one. And seeing he is the Original of all moving, he must of necessitie be firme and stable: because otherwise he could not giue motion to others, as wee haue daily experience hereof in our selues. For if wee would moue one of our feet, the other must abide steddie and firme, and both the one and the other must alwaies haue some stay whereby to take their motion. Now because God cannot haue stay from any other, he hath it in himselfe, in that maner which hath beene declared already. For as he is alwaies one, so all things are present to him, yea he is every where, by reason that he is eternall and infinite without beginning, and without end, Iudge of all, and is iudged of none, gouernour of all, and gouerned by none. Secondly, we haue those spirituall natures & creatures, which are a great Good, but not the greatest and chiefest Good, which cannot be found but in the Creator. This second Good hath qualities, because all things in it are not substantiall. It hath also motion, but receiveth the same from the first Good of which it dependeth, and then it giueth the same to others. This motion is in time, but without place: & this Good both iudgeth & is iudged, gouerneth & is gouerned. The Angels & humane soules are this great Good; & these spirituall natures, which are spirits hauing all these things. But there is between them that difference before spoken off, namely, that Angels are spirits, which were created to liue an immortal life, and not to be ioyned to any earthly bodies: and that the spirits of men are created to dwell in bodies and to giue them life. Therefore I let passe angels for this time, & purpose to speak only of the spirit of man, which is not immutable as God is, but may receive change of qualities: as we see in that it being created good, became bad, & of euil, may also become good, by the grace of God. But no such thing can befall God. For he cannot but be good in the highest degree, and the soueraigne good of euery creature: because, goodnes is not accidentall to him, as it is to a creature, but substantiall & essentiall. And as God is the soueraigne mouer, who giueth motion to all creatures, in this great world: so the soule & spirit of man giueth moving to the whole body of man, who is the little world, and to all the members thereof: neither hath it this motion from any other creature beside it selfe, as the body receiveth the same from it, but onely of the Creator. Now although this motion be made in time, yet it is not made by any change of place. For what motion soeuer there is in the spirit, yet it abideth alwaies in his place, so long as it dwelleth in the body, which it gouerneth vnder God the great gouernor, by whom also it is iudged, as it selfe iudgeth the body, and all that is vnder the same. Lastly followeth the body, which is another Good, but not so great as the spirit. This hath not only quality but quantity also, whereas the spirit hath only quality without quantity. For to speak properly, no nature hath quantity, except it be corporall. Therefore the soule of a great man is not greater then the soule of a little man, in regard of corpulency, because it hath none as the body hath. So that when we say, that a man is of a great spirit, we meane it not in regard of bodily quantity, as when we speake of a great body: but we consider in him the experience of gifts agreeable able to his nature, wherewith he is endued aboue others. And in taking it so, it will often come to passe, that the least bodies shall haue the greatest spirits, and the greatest bodies the least spirits. And by the same reason we consider in a litle infant, euen as soone as he hath received mouing in his mothers belly, the selfe same soule that is in all the ages that follow his infancy, vntill his old age, and in death it selfe. But according as those instruments whereby it worketh during life, are fit for their offices, and as after hard when they waxe olde, they faile of their naturall force and vertue: so the soule sheweth her powers and wonderfull effects in them and by them, continuing still one and the same in substance and nature, as these things haue beene at large declared vnto vs. And as for the motion of the body, it is made both in time and in place, and is gouerned and iudged, but it selfe neither gouerneth nor iudgeth.

Thus we may see, how these two good things, the spirit & the body, of which the one is greater then the other, are vnited and ioyned together in man, as if hee carried heauen and earth linked together. We may learne also how in this coniunction the spirit occupieth the middle betwixt God & the body, and agreeeth with them both. Wee see also the admirable works of the soule during this coniunction, all which are so many testimonies of the wonderfull works of God, & of his prouidence ouer all nature. Moreouer, we behold a very goodly disposition and excellent order in all the powers and faculties both of soule and body.

Let vs then make our profit of all these things, and of the instructions and lessons which God giueth vs in them, to leade vs to the principall ende for which man was created, namely, ^{The right end of our creation.} to know and to honour his Creator. Wherefore we ought chiefly to consider, that seeing

God hath placed the heart betweene the head and the belly, and the vitall vertue of the soule betweene the animal and the nutritiue vertue, and the will betweene the vnderstanding and the most sensuall part that is in vs, therefore the heart and will must alwaies looke vpward and not downward, to the end that they may ioynethemselues to the noblest and most diuine part, and not to the basest, most sensuall and earthly part. For they are in mans body, as if they were placed betweene heauen and earth: so that as man holdeth the middle place betweene Angels and other liuing creatures, by reason of that communication of nature which hee hath with them both: so fareth it with the heart and the will, betweene the head and the belly, and betweene reason with that part which is capable thereof, and the sensible part which is without reason. Wherefore if the will of man be ioyned with reason, which is celestiall and diuine, and followeth the same, it will become like vnto it, and shall be able easily to gouerne the sensuall part vnderneath it, to be mistresouer it, and to compell it to obey. But if the Will despise reason and the counsell thereof, and if instead of mounting vpward towards the noblest part, it descendeth to the sensuall part, and ioyneth it selfe thereunto, then shall the Will be made like to that, and shall serue it in place of commanding it. And by this meanes the Will shall become altogether brutish, whereas contrariwise it might make the sensuall & earthly part as it were celestiall and diuine, by drawing it with it selfe, if it would obey reason rather then the affections of the flesh, and if it would looke more towards heauen then towards the earth, as men commonly vse to doe. For as they are in the middest betweene Angels and beasts, if they looke more towards heauen, from whence their soules haue their Originall, then towards the earth out of which their bodies are taken, they should become celestiall and diuine, like to the Angels, and finally like to God, who hath created them according to his owne image. But if instead of beholding the heauens, vnto which their faces are lifted, they looke down to the earth as brute beasts doe, hauing more care of that then of heauen, they shall become altogether earthly and brutish like beasts. Therefore it standeth euery one in hand to bethinke him selfe seriously, which way he aimeth, whether he desireth to come, and whom he had rather resemble, either the Angels or beasts. Let vs then consider well of our nature, & of that order which God setteth downe therein, and follow the same, & beware that we do not peruert it. Let vs learne to acknowledge the image of God in vs, and to behold his great wisdom therein, as it were in a litle world. First, let vs know by our soule, which is a spirituall & no corporall nature, that God is a spirit & of a spirituall nature, which is not shut vp & inclosed in any place. For neither our spirit hath any biding in a place, as if it were inclosed and shut vp therein, notwithstanding that it remayneth in a place as it were in regard of that coniunction, which it hath with the body. Neuerthelesse, it is not so inclosed therein, but that it is able, not onely to raunge through heauen and earth, and throughout this whole visible world, but euen higher and farther, so that the whole world is not of sufficient bignesse to containe the same, or to content and satisfie it, but that will goe beyond it. What then shall we thinke of God who hath created it? And how forgetfull shall man bee of himselfe, if whereas the whole world is not great enough for his spirit, he content himselfe with a little angle of the earth, and doe after a sort bury himselfe therein? Likewise let vs know and beleue that God is inuisible, seeing our soule is so, and cannot be seene with bodily eyes. For it is not painted with any colour, neither hath it any corporall figure, whereby it may bee seene and knowne, which is done onely by the actes and deeds of it.

Mans will must looke vp to the head, not downe to the belly.

Man is a middle creature betweene Angels and beasts.

A spirit is not shut vp in place.

Let vs not seeke then to know the essence and nature of God, by the eyes, but onely by the spirit. For he cannot be seene by them, but onely by the eyes of faith, neither can he be found or conceiued by corporall senses. Again, we ought not only to consider, but even to wonder how he hath ioyned our soule with the body, and distributed the vertue thereof into all the parts and members of the same: and how hee doth so excellently knit together and conioyne so many members, so distant one from another, even from the one ende vnto the other: all which receiue life and vertue from the soule according to their nature, and office, and are all gouerned by one and the same spirit. Let vs consider then how hee would haue that part of the soule, which is partaker of reason, to haue the principallitie and dominion ouer the part in which he hath placed the affections: to the ende that the chieftest should command, and the other obey, as himselfe hath the Lordship and soueraigntie ouer all his creatures, as they that must obey him.

Let vs not then suffer the spirit to bee brought into bondage by the perturbations of the affections, neither let vs suffer them to be so lifted vp against reason, as to bee able to turne the vertue of the soule against it. In like manner, let vs remember, how God worketh in our mindes, in such sort as that the knowledge of those things which we know first, is not abolished by the vnderstanding of other things, we learne after, but they are all kept together very surely in the chiefe part of the soule, and that in good order, by meanes of the memory, without confusion one with another, even as if they were written and engraue in a table, or in a pillar of brasse. VVherefore we should be very vngratefull and brutish, if any thing in the world cause vs to forget God, and if we haue not his benefits towards vs in perpetuall remembrance.

TO THE RIGHT VVOR- SHIPFUL SIR VVILLIAM

MOVNSON Knight.

Our employments (Right Worshipful) in sundry her Maie-ties forraine seruices both by Sea and Land, and also (for your farther experience, and satisfaction) in diuers other noble enterprises, being accompanied with a sharpe and iudicious obseruation of things memorable, and the perusing of many excellent and rare Writers ; must of necessitie haue made you not onely expert in matters of warre and estate, but also most singularly well read in God his great booke of Nature, I meane the admirable frame of this Vniuers, or whole world. Wherein the infinite varieties and sorts of creatures, like so many visible words, doe proclaime and publish vnto man the eternity, infinitie, omnipotencie, wisdom, iustice, bountie, and other essentiall attributes of his dread and soueraigne creator.

Wherefore I doe here present vnto your worship the discourse ensuing, not as a Teacher to instruct you in things vnkowne, but as a faithfull remembrancer to recall matters to your minde, which are there already both by speculation and experience most soundly imprinted.

It may please you then to accept of this mine homely translation, not so much for mine owne sake, who am able to deserue lesse then nothing ; as for the Authors worthinesse, being a Gentleman (as appeareth out of this, and other parts his learned Academie) most rarely qualified : and likewise for the excellency of this present worke of his, both in regard of the method, the matter, and the scope. For the method is most exact, and agreeable to rules of Art, proceeding from generalls to particulars, and from the whole to the parts. The matter or subiect is most noble : so that if (according to Aristotle) all arts and sciences doe receiue their perfection from the dignity of the obiect ; then certes of all others (Theology excepted) this science is the most excellent, hauing so spacious, so beautifull, and so fruitfull a field to manure, as the whole world, and all things therein contained. Neither is the scope any whit lesse charitable and christian, tending partly to the information of mens vnderstandings, and the reformation of their errors ; but most especially ayming at the glory of the creator, vnto whom onely is due all submission and honour. Finally, considering the authors manner of handling this discourse, and the variety of choise writers both ancient and of our times, which he alledgeth for confirmation of sundry truths, and for other purposes, purging by the fire of his exquisite iudgement the drosse of their opinions from the pure mettall, and in all places adorning their gold and siluer with the most orient and inualuable pearles of holy Scripture ; I deemed it in all respects most worthy to shroud it selfe vnder your Worships patronage.

Admire Iehouahs hosts and royall camps
Rang'd in battallions and seemely troupes,
At sight whereof the proudest Atheist drowpes.

Surmount the Spheres, and view those Ghostly wights

Of Heauen and Earth.

A S E R.

*I*t is time (Companions) that we quit our selues of the promise, which we made one to another in the entrance of our discourses concerning man, to recreate our mindes sometimes (if God thereto gaue grace) in the faire and spacious fields of the ^{*} Vniuers, by a diligēt search and attentive consideration of all nature: to the end thereby the better to acknowledge the soveraigne author thereof, and so induce vs the more to honour him, who is the foundation, whereupon we began at first to build, and still desire to raise up our A-cademie. For seeing the knowledge of God tending to his seruice, is the principall butte of our being and of all our actions: and that his infinite essence cannot make it selfe to be comprehended worthily, and according to his greatnes by the febleness of mans understanding: it behooueth vs carefully to meditate upon his works, for so much as in them the great Architect of the world hath imprinted certaine marks of his glory, sufficient to giue vs so much knowledge of his high Maiessty, and of that wherein hee requirerth vs to honor him, as our condition can beare, and according as is altogether necessary for the health and repose of our soules. Now we consider of the worke of God principally in two things (yea, and to them we may easily referre all the discourse concerning this matter:) to wit, in the creation, conducting, and government of his creatures, and in the mysterie of Redemption, which it hath pleased him to vouchsafe on mankind. As then in the proceſſe of our Academie, where we haue amply entreated of the litle world, which is Man, we haue begun to instruct our selues concerning the chiefest of his works: so now I desire that we may prosecute this goodly matter of the creation and being of the great world, if you (companions) will answer mee with the same affection: And if we may obtaine so much fauour of our God, that being well instructed in his schoole of wisdom, and guided by his holy spirit, wee may dare to speake (and what may wee not dare in seeking his glorie) of the incomprehensible secret of his worke for the health of man; wee will accomplish our workes and rest our selues in this point.

A M A N A. For as much as the world is a shadow of the brightnesse of God, and like a great booke of Nature and naturall Theologie, and that all creatures contained in the Vniuers, are like so many preachers and generall witnessers of the glory of the Creator, as all the learned teach: we must diligently settle our vnderstanding to the contemplation of this shadow of the diuine brightnesse, and our eyes to the reading of this booke of Nature, and our eares to heare these naturall preachers, which teach vs to acknowledge God and his providence aboue all things else, to the end to glorifie him as his bounty doth bind vs. Wee know also the great reasons which innite vs to this naturall feare of all things, and namely the impiety of our age, as we have declared in the forespeach of the second Tome of our worker, shewing that the world is of itself sufficient to vanquish all Atheisme, there being nothing in the Vniuers either so great or small, but from step to step doth direct man to acknowledgment of a divinity. Which will appeare more manifest unto us, if we entreat of the so great variety of creatures. Boldly then (companions) let us prosecute our purpose. If the enterprise be difficult, and too high for us to attaine to the summe thereof, yet to approach to things excellent, is alwaies very laudable.

* Or whole world.

The forespeach.

A R A M. Many blame discourses which are made, of heauen, for that they be feeble and very slender being compared to the beauty, and importance of the thing it selfe. And indeed I must confesse, that all that can be spoken of the world accordeth therewith as it is in it selfe no more then the portraiture of the Romane common wealth upon the shield of Aeneas, could meely represent the greatnes and maiesty of the acts & power of this Empire. But howsoeuer it be, we haue in the doctrine of the spheres most excellent principles and grounds, which prepare ment to the knowledge of nature, and the author thereof, yea which aduance them (if they can apply this study to his proper end) in the understanding of the secrets, wisdom and providence of God, so far as the mind of man can pierce therein. Let us then (companions) direct our sight straight towards the place, which we must apprehend, to be blessed to witte, towards heauen, and let us especially regard God in his works, as the onely limit whereto wee shall and must once attaine.

A C H I T O B. The orderly motions of the heauens, the goodly workmanship of so many starry pantions disposed one aboue the other, without any intermixture in their course, the accord, agreement, power, vertue and beauty of the elements, the situation, stabilitie and largenes of the earth in midst of the waters, which continually threaten it, and yet drowne it not, and so many diuers natures, and creatures, which are, which liue, which haue sense and understanding, in this whole great vniuers, & serue each one his place, all these things (I say) are like so many interpreters, to teach us God, as their onely efficient cause and to manifest him unto us in them and by them, as their small cause. Therefore pursuing our first intent sufficiently declared in the beginning of our Academicke discourse, and according to the proceesse of the talke by us obserued in our description of the naturall history of the Microcosme (or little world) let us here make (companions) as it were another historie of the Macrocosme (or great world) first entreating of the creation of the world: then of the diuision of the same, afterwards of the orders of the spheres, of their substance, natures, and motions, of the influences and effects of their planets, consequently of the elements: and lastly of every essence and creature therein contained: not by a particular description of their kinds, which would amount to a worke almost infinite, but onely of the principall of each sort, and so much as we shall hold sufficient to induce euery one of us, and of those which will deigne to heare us, to consider, and highly to praise the wisdom of the father and moderator of all these things, in the creation, conduction, gouernance, and end of them: and by the union of their parts, with the whole, and among themselves, we haue enough to refer the euent of our purpose to their beginning and principall scope, which is, to know God and his providence, to the end to glorise him. Declare then unto us (A S E R) that which you haue learned of the creation of heauen and earth.

ASER.

Fall men guided by reason (as Plato very well said) have a custom to invoke on God in the beginning of their work, whether it be great, or little; how much more convenient is it, that desiring to dispute of the Vniuers (if we retain any iudgement at all) we should call God to our aide? It is very difficult to speak as is requisite of the celestiall bodies, and of so many diuers motions as they haue, & yet not one hinder another: but it is a much more high and intricate matter to finde out the workeman, and father of all this great world. And when we shall haue found him, it is altogether impossible vulgarly to expresse the cause & reason of his works. For though (as it is) the glory and infinite wisdom of God shineth in this admirable construction of heauen and earth: yet our capacity is too too small, to comprise so great and profound effects, so much it wanteth that the tongue may be able to make a full and entire declaration thereof. And we cannot hold disputation, or argument vpon that, which doth not offer it selfe vnto our sense, and proper reason, as is the creation of the world. For therein haue we that wonderfull Architect (whom Hermes called the great and infinite sphere intellectuall, whose center is all that, which is, throughout the world, created) who performing his worke, and giuing motion to all the celestiall bodies, doth himselfe continue stable. Now that which moouing, is not it selfe mooued, surpasseth all discourses & speculations humane and philosophicall, & appertaineth to a diuine knowledge, the which we ought to impetrate through prayers by Reuelation of the holy Spirit, even in such sort as all things naturall are inuented, and comprehended by reason and demonstration, and all morall are obtained by arte and vse.

Then of the soueraigne, & true God, with his eternall Word, and holy Spirit, which three are one essence, one God in Trinity of persons, whose name is (I will be, that I will be) or (I am that I am) Almighty, Eternall, Creator & gouernor of every soule & body, in contemplation of whom consisteth the onely good, the true felicity, and blessednes of man, whom he himselfe hath created to attaine therunto, a liuing creature reasonable by the gift of vnderstanding & free wil. Who being iust, permits not his creature made according to his own image to remain unpunished, hauing sinned; & being merciful, hath not left him without grace, who hath giue both to the good & euill an essence, with the stones, a life vegetatiue & full of seede with the plants, a life sensual with the beasts, & a life intellectuall with the Angels; from whom proceedeth all gouernance, all goodlines, & all order; by who all that is naturall euen from the highest of heauen, to the center of the earth, doth subsist; of whom are the seedes of formes, the formes of seedes. the mouings of seedes and of formes: who (being good) hath not left regardlesse not onely the sphericall and elementary world; or else the Angels and man, but euen the entralls of the most small and contemptible amongst creatures, neither the lightest feather of the birds, nor the least flower of the herbe, nor leafe of the tree, engraving in each of all these things (the workes of his omnipotency) certaine signes of his glory, and maiestie; by the covenant and accord of euery of their parts, and as it were by I wot not what manner of peace: Of him (I say) father, and moderator of all that which is, which liueth, which hath sense, and vnderstandeth, let vs request (Companions) that with the light of his wisdom he will illuminate our vnderstandings, and by his holy spirit direct and gouerne our words, meely to discourse of according as mans power is able, the workes of his al-mighty hand in heauen and in earth, according as our intent is.

The beginning of euery thing whatsoever, is of such waight and importance, that on the knowledge of the same dependeth all the science thereof: for it is impossible that a man can bee skilfull in any thing, if hee bee ignorant in the principles, and first causes of the subiect which he desireth to know: contrariwise having well knowne them, the vnderstanding of the effects which thereupon ensue, of the vertues and qualities which thereby redound, of the actions which thereof proceede, of the degrees which therein are established, of the bounds and limits whereto these first causes tend to obtaine their perfection, declareth it selfe, as of it owne accord, without great difficulty and much paine. This was the cause why many sages in old time despising the care of temporal affaires, addicted themselves altogether to search out the cause of all nature: so that the most excellent of them would boldly discourse of the originall and making of the world. But the saying of Plato remaining euer true, that it is as hard to finde out the maker, and father of this All, as to speake properly of him beeing found out: it so falleth out, that the most part of them, who haue entreated of so lofty a matter, haue erred, straying by diuers by waies; yea euen all those whom the Sonne of Iustice, hath not fully illuminated with his supream brightnesse. Thereupon it proceeded that the Philosophers haue beene diuided into diuers and contrary opinions, about this question (whether the world hath bin from euerlasting, or whether it hath beene of late, whether of necessity, or else by the free will, and motion of God.) Aristotle with all the troupe of those, who beleue nothing but that which they can inuent and comprise by naturall reasons and syllogismes taken from sensible things, which guide them to a certaine demonstration, not being able thereby to vnderstand, how and wherfore heauen and earth haue beene created, affirme that they were neuer made, but that they haue beene from eternitie. But Plato followed of a great number of the most cleere sighted wise men, hath confessed the generation of the world which hee teacheth to bee ordered, and disposed by compleate and perfect numbers: vnder the vaile of which, and the obscure notes of hidden sense, it seemeth that hee would hide the close mysteries of the creation of the vsiuers to those which were not yet instructed in such secrets, which only may bee comprehended by a pure and celestially cogitation diuinely infused. For let vs know that there is no certainty at all of this doctrine, except for those to whom the minde, by a speciall and supernatural grace is sharpe, being fashioned and formed by meditation of the immutable substance of God himselfe, and by a secret operation of the holy Ghost, to beleue that it is the Eternall who by his word hath made all nature. For so the Soueraigne Creator talketh with man, and establisheth a certaine testimony of his truth in the heart of him, when he hath made him proper and meet to heare him with the best and most excellent part of his vnderstanding, in regard whereof he is said to be made according to his owne image.

How the creation of the world may be beleued.

But although these things may bee knowne, beeing not farre remote from our interior, or exterior senses, yea so that they may bee called present, and whereof no doubt is to bee made, especially beeing supported by authority of good witnesses, yet those things which surpasse the ordinary puissance of the minde, because by our owne iudgement wee cannot credite them, must bee considered, and beleued, according to that covenant of verities, which they annouce vnto vs, who haue known them, by our vnderstanding, peaceful, and duely purged: so that we may adde faith to such holy personages, as God hath made capable of his light, & which instruct vs not in the things which they haue imagined, but in such as they haue heard & receiued fro diuine oracles. It is then of their authority, that he must make a buckler, whoeuer will meely debate of God, and of his workes, and

and of his providence in the gouernance of them. And when the wings of Nature faile vs in solosty a contemplation, we must take to those of diuine grace; and when the naturall light sadeth and is ready to die, to require an infused and supernaturall illumination. The world is greatest of all things visible, and God of all things inuisible. That the world is, we perceiue; but that God is, we beleue. Now that he hath made the world; wee can better beleue of nobody then of God himselfe. But where haue wee heard that? In this word, whereto we must giue credite concerning those things whereof it is expedient that we should not bee ignorant, and which we of our selues are not able to vnderstand. Now hee hath spoken first by his Prophets, then by himselfe in the person of our Redeemer, and lastly, by the Apostles and Disciples. Wee heare him speaking aloud, where Moses Gen. 1. the father of diuines, and master of Philosphers saith (In the beginning God created the heauen and the earth.) The Prophet was not there present, but the wisedome of God, by which all things were made, and which by an incomprehensible vertue conueieth it selfe into holy minds, and doth direct them, and declare all his workes, without any noyse at all by his spirit; which can doe all, beholdeth all, encourageth all, and passeth through all purified spirits of vnderstanding, and abideth in his elect. And the blessed Angelles, who alwaies behold the face of their father, speake to them also, and announce the secrets of the eternall Maiestie, to all them (I say) in such sort as it pleaseth the Omnipotent to make them worthy. One of these was Moses, who teacheth vs that God Almighty made this great Vniuers. A witnesse so excellent and worthy, that by him wee must beleue in God, whom wee perceiue, as it were through the same wisedome and spirit, which revealed vnto him the creation of the world: who prophecied almost two thousand yeeres before of the high mysteries of Christian faith: confirming also this whole doctrine, by miracles, prodigies, oracles, and prophecies, wherewithall his writings abound. And therefore hauing confidence in his testimony, we call God, Creator of all things, therby inferring, that he is author, principall, & first cause of all essences, which cause by manner of speech ought to be full of all things, if this Maxime of the Peripateticks be true. (That none can giue away of that which he hath not.) And therefore the Poet the honor of our age very learnedly saith

Ere time, forme, substance, place, to be themselves attained;

All God in all things was, and God in all remained.

For there is nothing produced by nature, or formed, by arte, but first it hath abiding in that which performeth it. So euery creature is engendred by vertue of that seede, wherein it was at first, by power, included: so each worke liueth in the minde of the workeman before he puts it in practise. So had the world perfect being, in the thought of God before it was builded, and the very Idea thereof was contained in it, by which this great architect, when it pleased him, performed his outward worke: as Saint Augustine very learnedly discourseth in a long treatise vpon this text of Scripture (All things were made by the Word, and in it was life, &c.) And thereby wee learne, that God Almighty, the vnite from which all number proceedeth, and whereto all multitude referreth it selfe, did increase himselfe in himselfe, before he communicated his vnite with creatures, engendring one eternitie, and by an alone vniue action neuer disturbed, his linage full of vnderstanding, the very image of the Father, his Word, the perfect patterne of the world, and his loue and power the holy Ghost, which alieth the vnderstanding with the thought, three persons in one essence and substance. Afterward this Godhead, though in it selfe it was soueraigne good, not hauing neede of any strange thing, yet would hee according to his owne bounty in him consisting, produce the outward worke of the world, whereinto spreading himselfe, by a kinde of processe of well ordered degrees, and disposing through admirable workmanship the harmonickall formes of the heauens: the Angels and men by him created to be made partakers of felicitie, contemplating these maruailes, were ranshed and carried away with meditation of spirituall things, and by the beauty of his works, and ornaments of his creatures haue learned to acknowledge the father of this Vniuers. Who moreouer, performed not so great a worke in such manner as mortall men accustome to labour, who cannot doe any businesse themselves, if they haue not stoffe and tooles fit for it, nay and then cannot doe it according to their desire. But God created all of nothing, without helpe, without counsell, by himselfe, by his word, by the power of his holy spirit, in such time and manner as he hath pleased, of his owne franke and free will. Therefore it is written (He spake, and it was done, he commanded and the world was created. Also (The Lord hath done what soeuer hee pleased in heauen, and in earth, and in all the depths.) And againe

(O eternall Lord, behold thou hast made heauen, and earth by thy great power, and by thy stretched out arme: nothing is impossible to thee.) Briefely holy writings are filled with texts to this purpose, which giue vs certaine testimony, that the works of God are not subiect to any other cause, then to his onely omnipotent will, and that thereby, the word being spoken, those things which were not, haue beene created, as well the substance, as the fashion of them: and also the world Creation doth properly import so much, according to the stile of holy writers. Behold then summarily that which we learne of the originall of the world, we will consequently consider, as neere as may be, of this notable and excellent doctrine, and of certaine arguments, which some vse to the contrary. Wherefore A M A N A, if you thinke good, you shall frame the subiect of your discourse, vpon the time, wherein this Vniuers began to be builded.

vpon Genes.

A M A N A, The matter which wee entreate of, hath alwayes beene accounted of the Sages, to bee of such depth, and profundity, that it was ordered amongst the ancient Hebrewes, that any, who had not attained to ripe age, and good yeeres, might not meddle with the creation. Of this prohibition doth Saint Hierome make mention. And therefore Saint Augustine vpon Genesis, searching out the deepe secrets hidden vnder the vaile of simple words therein contained, speaketh to the Reader in this manner. [Comprehend this if thou canst; if not, leaue it to them, which are more learned. But make profite of the Scripture, which abandoneth not thy weaknesse, but, like a mother steppeth foot by foote an easie pace with thee. For it speaketh in such sort, that in height it scorneth the proude, in depth it astonisheth those which are attentiu to it. It feedeth the great with truth, and nourisheth the small ones with milde and familiar discourse.] And in truth in each part of Moses writings, the treasures of all Philosophy are by him discovered, like as if they were closely hidden in some field, chiefly in this place which we have intended to entreate of touching the creation. For of deliberate purpose he argueth in Philosophy of the originall of all things, of God, of the degree, number, & order of the parts of this great world. We neuerthelesse hauing confidence in this saying of the Psalmist, That the word of GOD doth illuminate and giue vnderstanding to the simple, and that it serueth for a light to our pathes, we may be bold to touch so lofty a point.

Why God made the world in the time that eth.

But before we proceed to consider of the precious treasures, and learned doctrine where- with the sacred sayings of the propbet touching the creation are replenished: it wil be good that wee discourse a little of the principall arguments, whereupon many, better Philosophers then good Christians, haue objected against this doctrine of framing of the world. And I will willingly begin with this olde question of the Epicure, which the Atheists of our time haue renewed, to witte: Why in the time that Moses recordeth, it pleased the eternall God to create heauen & earth, which he had not made before? If they, which say thus, would thereby infer, that the world hath beene eternall, without any beginning, and for that cause it seemeth to them that God made it not, they are too farre wide of the truth, and sicke of the mortall disease of impiety. For besides the manifold tellings, and propheticall testimonies, which make the creation of heauen and earth vndoubtable: euen the world it selfe, by his motion, and well ordered changing, and the gorgeous shew of all things visible therein contained, not speaking one word, doe after a sort cry out, that it was made, and that it could be no otherwise formed, then by God, who is ineffable, and inuisibly glorious. For it is not to be supposed, that a thing of most exquisite order and reason, should haue bin made by chance; and that a deede most soueraigne could haue any other father then soueraigne: nor so goodlie a worke any other architect then one essentially, goodly. And therefore all the schooles of those Philosophers, which haue had any whit of diuine sense, affirme with one consent, that there is nothing which more prooueth that God hath made the world, & that it is gouerned by his care and providence, then the only beholding of the whole world, and consideration of the beauty and order thereof. But see heere what imagination not grounded on sense putteth into the mouths of many. What did God (say they) before he created the world? why said he til then? or why said he not a little longer? In these and such like doubts they inwrap themselves; making no difference between the condition condition of God, and our owne, betweene his eternall essence, and that of those things, which haue once had a beginning. But with a discreete, and pleasant answer Saint Augustine resolue those, which demand what God did before the fabrication of the world. Hee was busie (saith he) cutting downe wood in the Forrest, to burne the rash and curious, who remember not what they themselves did yesterday, and yet dare inquire what God hath done of eternitie. But that I may speake to the most subtil, let the best learned among them tell me, what they intend by this worde (before) whereof they inquire? If they meane the passing away of time, they deceiue themselves, because time tooke beginning with the world. And if by the word they imagine something concerning eternitie, they abuse themselves also, for therein is neither before, nor after. For eternitie is an entire being at once altogether, without any proceeding. Whereby it is euident that their question is nothing. Time therefore cannot accorde with eternitie, nor bee eternall, seeing eternall hath no proceffe. It is therefore a foolish question, why before time was, God created not the temporall world, as if there had beene some succeeding seasons, before any succession did consist: for one cannot with any reason imagine any time before the stablishing of the vniuers. Yet Aristotle, whom the atheists will rather beleue then the word of truth, prooueth no other thing, when he enforceth himselfe to declare the eternitie of the world, then that time was neuer without the world, nor the world without time, which the Sages say, march in equall pace with the place. Wherefore as there is nothing beside place, appertaining to place; so there is nothing beside time, belonging to time. And for those which aske why the creator made not his world latter: I againe request them that setting a part the worke of the vniuers, they would assigne mee their before, and after, and then I will render them a reason why God created not the world sooner, or later: It is most certaine that they shall be constrained to confesse, that before the order and entercourse of the Spheres, there was neuer any before or after, which are the conditions of time. And therefore their rash demaund deserueth no other answer, except we recount vnto them the pleasant saying of Democritus, which is not vnfit for our purpose in this place (No man regards that which is before his fete, and yet wee see many sound the secrets of heauen, and curiously seeke after the mysteries of God.) There are others also who disputing more subtilly of these matters, agree very well that the world was made, but they will not allow that it had a beginning of time, but of his own creation, so that it hath alwaies had a being in some sort, which they cannot vnderstand. Those found their opinion vpon this pretext to defend that God should not do any action new, or of chaunce, for feare least men should beleue, that that came suddenly into his minde, which before he had not determined, to make the world, and that hee, who is immutable in all things, should create it, through a new-sprong thought. Now as they make doubt, concerning the time, which they would not haue begun with the vniuers: let me aske them also, why the world was set in that place where it resteth, rather then any other where? For if they suppose infinite spaces of time, before the generation of the vniuers, in which it seemeth not that God could rest from worke: they may aswell beleue many spaces of place out of the worlde: wherein if any could affirme that the Omnipotent hath not beene idle, they should bee forced to dreame with the Epicures of innumerable worlds. But if they answer me that the thoughts of men are vaine, by which they suppose of infinite places, sith there is no place out of the world: I may tell them also, that they are ill grounded in the consideration of time, sith there was neuer any before the world. And therefore as it is no consequence, that God framed the vniuers, rather by aduenture, then by diuine reason, tiot in any other place, but in that wherein it is; though mans capacitie cannot comprise the same diuine reason, by which it was so made: So is it no consequence, that we should denie that it happened to God by chance, or by a new imagination when he created the world, rather in one certaine time, then before, seeing that the times precedent how long soeuer we may imagine them, should bee equally past away, comparing them with eternitie, by an infinite space at once: and there should bee no difference why an auncient time should be preferred, before a latter. Wherefore we must all beleue, that the world was made with the time, and that time tooke beginning with the world, and that notwithstanding, in making it, God chaunged not his eternall counsell, nor his immutable will: but according to his inscrutable providence and bountie innate, hee would when he pleased, compose the large frame of the vniuers, full of his image. And here the definition which Aristotle maketh of Time, serueth to our purpose, to wit, that it is the measure of motion. For if immutable eternitie is easily discerned from Time, who perceiveth not, that time had neuer beene, if some creature had not beene made, who might change the created species by moouing? For that which giueth time his course, is the chaunging of things, when they giue place one to another, and one succeed another, because they cannot consist all at once together. Let vs conclude (therefore) seeing that the holy and most true writings expresse that: (In the beginning God created heauen and earth) (we may assure our selues there was nothing before then, & that doubtles the world was not made in time but with it. For that which is done in time, is done both before, and after some time: after (I say) that which is past, & before that which is to come. Now before the world, there was no creature, by the changeable motion of which, time might haue proceeding. Wherefore the world and time haue the same beginning, by the will of almightie God, and according as is declared vnto vs in his word: against which, there is no other reason of Sophists, which can conclude any reasonable apparence, as you ARAM may amply declare, in the processe of our discourse.

Of the nullitie of reasons, framed concerning the nature of the world, against the creation thereof. Chap. 3.

ARAM. THis sentence of Simonides, the ancient Poet, is well worthie to bee celebrated by the mouth of euery Christian man, (God alone hath the glorie, to bee supernaturall.) For what other cause can we inuent of his workes, but his onely free-will? But what rashnes rendreth man so audacious, as to enquire the cause of Gods will, seeing it is, and by good right must be the cause of all things, which subsist? For if it had had any cause, then must that cause haue preceded, and the will of God attended thereupon, which were vnlawful to be imagined. Whetfore when it is asked, why did God so? we must answere, because it was his will. If proceeding farther, any enquire, why it was his will? they demand after a thing greater, and higher then the will of God, which cannot bee found. Yet neuerthelesse haue we sufficient in his word wherewith to satisfie our mindes, in meditation of his secrets with all reuerence. For they, which haue declared them vnto vs, penetrating into most hidden mysteries, by the light of the holy spirit, haue sufficiently reuealed them vnto vs, with most splendant cleerenesse. But the way of truth is shut vp to the wise of the world, and cannot be attained but by the directions of it selfe. So that (which is greatly to bee deplored) it often commeth to passe, which this Iambicke relateth, (That the vnderstanding of things giuen by God, in long tract of time, is confounded by mens opinions, retaining very little diuinitie, and truth, by reason that it agreeth not with those things, which fall within the compasse of our sense.) The Philosophers therefore, attributing too much faith to themselues, haue blinded themselues through their vaine discourses, and haue become guides to the blinde: so that falling into the ditch, they haue drawne many after them, by false arguments, and apparant reasons, whereof our subiect shall here be to insert the most principall.

Of the demonstration of Aristotle.

Reasons of Philosophers against the creation of the world.

They then, who esteeme that nothing is stable, or can be stable, in such sort reasoning, and arguing by sensible things, prooue it by the same demonstration that Aristotle hath deliuered, yea and as he hath obserued in his whole discourse, and naturall progression (considering that all his consequences proceede from certaine maximes, which hee supposed to bee perfect true) and amongst the most powerfull inuentions, by which they pretend to overthrow the creation, and framing of the world, these Peripateticall reason of the nature of the world, are produced. First, they beholde the heauens altogether differing from contrarietie: whereupon they conclude, that it is not corruptible, and by consequence not made. They finde moreover, that those things which haue a beginning, doe get vnto themselues a new place: now heauen not being able to get it selfe a new place, they conclude that it could not bee created at any time. They consider also that all things which are mooued, passe into a new place, or are mooued round about something, which remaineth firme (as all the spheres are about their center) to the end that all disorder might be brought to some vniformitie. Likewise they suppose euery new thing to be reduced into the olde: so that all generation and corruption is made according to the old substance, and all motion is gouerned by the firme and stable earth, or the vnmoouable center, by which principles they could not perceiue how the newnes of the world could any way come to passe. And forasmuch as the generation of one thing is the corruption of another, and that nothing which should bee corrupted might preceede the world, thereupon they ground that it is eternal without a beginning. Proceeding farther, they suppose that euery thing which is produced, had a fore being in the matter thereof. Therefore (they holde) that of necessitie the matter must be eternall. But the most principall and substantiall argument, which they bring, and most generally received, is. That of nothing, nothing is created; whereupon they conclude, that the world could not be made, because nothing did proceede it.

Now we may easily answer these reasons, & trie whether they conclude, or not: but first let vs suppose (as it is most certaine) that there be three sorts of works & 3. kinds of workers. For there is the Artificer, who presupposeth the nature, to wit, the stuffe, fashion, and all the compound. There is the natural agent, which requireth before hand, the effect of God, to wit, the subject, or the matter. And there is God the soveraigne worker, who hath no neede of any other thing, because he is perfect, retaining in himselfe al maner of vertue. Which three kindes of workers do fitly accord by a certaine analogie and proportion, but doe much differ in comparison one with the other: and at the bounds and limits of the one worker, cannot be concluded the power of the other. For it were an error to proceede from art to nature, as if one should say: The arte doth first require the compound, the Goldsmith gold, the Founder mettall, the Carpenter wood, and the Mason stones and cement: therefore the naturall agent doth also require the compound. And likewise the Philosophers deceiue themselves, when they imagine that the soveraigne Creatour hath neede of a subject, or matter to worke on, as is requisite for the naturall agent. Also they abuse themselves to teach, that forasmuch as herein there passeth a certaine proportion from one contrarie to another, it therefore followeth, that God & nature doe proceede by one & the selfe same way. But where (I pray) have they learned to invent such conclusions, when themselves teach, that art is distinguished from nature, & that natural things appertaine to one kind of doctrine, & the eternal, and free from motion belong to another? For the artificer giveth the artificiall forme, & requireth the natural, and the naturall agent fashioneth the substantial, and requireth the material, which is the worke of the soveraigne. But if God should require any thing before hand to worke with, he should also require a former God which must have produced it, and by that reason there should be I wot not what former thing before the first. What are then these shewes of arguments? They conclude & accord badly, when because of the passion of a new place, which demandeth that which is newly performed, they would thereby exclude the world from generation, because it getteth not a place. But what absurditie shal they finde it, if granting them that it hath obtained a place, I say it is the same wherein at this present it remaineth? For it subsisteth about the center, or above that of the earth, or of the whole vniuers, or of the sphere intellectuall, whose center (as Hermes saith) is all that which is every where created. In that which they farther inferre, that every new thing must be reduced to an olde, we grant it them. But that olde, is the diuine cogitation, wherein all things are contained, before they be displayed in their proper formes: which being created by it selfe, it alone doth gouerne and preserue them afterwarde. What they moreover adioyne, that all naturall transmutation is made of one matter transposed into another, wee consent to them. But this is not requisite in the primitiue production, free from all lawes of nature, whereto by right the prince thereof is not obliged. And wee agree also that every thing: which is produced, must first be included in some other power, before it be effected: but we say that naturall things remained first in the matter; and the world and diuersitie of substances, were comprised in the Ideas, or exemplaries resident euerlastingly in God. And so doe the Platonists mainetaine, who mounting much higher then the Peripateticks, agree with that which Saint Iohn saith. That all things were made by the word, and that in it was life: which brought forth all things, and that in it the world before was by power comprised. Wherefore these be no dreames (as Aristotle calleth them) but the Ideas of Plato: but those are sighted like the bat, who see not the things most manifest in nature, thereby to acknowledge the author of nature. And to the end that we loose the strongest knot of their arguments, to wit, That of nothing nothing is created: I would desire them to expound me their sentence, because it is doubtfull, and ambiguous: for if the sense bee thus, that of nothing, by arte, or nature nothing is made, because they require the matter whereupon to worke: wee willingly accord. But what is this to purpose concerning the supreme and almighty architect, whome nature doth follow after, as farre as arte doth nature, as all Philosophers confesse: For according as the naturall agent, bounded and subject to motion, time, and succession, is lesse and more disable in essence, so is it lesse in performance then hee, who is free, and at libertie from all lawes of nature. But if they meane, that of nothing (to wit) after it hath no being, nothing is created: then haue they left it to this present to discusse.

cusse, and to all posteritie for ever. Wherefore we have a spacious field, to deny them that which is neither prooued, nor euident in it selfe. If they inferre, that this nothing reiecteth all manner of causes: then we consent to them in this point. But in the creation, or generation of the world, we presuppose (as truth requireth) a working and soueraigne cause, who in the infinite vertue of it selfe, containeth the matter, subiect and fashion, to bestow the meanes, the disposing qualities, and all that, which is requisite to reduce, and bring to perfection any businesse. Behold then, how all these arguments conclude nothing against the doctrine of the worlds creation, no more these other reasons deriued from the motions, & their bounds, which the Peripateticks doe farther induce against the same, as pursuing this matter (ACHITOBY) we may heare of you.

All motion
tends to a rest

Prou. 8.
Ecclesi. 24. 12.

THE Peripateticks, whereof now adaies many may be found, persevering in their naturall speculations, and considering that motion consisteth in that which is mooued, or ingendred: or else in the subiect of transmutation, and because no substance did precede the primitive production of the world, thereupon they conclude, that it was neuer created. But it is no maruell if they be greatly abused, seeing they would neuer swarue from their sense, and sensible things: whereof no pure and sincere truth can be gathered, because that by them, or by the reasons on them founded, wee cannot attaine to the knowledge of diuine mysteries, which are intellectuall, far remote from any substance, moouing succession, or other sensiblenesse. And therefore they much deceiue themselves, when they, in such sort, argue of these grosse, and materiall generations, comparing them with the diuine master peece of worke, which surpasseth all meanes of nature. They maintaine that all direct (or forward) motion cannot be perpetuall, because it requireth infinite space which nature is not able to endure: but circular motion, because it passeth nothing infinite, may be perpetuall. Now in eternall things, the consequence is good from the power to the being. One may then (say they) thereby assure himselfe of the eternitie of the world. But see a goodly reason to presuppose that to be perpetuall and infinite, which they pretend to prooue. Anerrois proceedeth farther, and saith, that it is impossible for the world to haue had any other disposition, then such as at this present it hath, & that being exempt from all contrariety, it followeth, that in no wise it is corruptible, & therefore was not engendred. But who reuealed vnto him that which he supposeth of the state of the world? With what measure pretendeth hee to meat out the puissance of the soueraigne workeman? By what authoritie dares he limit out the power of the infinite, so, that he may not destroy, and build vp at his good pleasure? I say then that the passing away of heauen hath another kinde of bound and limit then the earth, and the very rest it selfe, whereto (as with one minde all Philosophers teach) all motion doth tend. But forasmuch as motion begetteth time, and time it selfe is the measure of motion, thereby it commeth, that forging their arguments vpon one part of time, they misse and faile in reason, when they dispute thus: If the world was not before it tooke beginning, seeing this (before) is an appendix of time, then it followeth that time should precede motion, which is his cause, and progenitor. Againe, they say [In euery instant and moment assigned, is the beginning of time to come, and the ende of time past: then time hath bene before this first instant, and consequently motion and the world.] But the cause of these errors proceedeth from the misvnderstanding of wordes, when they would barre that this word (before) should signifie any thing else then some part of time. For aswell in the diuine as prophane writings of all authors, who can speake fitly and properly, we may finde that this particule (before) signifieth more then a part of time, for sometimes it denoteth the extreme: as is laid in the Proverbs, [The Lord hath possessed me in the beginning of his way, before hee created any thing, I haue had principality from euerlasting, and before the earth.] And in Ecclesiasticus, [He created me from the beginning, and before the world.] Onid himselfe in his Metamorphosis vseth this manner of speech, [Before the Sea, the Earth, and Heauen which couereth all things,] though that being of a fine and subtile spirit, he was not ignorant, that time slideth away by reason of the turning of heauen. Moreover this word (Ante) signifieth among the Latins

tions, the highest degree, wherof is deriued (Antistes) he which is principall, & cheefe among others. Sith therefore this particle (before) hath diuers significations, why will our Peripateticke reſtraine it to denote any other thing, but onely a portion of time. Would they not grant me this, that by a certaine order the matter was before the forme, and yet preceded it not in time? So is it that God was before the world, by a certaine order of eternitie. What they farther inferre [That the instant is the end of time paſt, and the beginning of time to come.] We anſwere them, that as the point is to things continued, ſo is the instant to things ſucceeding. Now the point is ſometimes the extreme of one part of a line, & the beginning of another part: & ſometimes alſo it is the beginning of the whole line, and not the end of any part precedent. So the instant & moment wherein the world had being, was the beginning of the time to enſue, & not the end of any paſt. They adde another argument againſt this doctrine. [That (ſay they) which paſſeth on both ſomething both before, & after it.] But he proceede farther, and grant them more, to wit, that all that which paſſeth on returneth to the ſame point, from whence it began to paſſe. For the water returneth to the ſea from whence it had an originall. The bodie returneth to the earth from whence it was borrowed. The ſoule, and other intellectuall things created of God (I except that which the Scripture teacheth vs of the reprobate) returne to himſelfe, of whome they were engendred. And all eſſences produced from the diuine thought, make a full circle beginning in God, & finiſhing in God himſelfe. So muſt time returne into the ſame eternitie, whereout it proceeded, and which ſhall remaine (this ſame ceaſing) in ſuch ſort as it conſiſted before it. And therefore wee anſwere thoſe who demaund how the creatour coulde precede the fabrication of the world, that hee proceeded it by an eternal enduring. Wherefore they conclude iuſt nothing againſt the Creation of that which then was, and is after the generation of things. Others which reaſon vpon the point, which we haue deliuered concerning the opinion of Auerrois, that the world is not corruptible, and therefore not engendred, argue thus. [That which is diſſolued into another thing, is diuided: but conſidering that beſide the world, there is nothing, into which it can be diſſolued, it muſt therefore endure eternally.] To which we may anſwere them, that the world is diſſolued according to his parts to the end that it may remaine in a better eſtate. But now wee diſpute not of the diſſolution, but onely of the originall thereof. And it may ſeeme nothing contrarie to Chriſtian religion, that the worke of God may alwaies haue a being: but farre otherwiſe then as wee ſee it, and which ſhall be then, when wee, moſt bleſſed, ſhall inhabite the new heavens and new earth, in life euerlaſting. And herein doe wee concur with ſundrie great Philoſophers, who eſteeme, that it is ill done to ſuppoſe, that thoſe things which immediately proceede from the bleſſed God, can periſh. And therefore wee affirme that the ſoule is immortal, becauſe it was produced, and inſpired by God: and that the bodie it ſelfe ſhall obtaine eternitie, when afterwarde in the reſurrection it ſhall bee reuelled with the nature of the ſoule: which ſubiect wee haue amply diſcourſed vpon in the ſecond part of our Academia. But it is ill concluded, to take away all beginning from things, by reaſon of the perpetuall enduring of the ſame. For (as we haue declared) it were to argue by naturall generations, of the diuine maſter peece of worke, which ſurpaſſeth all ſenſible conſideration. And ſith wee are in this talke of the enduring of the world, wee may further note, that thoſe, who haue thereupon imagined to take away the originall thereof, haue taught, that the ſpirits moouing the ſpheres, ſhould obtaine felicitie in the eternal recourſe of the heavens: which point Ariſtote enforceth himſelfe to demonſtrate, in his moſt lofty part of Philoſophie, where repeating diuers conſiderations more lofty then in any other place, he ſharply contendeth for this eternitie of the world. And Iohn Leſcot ſeemeth to grant him more then he requireth, when hee ſaith, that the ſpirits are bleſſed, not onely moouing the ſpheres, but for ſo much as by ſuch reuolution, ſeruing God, they communicate perfection to things here beneath. To which, agreeeth that which Plotin, entreating of heaven, and of the ſoule of the world, ſaith, [It is an abſurd thing, & diſcordant, to ſuppoſe that that ſoule, which did for a time containe the heaven, ſhould not alwaies do the ſame, as it by violence it had contained it.] And therupon he concludeth that the world ſhould endure for ever, becauſe the principall part of the ſoule therof, cannot be diſſolued, nor the nature therof empaire. Ariſtote alſo amongſt his other conſiderations inſerteth this, [That the prince of this worldly palace being eternal, not receiuing any viciffitude, or changing, it is moſt likely that his palace ſhould alſo be eternal, & that his miniſters, or celeftiall ſpirits, being altogether addicted to perpetual motion, ſhould neuer take reſt. But that we may vntie this knot, we wil ſay that it is an error of compariſon, to argue of that which hath his beginning immediately from God, in reſpect respect of the creator, and of that, which is below, in regard of things above, and of the immediate ende of every thing in comparison of his last ende. For the immediate ende of unreasonable creatures, is to live, and feede themselves; but their finall ende is to serve man's use; which according to the minde of sundry wise men, is the ende of all things here below. And the immediate ende of man is to governe his house, and familie, or the commonwealth to contemplate, trafficke, and such like businesses; but his latestt ende is to attaine to God, or to felicitie, be it, as one would say, through a Stoicall vertue, or by a Peripateticke contemplation, or by Academicke purifying, or (which is most certaine true) through faith, and grace according as our religion doth import. And also wee affirme that the immediate ende of the spirits separated from God, and of the corruptible matter, is to governe the heavens, and men, and such other things, as have bin committed to their charge. But their last ende is their onely contemplation of that first essence, from which they deriue their felicitie (as Aristotle himselfe testifieth in his Ethickes.) Suppose then that they cease to mooue, & from their immediate ende, yet shall they neuer cease to be blessed: no more then man shall be lesse happie, when he shall cease to governe the commonwealth, or to performe his other temporall businesses. And certainly it is marvellous that any can thinke, that the Angels, and celestiaall spirits should obtaine their happines, by moouing the heavens continually about, seeing that all moouings (as the Philosophers teach) do tend to a resting. But none can say that the spirits shall not cease: because they still labour; but when they have accomplished, and performed their worke, and deliuered such a fauour to terrestriall things, as they were charged with. And for the soule, whereof Plotin makes mention, one may likewise affirme that it shall not cease to giue life to the Vniuers, when it shall cease to mooue. For (as wee haue already heard) we maintaine not the annihilating of the elements, of the world, or the parts thereof; but rather the resting after the motion: in such sort as all nature must bee, in the end, after sundrie revolutions reduced to the rest of the Sabbath, vnkowne to many learned men. Let all those then, who trouble themselves without meane, or measure to search out the end of the worldly frame, or contend about the original thereof, here fixe their foote, least running without ceasing in their fantasies after this perpetuall moouing, they neuer rest, and least by no light, they can beholde their repose, being alwaies troubled with a continuall course. Now then ASER, I leaue to you to prosecute the confutation of diuers other arguments, vpon this matter of the Creation.

Cic. 1. of the nature of the gods.

A S E R. Besides that, which we haue hitherto heard, concerning the reasons and arguments, whereupon many depend, who deny that the world had a beginning, I finde that such are willingly induced to thinke, that by reason of this newe creation, or generation of the Vniuers, there might seeme to arise some new deuise in the Creator, because of the newnesse of the worke, and by consequence an alteration of his minde or will: which cannot happen to the most perfect, and immutable, neither within himselfe (for nothing can mooue it selfe) nor outwardly without himselfe (for then that should consist and encrease which was without him by the empaireing and wearing away of the most infinite.) These are the termes, which Aristotle, Auerrois, Moses of Egypt, and their disciples vse, alledging many other considerations, which Cicero in the person of the Epicure, enueighing against Plato, in his fluent and eloquent speech hath collected in the discourse of an oration. [With what eyes (saith he) could your Plato behold the Art, and composition of so great a worke, by the which he saith the world was builded, and composed by God? What inventions of buildings? What iron Workes? what lifting leauers? what engines? what ministers had he in so great a businesse? How is it that the arie, fire, earth, and water could obey to the workemaster? whence issued the fivie formes, whereof all the rest are formed, falling out fitly to compose the soule, and produce the sense?] And a little after he proceedeth: [I would faine aske these fellows, why vpon a sodaine these builders of the world started vp, who had beene a sleepe by the space of innumerable ages? For although there was then no world, yet were there certaine ages, although they were not such as are made of a number of daies, and nights by course of yeares (for I confesse that those could not come to passe without the turning of the world: but there was of infinite time a kinde of eternity, which no terme, nor circuit of time did measure. Neuerthelesse none can diuine of what space it hath beene, because it falleth not into humane sense, that there could be any time then, when time was not. Then in such an vnlimited space, why should the providence be idle? why should hee sic labour? and what cause was there, why God like the Shiriffe of a citie should desire to adorne the world with signes, and lights? If it were to them that God might the better dwell at his ease, he had then an infinite time before dwelt in darknes as if in an hole, or by-corner. But if we think that he hath thus beautified heaven, and earth, because he delighted in the diuersitie thereof, what may this pleasure of God be, whereof he was so long time before deprived? May it be for loue towards man, as you might inferre, that God made all these things? But hath this loue been for wisemen, or for fooles? if for wise, then to small purpose (God wot) hath this so exceeding great compiling of things beene made. If for the foolish, first there was no occasion why God should seeke to deserue any thing of the euill; then what hath he gotten when every one being a flat foole is most miserable, in that he is not wise? For what can we name that is worse then folly?] hitherto Cicero. *Alicino*s speaking like him doth farther adde: That sith there is nothing beside the world which may do it violence, it can suffer neither malady, nor consumption, nor any dissolution at all. Forasmuch then as it most perpetually endure, it followeth also that it hath beene without beginning. Anicen according with him, saith [He which negotiateth by the power of another, may instantly produce that, which before he could not: for he must attend the pleasure of such as work with him: but the first that worketh by his proper power, needs not attend, but worke continually.] Behold then, how the seruants of the world contend for the dignity of their prince, endeavouring to make him eternall, as if voluntarily subiecting themselves to a continuall reuolution, they would defeat themselves for euer retaining to any rest, wherein consisteth true felicity. But we must fight for the soueraigne Creatour, which is our peace, and true Sabbath: defending like good and valiant warriors his eternal rest whereto all reuolution of the world doth refer it selfe, and presently it will appeare (he himselfe aiding vs) how weake those engins are which our aduersaries haue planted against his worke, and against the wall of truth.

First we will consent to Aristotle, and to the defenders of his doctrine, that there came to God, by the framing of the vniuers, a new imagination; but full of reason, and without any alteration in his nature, or will, and moreover the same new minde was properly reall, and all one with his eternall will, towards the generation of the world, to performance wherof, he also proceeded according to his good pleasure. But I wonder at so many instances, as they intend to found vpon this new thought, seeing we behold, how assidually many new things are produced, whereof returneth a new thought either towards God, framing, or governing, or at least (as they say) so, as may be towards their wished and desired end. I demand then why should they the new thought of creating the world, make more against the maiesty of God, & not the inuentio of the new parts thereof, every moment arising? Argazel Sarafyn holds it not vnmeet, that the most perfect agent, hauing all condition thereto concurring, deferred neuerthelesse to produce his worke in effect, so long as he pleased, and that then he performed it, without any motion in him of him in nouelty. And there is no Philosopher which proueth the contrary, by any demonstration, concerning this newnes, which they presuppose in God, but do full oftentimes contradict themselves. And so is it that Aristotle in his book of the world, after hauing in the beginning declared God, Prince, gouernor & creator of this Vniuers, doth afterwards deny it, proceeding by reasons deriued fro sense. Fortherby he endeouoreth, to demonstrate the eternity of the world, & amongst other arguments he vseth this same. [It is most certen, that the agent either of deliberate porpose, or by nature, if he be good, putteth the good in practise, as much as in him possible lieth, if there be nothing to hinder him.] Certenly we confesse that the good is naturally addicted to community. But we hold that although the agent, by his labor & industry, endeouoreth with all his power to get the good, & obtaine it, yet neuertheles in the distributio thereof, he bestoweth it in such maner & sort, as he pleaseth. Why should we not the affirme, that the supreme Creatour, through his immutable and omnipotent will, hauing from euerlasting the good for his object, to the end to put it in practise, doth according to his good pleasure proceed to the performance thereof? But if any passing farther, will argue that the good doth naturally become common: hereto, mounting much higher then Philosophy doth require.

Answer to the arguments of the Philosophers.

Proverb. 8.

we answer, That for ever God, who is the soueraigne good, doth encrease himselfe in his son, and spirit coeternall, by which son, and through which holy spirit, one sole essence, and substance, he produced of eternity, and continually the exemplaries, and Ideas of all things by an eternall measure alwaies present, being the worke and possession altogether. Wee tell thee then, O Epicure, that God remained not in sloth, and idlenes before the creation of the world, he that by the testimony of Iesus Christ, doth alwaies worke, wherof none knoweth but the Creator, saue onely the sonne, and he to whom the sonne shall have reuealed him. And he which is most blessed in himselfe slept not, O Cicero, no more then hauing no need of any thing beside himselfe, he framed not this worldly tabernacle for his owne vse, with so great beautifullnes, but rather for man: not foolish, or wicked, but iust, and wise, or at least, that in this terrestriall habitation he might learne wisdom, and goodnes, to bee made at length a worthy citizen of the celestiaall palace. This is the delight, and pleasure which his sapience receiued in the compasse of the earth, and in the sonnes of men (as the wisemari saith.) But neither Aristotle nor Auerrois, nor Cicero, nor the Epicures, and Atheists of our time, haue attained to such supreme Philosophy, as to vnderstand this language of the holy Ghost, Excellent well did that thrise worthy Mercury, the prince, and most auncient of all Philosophers acknowledge, as the whole worke of his Pymander doth testifie, & himselfe also when he saith, that God, whom some call Nature, mixing himselfe with man, performed a wonder, surpassing the reason of all wonder: wherein beholding his owne image, he smiled vpon him through great loue, and gratifying him as his owne sonne, gaue him all his worke to serue him: to the end to reduce to himselfe all things by him, with whom he was mixed, but himselfe before any thing else, because that being purified, and acknowledging his diuine race, he might be made most worthy of God. The eternall omnipotent then had no need of tooles to frame the world with: he, I say, that by his onely commandement performeth all things. Neither had he need of helpe to produce formes, who is himselfe the Archetype, and giuer of all formes, and replenished with all secundyty. Neither is it a strange thing, that the elements should obey him, which by his word onely haue bene settled in their places. Neither dwelthe in an hole, or a corner, nor in darkenes, whom heauen, and earth cannot containe nor comprehend, and who is all light; but within the ample temple of this immense, and intellectuall sphere, whose center is all that which euery where subsisteth. There he inhabiteth those euerlasting ages, which no thought, except himselfe, can comprise. It is no maruel therefore, if humane reason be so often deceiued in the search of that which is inclosed in the closets, and cabinets of the soueraigne worke master, and reuealed but to very few. And for the saying of Alcionis, that there is nothing beside the world; whereinto the world can be dissolued: I answer him, that we teach not that it must be confuted, & brought to nothing, though it hath had a beginning of enduring. But say it is so? God shall haue no need of any thing, for this businesse, no more then he had neede of a subiect, to make and compose his worke of: by reason that his creation, or dissolution is free, and deliuered from the lawes of naturall generation, and corruption, as we haue heretofore already declared. Neither had he need of helpe, O Anicen, who through his proper power, and according to his owne good pleasure, performeth of his owne liberality all things not by nature, and necessity, as those imagine, to whom the eternall power of God, and his loue, for which he created the world, are hidden, as in the processe of our discourse, we may more amply declare. But first let vs heare of AMANA, concerning those things, which haue caused the Philosophers to erre from the truth.

Concerning those causes which haue made the Philosophers to erre from the knowledge of truth, and of their ignorance concerning God and his workes. Chap. 6.

AMANA. WE may by our precedent discourse easily vnderstand what the strongest engines, which the Philosophers haue planted (but in vaine) against the wals of supernall verity, in this point concerning the creation, and we neede not thinke it strange that they be deceiued, for it is a doctrine, not vsurped by humane arrogancy, but infused into the hearts of the small ones & humble, through illumination by the holy spirit, which mocketh such as thinke themselves wise, & scorne all others; leading them in the dark-

nesse of their blinded presumption: as contrariwise the same spirit directeth, & conducteth those, whom he replenisheth with his owne vertue, to contemplate in most cleere brightnes the excellent mysteries of God, and nature. But to the end that we may partly proceed to the discovery of their ignorance, who do arrogantly assume vnto themselves the name of wisdom, abusing even to this day many vnskilfull in the knowledge of piety, by their graue and ornat writings, being in shew and apparance like somewhat that saouureth, as it were solide and entire, true and profitable: though being profoundly examined, one may finde therein all cleane contrary, and a maruellous repugnancy not only generally between them all, but euen in the particular writings of each of them. I would willingly aske to be resolved of them in this point, how is it that they know the most blessed God (for now I speake to such as are not very far off from religion, and godlines, for as for Atheists, and such as beleeue not God, we will deale with them apart in the sequele of our discourse,) I doubt not but they will answer me, that they haue knowledge of God, by the motions and other sensible things, which lead them by the hand to all such things as may be knowne by vs. For these be their common sayings. [All our knowledge proceedeth of sense. And the experience of true discoursing is, that it agree with that which is perceived by sense: that beeing best knowne, which best agreeth with sense.] But I would entreat them to tell me if sensible things haue an agreemēt of one & the selfesame name, or of a name common to many, with the soueraign God: It is most certen that they are not of one signification, or name (to the end that we may follow their own institutions, by which they teach that God, and things created, do not agree in a selfe same proportion of substance, or essence.) And if one nominate all kinds, he shall name them (saith Aristotle) by many sondry names. But if God & his works are diuers in reason; then is it no marvell if the Philosophers proceeding by things here below decciue themselves in the knowledge of God. For how can they imagine of his high Maiesly by the motions, & these things scible, seeing the Eternall is altogether exempt frō sense and motion? Doth not Aristotle affirme, and after him Auerrois the Arabian, that God is altogether different from the manner of creatures? That is the first mouer, not being moued? Is it not to deprive themselves of the true knowledge of God by sensible things, whē they separate him frō the maner of creatures? Let vs not think it strange then, if those, who admit nothing, but that which they can inuent and comprise by naturall reasons and syllogismes deriued from sensible things, enforce themselves to take from the Omnipotent many things, which are to them hidden, and vknownne, beeing onely receiued by an holy intellect, and by a pure and celestial thought diuinely infused: as are these verities following. [That God hath created the world: that of a free, and liberall will, hee framed and ordained it, when & according as it pleased him: that it belongeth to man, the master peece of worke of his power, to consider what this great God produced according to nature, and what according to his bounty innate: How he dealt in his workes; briefly all the secrets of so wondrous a workeman.] But to returne to our purpose, I wonder how these Philosophers will on one side distinguish God altogether from the creatures, and on another side will measure his almightines and power by that which they consider of things here below. I would entreat them to heare (and yet they haue no occasion heerein to doe it, for they know it well enough already, I speake therefore to his schollers) that which Saint Dennis first instructed in their doctrine, and afterward lightened with the beames of the holy Ghost hath said of the Eternall God (saith he) is every thing in excellency. For every good thing which wee behold in these domesticall things, we must dedicate and appropriate the same to GOD in the most excellent sort that we can. For every thing which appeareth faire in the worke, should flourish much fairer in the worker. And that which is in it selfe worthy of the simplest, and meanest commendation, is in him found to be the best, and most excellent of all, for good in a better is euer most good. Good is wisdom in a citizen, better in a President, and most good in a king. Good is fortitude in a souldier, better in a captaine, but most good in a Prince. The like is to be thought concerning clemency, liberalitie, and other vertues, and ornaments. Sith then fecunditie, puillance, vigor, piety, beautie, magnificence, and such other properties doe shine in things here below, much more must they in the diuine thought shoote out their beames in soueraigne brightness. For in the creatures all these vertues, like borrowed colours, doe point out the soule of the world, but in the celestiall prince, they flame out in raies of his infinite essence, which vniteth all things, being appropriated & dedicated vnto it. See then how we must speak, & beleeue concerning the Soueraigne, and how to measure his workes by his omnipotency.

and power. But forasmuch as the Philosophers doe confesse that God is the first, and best of all things, and all other things are vnder him, and subiect to him, and that they praise, and commend in them, fertility, liberality, generation, and such other vertues, & faculties, which from time to time do here make manifest their effects: wherefore should they not acknowledge them in the fouveraigne good God, who saith in Esay, [If I giue fruitfulness to others, shall I be barren] They may tell me that they separate from God, not onely all that which feeleth his owne imperfection, but all that also, which wanteth of perfection: & therof it ariseth that they take from him all fertility, concerning things that are without him, least any new thing, or alteration might be attributed to the euermoving, and immutable: and likewise the liberty of contingence, least as if imperfect, he might seeme to negotiate vnder hope of reward: and yet they deny him not the liberty, by which he worketh as is conuenient for him. Certainly these be subtil, and sharpe allegations, and yet of small force. For let me aske them, if all schooles teach not, that the things of this world enforce themselues to their power, to represent the image of God? The Platonists in euery discourse, doe acknowledge it as well as the Theologians. Yea the Peripatetickes themselues agree in this point, as their master teacheth in the second treatise of the soule, in such words. [It is the most natural deed of all living things, so far forth as they be perfect, not impotent, to make another thing like to it selfe: as the beast a beast, the plant a plant, because they participate of the diuine, and eternall essence, so much as they can. For all essences desire it, and all things which follow their course according to nature, worke for the loue of it: but they cannot immitate it continually and with perpetuall proportion, because no corruptible thing attaineth to bee one and the same in number.] These be very obscure sayings, but yet by them wee may learne that all creatures tend according to their faculty, to agree with the semblance of God; and by how much more each member of this worldly body is more perfect, by so much more doth it enforce it selfe, as if in emulation, to imitate the creator of it. It is true that Auerrois doth interpret this text of Aristotle, concerning heauen. But how should the heauen be this Eternall, whom all things should enforce themselues to follow, considering that it of it selfe is eternall, in fauor of whom, the elements, heauen it selfe, & euery creature doth worke? Doth not the doctrine of Aristotle resound in each point, that God is the end of all things, in desire of who they are moued as to the thing loved & desired. But leauing this Arabian Auerrois, who studieth all his works to deface, & marre many other sentences of his master, that he may defend that which he imagineth; let vs conclude, that according as the Philosophers confesse, the elements in their being, the plants in their life, & fruitfulness, the liuing creatures in a better life, and in their condition such as it is, imitate in emulation the diuine power & perfection; and that men endued with the singular gift of libertie, & free will doth in the same imitate God, and beareth in a better estate and condition, then any other thing, his image, and semblance. By such consideration (say I) is also prooued the freedome and liberty of God, alwaies tending to good, according to his good pleasure, because hee containeth within himselfe that which he conferreth vpon others. And briefly to answer all their reasons heretofore alleadged, let vs hold, that the fouveraigne perfection, which is in God, wanteth not in the lowest degree, nor for the cause thereof, nor yet that his simple vinity is distributed into a multitude, because that in it selfe, by infinite power, it containeth all things. Neither doth the intellectuall soule degenerate, although (as they teach) it exerciseth the power to feele, to strengthen, to cause encreasing, and to moue according to his estate. For (that we may mount to higher considerations) God perceiueth with such his senses, as the holy Scriptures attribute vnto him: He moueth all other things, himselfe remaining stable, he giueth them strength, and feedeth them with the foode of his wisdom. But he performeth all these things by a meanes, by a perfection and power, which is vknowne to humane spirits, except they be illustrated with his light. And there is in him a fertility without travel, which is the fountaine of all other things, through which hee produceth alwaies within himselfe, but outwardly he doth it at the pleasure of his will. Which because it is the rule of contingence, it is not possible nor fit for vs to search out the cause of the first beginning. For when wee are thereto arriued, Aristotle himselfe doth charge to stay: for God hath no need of any precedent disposition; nor of helpe; neither did feare resistance, nor was hindered by space, hee, who in commanding created all things. But the causes of things here below, the instruments and subiect framed by his word, require a precedent disposition, haue need of an application, attaine succession of time, and seeke such helps, as are requisite for such a one, as negotiateth by power limited. And therefore (as we haue already said) when they they deduce their reasons from these conditional & naturall workers, to him, which is free & deliuered from all these things, they fall into diuers errors. But if by the works, which they contemplate in this Vniuers, they do enforce themselves to attaine to the knowledge of the Soueraigne Architect, then let them attribute vnto him all these things after a conuenient and perfect manner: separating from him all that denoteth feeblenes, and impotency in the worker. And then they shall see that the supreme things of the Architype, accord by a sweet and melodious consonancy to those which are more base and meane; all which are comprised in the creator, as in a modell and patterne, and contemplated by vs here below, as in a shadow or trace. But this shadow and much more the trace, doth want much of him, whom they represent. And yet by them, as by a token, or priuie note, wee attaine to some obscure knowledge of the creator: although his works doe agree with him neither in different proportion or signification, nor yet in all and through all in the same reason, but onely by a certaine resemblance they represent vnto vs the perfect fashion of supernall things, by their most grosse and base nature euerie one in their degree. But this is sufficient concerning this subiect: now speake we of the authority of such witnesses, as make the creation of the world vndoubtable, which we refer to you A R A M, to declare vnto vs.

Of the authority of such witnesses, as make the creation and newnes of the world vndoubted. Chap. 7.

A R A M. AS we haue seene, how weak and feeble, the arguments of Philosophers, against the creation and newnesse of the world are: so is it expedient also, that beeing ready for the combat, we march in battle against them, armed with true and strong reasons: and vnder the authority of very good, and approued witnesses, to the end to make vndoubted to all, that, which we haue already declared concerning the creation of the Vniuers. And first wee will recite those, who being worthy of credite, haue taught it vs. Wee haue already seene how that the opinion of Plato (concerning this generatiō of the world (accordeth with the doctrine of Moses, Mercurius Trismegistus in his Pimandre deliuereth in few words the same sacred mysteries, rendring the composition of this Vniuers, and of the gouernours thereof, and of all things created, to be vndoubtable. And by the baser elements he aduertiseth vs of the pure workmanship of nature, vnited neuerthelesse with the thought of the Creator. Which elements he affirmeth to be for this purpose, established by the will of God onely, and yet in farre worse condition, then before they were in the worker. Empedocles of Agrigentum, and Heraclitus of Ephesus affirme not once, but oftentimes the world to be engendred, and corruptible. Democritus teacheth, that it hath had a beginning, that it one day must perish, and neuer againe be renewed. Hesiod and Orpheus the Poets sing that it hath been created. Thales one of the seven Sages affirmeth, that this round frame is the worke of God. Pythagoras and Heraclitus his expounder, confesse God creatour, and father of all things. To which accord Anicen Arabian, Algazel Sarrafin, Philono lesse excellent in doctrine, then in Greeke eloquence, & Alcinoüs the Platonist, who saith, (It is necessary for the vniuersall world to be the perfectly beautilous worke of God) And many such other authors the most commended for learning, whom it would be too long & tedious to rehearse, affirme the same. But leauing the testimonies of strangers, let vs come to such as haue receiued frō diuine oracles, by supernaturall illumination, that which they haue taught vnto vs. We haue heard that which Moses teacheth vs concerning the generation of the world, now let vs consider how his doctrine, or rather the doctrine of the holy Ghost speaking by the mouth of so excellent a prophet, is confirmed vnto vs by miracles, prodiges, oracles, & prophecies: and lastly by the consent of euery part of his writings; as also by the graue authority of those who in their interpretations of them doe confirme & approoue them. Concerning his miracles they are all most manifest to such as haue read his bookes. The rod is turned into a serpent, & againe returned into the former shape: It deuoureth the magician's rods, shewing that the forceries of vnclane spirits, and all their puissance & force is consumed by the power of God, which wrought & dealt in Aaron & in Moses. He brings forth infinite little beasts and of sundry sorts, which picke both man and beast: he draweth water out of the stone, giueth quails frō heauen, bringeth thunder, a cloud by day, and a pillar of fire by night, and also the darke night, & doth all this by the word of the liuing Lord who one while terrifieth, and another while comforteth his people. Hee sendeth slaughter among the Egyptians, sudden losse and ruine to the wicked, fire among the proud, and leprosie to her that murmured; and preserveth for a long time a great number from sickness, and their garments from waxing old, and wearing. Moreover he feedeth them with heavenly foode, and giveth them victory over all their enemies. Such things and many such like things doth the soveraigne architect of this Vniuers performe by his prophet; to the end to approoue his doctrine, and to teach vs his truth thereby. To this end also by the word of Moses he appeaseth monsters, causeth the thunder to cease, healeth such as were empoisoned: to the end that to much the more through such prodigies, his law, the wisdom of life and doctrine, by which he instructed his people, might be celebrated. And concerning Oracles, they haue not bin deliuered vnto vs from a Delphick Apollo, from a Iupiter, from a Pallas, or any fained sapience, or else from some new found god head: but they haue bin given vs from the mouth of the living Lord, whose voice the innumerable multitudes of Israell did sometimes heare. But if some (as there are many amongst vs) will not beleue Moses alone, relating all these things, nor his people which haue written of them as he himselfe did, yet let them at least giue credit to the many graue and Sage Authors, who affirme the for a very truth as to Berosus the Chaldee, to Manetho the Egyptiā, Hierom the Phenician, king Darius, Mendesian Ptolomy, Monander of Ephesus, Nicolas Damascenus, Abiden the Historiographer Ephesus, Theodore, Chorilus and Ezekiell the Poets, Demetris the Historian. Hecate of Abdera the Philosopher, and aboue forty other learned, recorded for testimony by Iosephus Aristobulus, Tertullian and Eusebius, who all agree in recitation of the forsaide wonders. Let vs proceede and come to the prophecies. Of them Ptolomy in his booke of fruits saith, (Those onely who are inspired by God, prophecies of particular things.) (If then Moses in his doctrine, and all the other Prophets which haue followed him, haue prophecied of so many particular actions to the king of Egypt, to the Tribes, to many princes & kings, as wel concerning themselves as also concerning their cities, and people, who will doubt that they haue beene instructed by the spirit of God? Who can accuse them of falshood? who will make doubt of their doctrine? If one read the text of Moses, all points therein are so replenished with prophecies, & future euents, that there is nothing left out there concerning that which belongeth to the mysteries of diuine and Philosophicall matters, nor of the Messias then to come, nor yet of all whatsoever should afterward come to passe, as is euident to those who haue the eyes of their minds illuminated, and who vnderstand the bookes of the law, to see cleane through a great many vailles, vnder which (as was most meet) the prophet did hide so many profound mysteries. What man then of sound iudgment that making small or no account of such and so great sacraments: will rather then to beleue in them: haue recourse to the monuments of certain Philosophers, not approoued by so many witnesses, & whose writings fauor no whit of diuine matters? Wee may very well receiue their instructions so farre as they differ not from the doctrine of holy writ: but we must altogether reiect that which relying vpon their owne authority, or their owne inuention supported by their reasons, and indeed not in many places ought woorth, (which) they induce besides that which is containd in the writings of Moses and the Prophets. For if we will shew reuerence to authors, to which I pray you, should we shew more, either to Aristotle, Auerrois, Epicures, and such like, who only doe shine with a small light of humane doctrine, or else to Moses, to the Prophets, to Salomon the wisest of all his time, to the Evangelists, and to the Apostles, every of which in sapience, in wisdom, in manners, in prophecies, in oracles, and in all kinde of holinesse do shine, and flame like burning torches? Who affirme in an vnused stile that which they speake concerning diuine things, prouing them with perill of their liues, and confirming them by prodigies: and speaking of things naturall, humane, and base, aboue all common capacity of men, and penetrating into most deepe secrets, by illumination of the holy spirit, doe with most bright clerenes manifest them to all those which haue eyes to see, and eares to heare. And therefore Eusebius hath excellently written to this purpose, speaking thus, (you shall finde out the errors of the Ethnicke Philosophers, not by mee; but by the contradiction, and marvellous repugnancy among themselves: and when I compare them among themselves, or with other common men, certainly I cannot denie but they haue beene woorthy personages, but when I conferre them with the Philosophers and Theologians of the Hebrewes, and compare their doctrine, with the doctrine of those, frivolous and vaine do all their enuentions seeme to mee.) Moreover, know wee not that by the one all thinges haue beene deliuered humanely, and by the others diuinely.

And

And that those who would taste of the first draughts of wisdom, have beene constrained to learne of the Hebrewes? And therefore Porphyrus in his booke of Abstinence, adorneth with sundry praises the religious, or prophets among that people, calling them Philosophers, and assigning them the chiefest degree above all other Prophets and Magi, who have made profession of holinesse. And Orpheus in his booke which he hath written of the holy word, after hee chased away all contempters of the diuine ordinances and mysteries, confesseth that he learned out of the tables of Moses, that which hee song of God, knowe onely but to his Prophet. But above all the foresaide testimonies, worthy to be beleueed, to them (that which surpasseth all admiration) the doctrine of the celestially and diuine messenger Iesus Christ, the true messias, annointed with diuine graces, above any other prophet doth accord. Who allowing and approouing the doctrine of Moses, openeth and reuealeth many secrets, which he received of God his father, and announceth the perfection of true religion: wherewith his apostles haue so filled the whole world that euen to this day, all the wise men in euery part of the world do embrace and reuerence so excellent doctrine, as that, wherein it shineth, so much diuinity and celestially brightnesse, that without comparison it surpasseth all humane doctrine. Let vs receiue it then, euen all of vs that desire wisdom, because that neuer any more excellent did euer yet appeare to mortall men, neither shall euer appeare hereafter. And let vs not make a stay in that that Socrates knoweth something, or that Anaxagoras seeth the light in darkenesse, or that Democritus draweth vertue out of pits, or that Empedocles enlargeth the path of his spirit, or that Archylaus, and Carnades attaine to some new kind of knowledge, or that Aristotle proueth that which flieth from sense. But let vs giue full faith to the authoritie of so many irreproachable witnesses, who make the generation of the world vndoubtable to vs, & let vs proceed to the reasons which further confirme it vnto vs, and which, ACHITOES, we desire to heare of you.

ACHITOES. Amongst those other arguments, which wee haue heard some Philosophers obiect against the creation of the world, one hath beene the disconueniencie of the newnesse thereof with eternall God, not being able to perceiue how and which way it might come to passe: for by reason of the consideration of such a like question, to wit, [which of the egge without the birde was first engendred; seeing that the egge without the birde, nor the bird without the egge could not subsist:] they haue imagined that this world was eternall, and that the beginning of euery thing engendred, was the end likewise thereof, through a perpetual course, & proceeding. But let me aske these doctors, whence cometh this newnes which we behold euery day in all things of this world? For there is nothing which suffereth not vicissitude, and changing. Anaxagoras saith, that this proceedeth from new revolutions, which notwithstanding are auncient by an euermore succession: & that there is the stay where the oldnesse, and newnes is conserued, For which cause also some haue affirmed, that heauen is some part new, some part old. But for as much as these Philosophers do teach, that revolutions are made by those disposing spirits, which are called the seruants of the creator, or of the first moouer, doth not thereupon follow, that there is no stay in the heauens, but that they moue anew to accomplish that which the first moouer, doth propose in a certaine time to be performed, and who remaining stable doth giue motion to all the rest? Wherefore we may say that the beginning of newnesse cannot bee from heauen, nor through the spirits, but by the first moouer, who at his good pleasure commandeth & all things are made, and afterwards renued by a secret order within himselfe not constrained by any necessitie. For so it is that God proceedeth to his worke, and so prosecuteth it, without being otherwise bound to base things: which Aristotle himselfe accordeth to, when he declareth that he is blessed, without any good that is strange, or not of himselfe. And farther, I would willingly know with what kind of measure they would mete out the Vniuers who beare such fauour to the eternity of the world? If by time (it be measured) then is not eternall, for those reasons which we haue deliuered heretofore in the discourse concerning the time of the Creation. If by eternity (it selfe) then let them remember that that is a possession altogether separated from time, and from motion, as hath beene to vs sufficiently declared. How then can this world be eternall which is equall in age to Time, and altogether subiect to Motion? But if any one yet would hold that it is eternal, let him tel me whether it endureth by the selfe same eternitie which is in the blessed God, or by some other? If it be by another sort of eternitie, then should there be diuers eternities of gouernours, & of kinds, which should fauour of the nature of the infinite: and also many infinitenesses should bee contained in this world which is so small. If they will say, that the world subsisteth of the same eternitie by which God is, certainly such are not worthy of any answer, but rather to be mocked at, who thinke the spheres, & their moouers to be measured with God: for eternall enduring differeth not from God. But that which is changeable according to Nature, and operation cannot be measured with the same compasse, as he who is altogether vnchangeable. They wil tell me that the eternity of the world differeth from that of the first agent, because the one being altogether diuine is a possession at once altogether, and the other is successiue. But I answer them that if it be successiue, it hath certaine portions; now such portions cannot be infinite, and therefore such eternity hath a beginning, & successiue ending. Now if it be limited and bounded with these termes, how can it bee that it may agree with the eternall, who is not closed, or limited by any ending? Besides, by what reason may this be called eternall, to which alwaies something is added by a continuall succession? For one can adde nothing to the infinite, neither doth it encrease at all. And therefore I aske them againe that if their eternitie subsisteth, what do become of the new reuolutions? Shall we say they are conioyned with the former, or else that they begin a new infiniteness? If they graunt the first, then will they be more in number then infinite. Auerrois saith, that this is no more disagreeable to successions, then to numbers, that infinite tens bee infinitely repeated, which amount to so much as innumerable hundreths, without making any more encrease in one part then in another. But good God who can heare these things with a quiet eare? By an impossible supposition which he deuifeth in numbers, and which neuer cometh to passe, he would resolue the inconueniences which depend vpon infinitreuolutions, which hee saith did precede all eternity. And for the other point, to thinke that the new reuolutions should begin a new infinitenes, we haue alreadie answered that saying, that many infinitenesses cannot be imagined in this world. But here leauing the successions and numbers, I would farther request these defenders of the eternity of this round frame to tell me, whether the moouing spirits know the reuolutions, or not? If they know them not, certainly men doe them much iniury to thinke, that they are ignorant in their motions, which many Astronomers know. If they know them all (being) infinite, how is it that by a finite vnderstanding, which is in all creatures, they may cōprehend things (that are) infinite? Again, sith that generation is bounded and limited by the vndinidable, and the last generation of any creature whatsoever by the last creature, what generation shall wee say to be limited to the first? If they say there is no former, how is it then that there can be a latter? I wonder also at those ancient Sages of the world, and the moderne likewise which follow them, when they declare all things to be mooued, and ordained in God as in the last wished, and desired end; and yet doubt to confesse that he is the ordainer, considering also that they call him the first moouer. But if he hath ordained all things, it followeth likewise that he must know them. For concerning that which some inferre, that God hath only disposed the vppermost and highest things, and that the second causes engendred the lowest: I demaund of them, how it is that those here below are correspondent to those which are most high, cōsidering there are diuers ordainers? Doth not Aristotle say, [That there is but one onely prince, for feare least things should be euilly disposed & gouerned?] Again, if all things depend of a desired & finishing cause, so that in fauour thereof they become great: how is it that they haue a being of themselves, seeing they seeke to be perfect in another? Why haue those any need of a preseruer: which haue no need of a creator? Indeed the son is preserued without the father, but without him he is not engendred. For what occasion thē doe these Philosophers give a keeper to the members of the Vniuers, & do take cleane away frō it any parents? What lies doe they bring vnto vs that accuse others to be sellers of lies? For in one place they miscōster & deny that, which in another place the truth constraineth them to confesse. Auerrois in many places of his writings, denieth that God created the world; and yet, interpreting the treatise of heaven, he calleth him Creator. So likewise Aristotle proceeding by sensible things mocketh at Plato, that at euery word confesseth the world to be created: and in the booke which he intituleth Of the World, he auoucheth God to be Creator of the Vniuers. And in his Metaphysics he teacheth that he is Prince of the world. And how is it that the Prince is entred into an house which he neither hath builded, nor obtained by right of inheritance, nor bought with any summe of money? This is as he affirmeth that the supreme thought vnderstandeth not the particular matters, for feare least he should ouer labour, or, else wearie himselfe. And yet in the treatise of good, and bad fortune, hee often repeateth, that hee hath excellent good fortune that is guided by God. But how doth hee guide and direct that which hee vnderstandeth not? And how doth hee render condigne recompence, and reward for thinges well or ill done (as it is saide in the same Treatise) if he doth not consider and examine the workes of euery one? Againe wee reade in the Meteors, that God hath placed the pure fire vnder the globe of the Moone: and yet how hath he disposed and ordained that, which he neither made, nor hath knowledge of? Surely it would be a tedious matter to bring out all the contrarieties & repugnances of the writings of Philosophers, which do plainly confound themselves. But out of much I haue selected this little, to the end that those who boast rather of the name of Peripateticks, or Auerroists, then of good Theologians, and Christians, may behold, that al their teachings are not solid, nor firme. Let vs insert among our reasons, which confound their doctrine, the iudgement of Saint Augustine, of Macrobius, and of many other learned men, who hold that the eternitie of the world cannot subsist, and haue place with so small memory of things done, as we haue in our histories, as well holy as prophane, neither yet with the inuention of arts and many other thinges celebrated by Eusebius, Pamphilus, Clemens, Alexandrinus, Berosus the Chaldee, Aristotle, Auerrois, Theophrastus, Epigenes, Crisodemus, Philosophanes, Egeus, Archimachus, Damasthenes, Aulus Gellius, and a great number of others of diuers languages, and most plentifully by Pliny in his booke of the naturall history, where he confesseth to haue collected part of his writings out of the said authors, with whom also, in that which they testifie of the inuention of things, the holy letters are of great authoritie, in that they do agree with them herein in many points. For although there be some difference concerning the names of those which haue inuanted them, as the forenamed authors do not alwaies agree among themselves: yet the inuention found in time, is wholly confirmed by the same reason, & all that which disagreeeth, is come either by reason of the languages, not being alike, or because that Historiographers, chiefly the Greekes, haue attributed that to their nation, which properly appertained not them. Now if the world had beene from the beginning, yea euen before the beginning, as many would haue it: why then in the successiue course of innumerable ages, was not that policie and kinde of liuing inuented, which we vse at this present? Why not the vse of letters, by which onely, memory is made eternall? Why not the experience of many things? For none of all this is found to be, but within and since five thousand five hundred yeeres, so long as the Scripture teacheth vs that the world hath beene created, being from the creation therof to the natiuity of Iesus Christ (according to the common computation) three thousand nine hundred sixtie seven yeeres, what did the inhabitants of the world before his time so brieue and short being compared with eternitie, and to which the histories do refer the inuentions and vse of all things? Lived men then without policy, and without lawes? without bread, without wine, without tillage of the earth? were they without the exercise of merchandise, without the studie of good letters, of discipline, of warfare, of navigation, of building, of weauing, of sowing, of dressing wooll: all which things haue their inuention famous but within a few yeeres, and in diuers seasons? wherewith lived they before? wheredwelt they? how were they clothed? what did they being altogether ignorant of arts? Certainly it is meere mockerie, that those who teach that the world is eternall, do themselves assigne the inuentions of lawes, of arts, and of mens liuing, considering that both the one and the other could not consist both at one instant. Behold (companions) that which seemed good to me to note concerning the reasons making for the creation, the historie whereof will put vs altogether out of doubt in that which toucheth the principall arguments of the Philosophers against it, if we doe amply entreate of their errors, when they maintaine that God worketh of necessitie, and not of free and franke will which will serue vs to morrow for a subject to begin the daies discourse.

The eternitie of the world cannot agree with histories and inuention of things.

Chapter 9.

ASER.

I thinke (companions) we were yesterday sufficiently entangled in the discourse of the creatiō of the world, about that which concerneth the doubt, that remaineth in many. But ere wee doe farther enter into the cabinets of God and nature, it would not be vnfruitfull if wee yet haue an other pull with the Philosophers about this question. Whether of necessity or of free choice, and franke will God was prouoked to worke? For they supposed that the condition of

If the worke

necessitie, or voluntary.

necessitie was fitter and more conuenient then was the matter of contingency, & therefore they appropriate it to God. Wherin they thinke verily to want no reasons for their purpose, & that these make specially for them. [That God worketh by his proper substance, and not by any borrowed vertue; That the effectes of the world, are of necessity, because they seeme in no wise to proceed of a contingent cause; that by the same reason is to be considered the invariable, and necessarie order of things, to the end that the vniuers bee not confounded or troubled.] Moreouer the Philosophers supposed that it was a very vnfit thing, for the diuine vnderstanding to worke of necessity, and the diuine will to worke freely, considering that it is no lesse perfect then the diuine thought. Now though that wee (concerning these considerations) might take out of the quiver of reasonable discourse arrowes enow against these Sages of world, yet for that this point doth particularly touch the diuinity, it may suffice to say with Plato, that one cannot picke out so great a mystery by reasons, but seeke to learn the same by oracles. For it is sufficient to know that the great law-giver recordeth that [God spake, and it was done] & that with him agreeth the kingly prophet, saying, [he commanded, & it was established] to conclude, that all the scriptures teach vs the same doctrine.

Liberty profitable
for all things.

But here let vs declare, that that which seemeth thus to disturbe the Philosophers, is nothing at all: For they presuppose a necessarie disposition to bee more perfect then the contingent cause: which they haue left to prooue, to those that should come afterwards. Now I beseech you, do we not more esteeme a Prince, who directeth euery thing according to his owne good pleasure, then if vrged by nature, or any other prouocation constraining him, he should set his hand to any busines? Who will blame libertie, which (as the Prouerbe saith) is hardly bought for gold? That I say, which they themselves thinke to haue bin graunted man for a most singular good? What perfection, what praise should bee attributed to most loftie thoughts, if they were ener forced to performe that which is good? What dignity might appertaine to a great king, if he did all things necessity constraining him, and nothing of a generous heart? And seeing by comon consent, we acknowledge God to be the Prince of the world, what glory and honor should be given him for his gouernement, for his wisdom, for his iustice, for his clemency, if of necessity, & constraint he were drawne on to maintain that, which is in his tuition? What grace, what seruice, and adoration should wee owe him? Why is it entred into nature, to sacrifice, as Aristotle saith? Why are we obliged (as Anaxagoras himselfe teacheth) to magnifie God the creator in prayers and sacrifices? If God doth all things of necessity, what profiteth all this? For what cause is it conuenient for vs to pray, if God be not appeased by prayer? To what end hath all mankind in euery age, in al places of euery nation beene addicted to a dore a diuinity? Surely we may therot gather that prayers are fit for men; and that it is naturally grafted in our minds that God is moued by them. So many reasons then may well conclude, that the author of Nature doth neuer negotiate of necessity. And for that that he worketh by a proper substance, that is not of eternity, except in the spiritual worke, from himselfe, wherof we haue spoken in the 3. of our discourse. But for the outward worke hee proceeded thereto, according to his owne wil, when it pleased him; not constrained by any causes (for hee is the onely and principall cause of all things)

Prayers are fit for men.

things) nor for hope to get any good (for that he of himselfe is blessed, not having neede of any other good.) Furthermore also, the necessarie effects conclude not any necessity in the prince, or in the first cause, considering that the second causes, which Plato & the other Sages call his servants, doe worke by his comendement in determined order; so that the necessity that therein is, dependeth vpon his comendement, or vpon the order, from which he absolue them according to his own good pleasure. And therof came it that the fire burned not the childre in the Chaldean furnace: that the sun stayed his course by the space of a day at Iosuahs comendement: that it went backe ten lines or ten howers, in the time of Ezechias: That it was eclipsed at full moone, during the passion of Iesus Christ. The Peripatetickes, Atheists, and Epicures will laugh at this, and will say scoffingly: which of the Philosophers recounteth these things? These sellers of lyes, which teach the lawes, are madde (saith Auerrois.) But herein sixth question is made concerning diuine misteries, what haue we to doe with such contempters of all pietie? The sentence wherein we make stay, hath bene celebrated by those which could iudge. And men doe rather beleue one that affirmeth, then a thousand that denie: for negation concludeth nothing. And why should we care then though they deny altogether in words that, which many witnesses, yea and most wise, do assure to haue prooued in effect? The holy letters testifie it, whereto we rather giue credite, then to Aristotle, and al his schollers. And amongst a thousand most famous Philosophers & Christian Martyrs, which consent to this doctrine of truth, is Saint Denis Areopagita, so called of the Areopagus or streete of Mars, which was a court and assembly among the Athenians, first of nine persons elected by the chiefe Magistrates, and after ward encreased to the number of fiftie of the most principall, as well for learning, holinesse of life, and wisdom, as also for riches, to the end that pouerty might not induce them to corruption (as Audrotion in the second, and Philotorns in the third booke of the Athenian affaires do write.) This man then writing to Policarpus, reprehendeth Apollonphanes the Sophister in these very words, because hee would not admit of the eclipse of the Sunne which came to passe at the death of the Messias: [I know not with what spirit thou wert let to diuine, O Apollonphanes, when, with me, contemplating the eclipse, which was against the order of nature, at the time that Christ suffered, turning thy selfe towards mee, thou saidst (noble Denis, these are the changes, which come to passe sometime in diuine things.) If thou canst, conuince this of vnruth. For I was present with thee in consideration of so great a prodigy: with thee I beheld it, iudged of it, and thought it worthy of perpetuall admiration.] But if any will not yet beleue this most entire philosopher, let him hearken to that which the astronomers say. Efenus very skilfull, and learned in this science, taught by astronomicall numbers, that the sunne went vnder Aries, and the Moone vnder Libra, when the sunne failed at full moone, and at that time the Iewes according to their custome celebrated the feast of passeouer. Moreover Phlegron one most excellent in reckoning the Olympiads, in his thirteenth booke testifieth, that in the fourth yeere of the two hundred and second Olympiad there was an eclipse of the Sunne, much greater then all those that had euer before hapned, at which time was the passion of Iesus Christ. And for the going backe of the sunne in Ezechias reigne, as also that which we reade of the deluge of waters, with many other miracles contained in holy writ, the auncient memorials of the Persians, and Chaldeans do make notable mention thereof. And thence cometh it that the Persian priestes do celebrate the memorie of the triple Mithras, that is of the sunne (as Denis and Strabo witness) which at the foresaid time appeared to performe a triple course, or to stay three times, from his accustomed progesse into the west, retyring againe into the east by a new kinde of returne for ten howres, and then returning againe into the west. I leaue, for this point, the other witnesses Philosophers, Gentiles, Chaldes, Egyptians Phenicians, Greekes, the Sibelles, and many Historians brought for prooue of the supernatural effects of omnipotent God, by Iosephus, Aristobulus, Tertullian, and Eusebius, whereof each by their writings may sufficiently instruct. And if authority doe ought auaille in disputation, let then the deposition of so many Sages preuaile in this point, in a matter that Aristotle and his fautors deny in wordes onely. Most prudently certaine doth Anicen thinke that motion is neither necessary, nor violent, but in a meane betwixt both, in such sort, that it euer retereth at the pleasure of the Prince. And therefore it must bee graunted that the second causes are so alligated to the first cause, that they doe nothing but as the other commands them. And yet it so gouerneth those things which it hath created and ordayned, that it permitteth them to performe their ordinary proper motions. Now because that it seldome hapneth to the contrarie, and that the order of their first institution perseuereth in many things, and that most commonly: therefore did Aristotle iudge that it was naturall, and necessarie. For as he saith in his treatise of natural hearing, [That is naturall which commeth to many, & oftentimes:] And so could he make no farther search by sensible things. But the operations of God, and the alliance of things here below, with the first cause may not be searched out by discourse of reasons, but must rather, as we have declared, be learnt in oracles. Thus is conuincied of nullitie, the progresse which is deduced from necessitie, appearing in the effects, to the necessitie of the cause: because that necessitie of the effects dependeth vpon the order established by the first cause. And the effects also are not needefull because they are all particular: for the worke of nature is not bounded by the vniuersall All, but by each particular which the Peripateticks themselves do rather nominate contingence, then necessarie. But because the most subtile Philosophers do yet debate, that they be eternall, and that most needefull is the coherence of the subiect, with the worker, in which the proper essentiall, or the quidditie, (as they terme it) is named of the subiect: we may render them an other reason for this pretended necessity: to wit, the correspondence of things with the exemplaries or eternall Ideas, celebrated by Plato, and defended by many sage and great personages, as hath already beene shopen. For his cannot consist, considering that the vniuersall is a simple essence, which produceth nothing by the second causes, nor by the spirits, nor by nature, but only by himselfe: and also the first cause of all things created, before ever any soule, or any heaven, or any other particular thing, whatsoever was produced. To returne therefore, from whence we strayed, the effect ensueth the ordinance, and immutable order of the supreme cause, if by the same it be not otherwise instituted. And whereas the Philosophers adde farther, that the will of God hath equall perfection with the thought, which operateth of necessitie: wee confesse that it taketh place, but it is in regard of the worke within himselfe, whereby hee engendreth eternally, the perfect image of himselfe, his word, the absolute Idea, and true patterne of all things. But we say, that he displayeth according to his good pleasure the outward effects, that from everlasting the diuine thought hath described in the word. Surely I wonder at the Sages of the world, who acknowledge that God is most simple, and of himselfe most perfect, all other strange thing set a part, and yet presently (as if they had forgot their doctrine) thinke that God hath a needfull bond with things heere below, as if hee could not subliste without them, nor yet be blessed. And how is he most simple, if hee hath a necessary bond with other things? How is he prince of all things, if he be obliged to the seruice of the most basest? What dignitie, or what condition hath hee of a soveraigne gouernour? Briefly to conclude this matter, let vs take away all necessity from the Lord in regard of this round frame: and let vs not doubt that the order of this Vniuers shall decay, or be destroyed; if it be so, that the creator doth dispose, and vary it at his good pleasure: for he doth know euer to direct in order, that which he hath once made, and ordayned. For none neede to feare the spoile of the worke, when the workmaster sets his hand thereto, by whose handling it is rather made perfect, then any whit marred. But yet before, we take any other subiect, we must first heare of AMANA, the reasons which declare that God proceeded of free-will to his worke.

By the necessity of effects one must not conclude the necessity of the cause.

God hath produced all things by himselfe.

Of the reasons which conclude, that God proceeded of free and franke deliberation to the worke of the world. Chap. 10.

AMANA. Although that by our precedent discourse wee may easily iudge, (such as mainetaine that God of eternitie did by necessity his outward worke) worthy rather to be despised then refuted, being against the doctrine of diuine oracles: yet we will runne over a few points, by which they themselves shall be pearced with their owne darts. I would therefore first, desire them to tell me from whence come the monsters in nature? They may say, that this proceedeth either by defect, or super-abundance of matter: or else because that the qualities answer not in due proportion; or through corruption of the containing part, and such other considerations, which are subdiuided by Physitions into their species. But let mee aske them, if that the naturall causes worke necessarily, why doe they not performe euery thing duly, seeing nature (as they say) wanteth nothing in necessariethings? How then doe naturall causes worke of necessitie, when they faile? They may answer, that I would thereupon conclude, that they worke by contingence, which if I said, what might follow thereon? But to leaue all superfluous debate, let them remember remember, that it is an olde sentence vsed in the schooles, that a thing is said to be necessary in two sorts: the one absolutely necessary, and the other conditionally necessary. Wherefore we attribute the first to God alone, and the other to his creatures: so as we call them necessary according to the order appointed by the supreme creator. Which if the Philosophers deny, we will vrge them with the worke it selfe of these causes. For it is certaine, that if they be faultie, and produce monsters, it commeth to passe, because that order which is deliuered them by nature (as they say) or rather of the soueraigne creator (as truth is) doth faile them. Now if they faile of the order, it then followeth, that it was not simply necessary for them, but given by the first cause, through vertue whereof, the rest subordained vnder it do work: from which if the first withdraw it selfe, they do not only faile, but become nothing at all. And if they may seeme to performe any thing of necessitie; this commeth vnto them by reason of the law, which hath been given them by the Prince of Nature: who giuing lawes to others, is no whit for that thereto himselfe obliged. They may reply, that if our doctrine might stand, there should be no certaintie of science, considering that it should consist of things, which otherwise might be: whereto Aristotle doth make deniall. But wee answer, that if hee intendeth that those things which are knowne should bee necessary according to the order of the vniuers: the like may enlue in those things, which may happen contrary to the order, according to the disposition of the eternall will. Now if they finde too great difficultie herein for their capacite, what need we care? Let them selues (if they thinke good) vnloose the knot. For fire may well be without burning, as indeed it hath bin, as we haue heard in the former speech. And likewise euery effect may be separated from the cause, which hath produced it: yet neuerthelesse the bond remayning, by a certaine correspondencie, betweene the worker and the subiect (that wee may vse schoole termes.) But proceeding farther, I would faine learne of these Peripatetickes, whence it is, that things haue a necessarie couenant. They will say that it is by nature, as they prooue by experience. But what is this their nature? Nothing truly, but the author of the Vniuers, which is the true spirit not erring: seeing that (as they teach) the worke of nature, is the worke of the intelligence not erring, and by the ordinance whereof, all things haue a due course. For there is nothing but serueth this supreme worker. [He stretcheth out (saith the prophet) the heauens like a curtaine. He looketh on the earth, and trembleth, he toucheth the mountaines, and they smoke.] But these naturalists may say (what haue we to dowith prophets, seeing we hold that none can haue perfect knowledge, but in those things, which are proued by demonstration? And from whence fetcheth demonstration his original? Is it not from those principles, whose termes being known we accord to them, or proue them by experience? Now if we beleue demonstrations, by principles, and experiences, it then followeth that there bee some things more certaine then demonstrations. Oh execrable vice growne olde amongst our people, that hauing had this happines to be enrolled in the number of Christians, yet receiue nothing for truth, and certaintie, if it be not prooued by such demonstrations as Aristotle hath declared, and wherewith (for all that) he is but little aided in his discourse concerning nature. For herein he proceedeth alwaies by those maximes that he taketh to be confessed: so that the demonstration whereto his disciples giue beleefe, is nothing else but a consequence drawne from the place of authoritie, or from the foundation by him supposed. Wherefore let vs rather beleue the holy scripture, which instructeth vs, that many things, and especially diuine, are known through the beames of supernaturall illumination and by the couenant of the holy word without vnderstanding touched by the truth. Let Epicures and Atheists then maintaine how they list from Aristotle. That to knowe, is to vnderstand by demonstration. For vs it is sufficient to hold our instructions from the prophets taught by the diuine oracle: who by miracles, and prodigies, and great sacraments, approoue (as we haue already heard) that which they teach. And if we say that knowledge is an vnderstanding by any thing, wee may take our selues to bee wise in beleeuing the doctrine of the holy Ghost, not any whit accounting of the Peripateticks, who haue onely kindled the light of their contemplation by the moouing formes of the vniuers, and haue not bene able, with a pure cogitation, to contemplate him, who possesseth the highest degree of dignitie amongst all essences, as their soueraigne prince, and gouernour: hauing in the rest, rather giuen an artificiall shew, and base manner of proceeding, then any science. And this is that which priuily their Master confesseth, when he entreateth of the last Analyticks, or Resolutions, saying, that Science is of demonstration, and demonstration of the quiddities; as he nameth it, and by the proper differences of things to vs vnknowne. thereupon it followeth, that the principles of demonstration are vnkowne, and that from them one may bring, no whit, or very little demonstration. But resuming our principall point of the free, and franke will of God in his worke, begun in time, wee will argue more lively thus. [Seeing that the parts of this vniuers, are so disposed, that without any contrarietie, or contradiction, they might have beene otherwise ordered, it followeth, that they are contingent, and not ordained of necessitie, but of free will.] Anerrois saith: [We confesse not that the parts of the world could be altered, because the world is an animal.] But I answer, in what place of Aristotle learnt he this manner of disputing? Hee will that this authority should be for a principle of demonstration. Moreover from whence draweth he the consequence? Let him tell me, if the world be an animal, whether is it sensible or insensible? If it be void of sense, then is it no animal. If it be sensitive: doth it see then? doth it heare, doth it smell, doth it taste, doth it eate? But say we confesse the world to be an animal (as it seemeth that Plato, and many other Sages would affirme) surely it is no animal, contained vnder the kinde of animals. For all things in this frame are diuided by all philosophers into a former diuision, before you come to the animal. But let vs confesse that it may be called an animal by some kinde of answerableness and likenes: Wherefore then could not the disposition of the partes thereof be otherwise ordained? Why should it be disagreeable for man, to haue onely one eye in his forehead, as it is reported of some? Why could it not be made, to the other creatures, the vpper iaw mouing, and the vndermost firme, as the crocodile alone hath? Why hath not sundry beasts two knees, like the camell? Surely these, and such like things haue bin so disposed by the soueraigne creator, that without any contradiction, or contrarietie, might haue bin otherwise ordained, if wee presuppose not the condition of the nature specified, such as the creator himself, hath according to his wil perfixed. But let vs farther proceede concerning the animal the world. By what necessitie hath sea bin in such fort disposed, that the ocean should passe through the narrow straights of Abila and Calpe (high mountaines, which antiquitie called Hercules pillars?) What need is there that from thence it should spread it selfe in length and bredth? That then it should stretch it selfe into the Tuscan, or Tirrhene sea? afterwards gathering it selfe into the Adriaticke gulph, then enlarging it selfe into the Siriacke sea, so running about by the Egean (which for the beaustious number of isles therein contained, is named the Archipelagus, or princeesse of seas) & from thence shrinking betweene most narrow passages the Helespont is made? And againe the Proponticke where it dilateth it selfe, and where againe it is straightened, is called the Thracian Bosphorus? Then this Ocean being once againe widened, there is made the sea Euxine, that is to say the host, since the manners of the barbarous nations haue beene polished, and made ciuill, for it was first called Axenes, that is the inhumane host, because of the cruell, and fiercenature of the dwellers there about: And againe mixing it selfe with the lake of Meotis, that it named of the Cimmerian Bosphorus? what need is there also why Nilus passing by the Ethiopians, and Arabians into Egypt: and Tanaïs passing through the one and the other Scythia, and running almost into the midst of the lake of Meotis, should distinguish and separate the three parts of the world? And by what other needfull ordinance is one part of the earth laid low in vallies, another stretched out into plaines: this part raised vp in hillocks, that lifted vp the lofty mountaines; and that the foulds and ever-running fountaines and streames doe flow in their seasons? Of what necessitie also are some beasts of the earth fruitfull, others barren? these drie, and those moist? Might not we easily (without any contrariety or repugnancy) imagine all the circoite of the earth to be plaine, soft, and bearing fruit? And if God can performe that which we cannot thinke, as all the Sages who haue beleueed in him do affirme, why can he not do that which we may imagine? Which if he can easily performe, these things then are not of necessitie, no otherwise then of eternitie, disposed in such sort as wee see them, but according, and how, and when it hath pleased the soueraigne creator of them. Now ynough is said of these things: we must further proceed in the consideration of Gods works, wherein will greatly aide vs, the vnderstanding of one onely principall and prime cause of the Vniuers; that wee may afterwards comprehend the marvellous effects thereof. And therein (ARAM) let be the subiect of thy discourse.

Of one onely principall, and first cause of the Vniuers. Chap. II.

A R A M. Those, who haue bin commonly called the of Sages the world, haue so much differed in their doctrine, even in the search which they haue made of nature, following the course of their speculations, that amongst them who haue beene nourished in one family, and learned vnder one master, there are great contrarieties, either in doctrine, in manners, in religion, or in the end to which all these things tende. Which is chiefly happened vnto them, by hauing setled the building of the world vpon badde and discordant foundations, affying in their owne powers and inuentions too feeble for so waighty a charge, as by rehearsing some points of their principles, we may easily vnderstand. Thales Milesius supposed, that the water was the beginning of all things: because the members of every liuing creature, seemed to be nourished by water, which as it is placed in the middle of the world, so doth the watry humour abide in the center of the bodies of animals; from whence it ministreth nourishment to all the rest of the members. But his auditor Anaximander was of aduise, that I wot not what infinitesimall, called the boundlesse matter, was the principall subiect, and first of essences, and because that by nature such matter hath neither forme nor quantitie, hee thought that this was the substance of perpetuall generation: in such sort that infinite worlds were already past, and hereafter infinitely to arise. Anaximenes his disciple attributed the causes of all things to the infinite aire. And his hearers Anaxagoras and Diogenes, disagreeing together, one of them would perswade, that the infinite matter woulen with diuers parcels of all sorts and kindes, according to the condition thereof: had beene beginning to it selfe. And the other, that the aire indued also with diuine reason was the matter of things. Leucippus, Democritus and Diodorus affirme, that before all things, there were certen Atomes, or litle indiuidable bodies, some smooth, other sharpe, some round, others partly made of angles, partly turned and pointed, and some crooked, to be perceiued by reason onely, solide, without any vacuity, not ingenerated, immortal, eternall, incorruptible, which mooueth them in an infinitenes, and through an infinitenes that is emptines, which bodies are in number infinite with these two qualities, forme and greatnesse, and that by a chance of aduenture, without constraint of any nature, heauen and earth of them were compoled. Hipparchus Metapontine, and Heracitus the Ephesian said, that fire was the vnick beginning, because it is the subtile maintainer and sustainer of all bodies, and whereof at first, the heauens were made. And because it is a brightness that mooueth all things by his light, they teach, that in abasing it selfe it was mixed with all things, in such sort that all things were thereof engendred by the meanes of discord and loue. Empedocles for feare of failing, said, that all the foure elements had beene the onely beginning: but that the earth was the matter & first subiect of all, containing the formes and figures of things; which neither the water, aire nor fire could doe. The Poets, following his opinion, attributed the originall of things to Etherian Iupiter, Terrene Pluto, Aerian Iuno, and to Mestis the beginning of the water, who (they said) nourished with her teares the riuers of the earth. Pythagoras mounting higher, then many deeme, esteemed that numbers, and their subiect (that is, the measures and apt proportions, called harmonies and consonancies) were the originall of things; not those numbers which merchants vse, but the formall and naturall, the knowledge of which lies onely hidden in such, as haue learned Philosophy & Theology by numbers. Almeon followeth Pythagoras, saying that the vnity was the effectiue beginning, but the two, or binarie, not finite, was the subiect, and materiall beginning of all multitude. Epicurus in his Philosophy pursuing the steps of Democritus, teacheth the beginnings of things to be corporall, solide, not created, perceiued by vnderstanding onely, eternall, that could not bee corrupted, nor destroyed, nor changed in any sort. To which prime causes, beside the forme and greatnes which his master assigned them, hee also attributeth waight. Socrates & Plato set three principals, God, the matter, & the Idea. Aristotle affirmed for the first, Entelechie, or the kind, the matter & priuation; although he had otherwise taught the equiuocatiōs, as is priuation, not to be numbred among the principles. Zenon appointeth for the first, God, & the matter; so that he is the actiue, & it the passiue, & the foure elements meanes bewecne. But on this part we may note, that amongst all those, which haue taught that the matter was the principall subiect, we haue one alone, who telleth vs, whether it hath bin created by the blessed God, or whether this nature pliable, and deprived of all beauty together with God hath made the world: or else if, void of all fashion, it hath been coeternall wise and companion of Demogorgon, father of the Gods (as Poets faine) or if like a Pallas, it hath been borne of Iupiters braine. Certainly our minde can find no repose when we finde a nature deprived of all power and all forme, without the maker and Creator thereof. Now who, or what he hath been, we haue none of these Philosophers, that can relate vnto vs. Very well see we that they agree very ill together, in the doctrine of the principles and foundations of the world, which doubtles happened vnto them, because they did stray very far off from the vnity, master of all verity, in whom they should all haue met, and yet euery one went a seuerall way, following the inventions of their naturall speculations, temerariouly presuming by their owne proper powers to manifest that, which God would rather haue kept close, and hidden; to wit, the nature of celestiaall things. And thence cometh it that their teachings founded on the confused multitude, were dissolved and vanished, after (I say) that they were so seuered from the vnity, which giueth to all essences the power to be, and harmoniously to accord.

But they, who confesse one God creatour of all things, and acknowledge him for the true source and fountaine, from which all the waters of eternall sapience do flowe, all vnited in profession of pietie, religion, and doctrine, Hebrewes, Chaldees, Greeks and Latins, doe all together giue praise to this God alone, father of the Vniuers, planting the foundations of this mundaine habitation with an harmonious concord. For Moses, Iob, Dauid, Salomon, Esay, and all the other prophets, Euangelists, Apostles and disciples of Iesus Christ, & all those whom he hath made worthy to entreat of diuine mysteries: all with one voice do teath vs, one onely and prime cause of all formes, and that alone, to be the maker of the matter, and moderatresse of all nature. To which doctrine agree all the ancient, and moderne doctors of the Christian church, hauing the rule of holy letters so fixed and bounded, that they doe not crosse themselves in any point, because they haue settled the foundations of all things in the onely and true author of all wisdom. And vpon the same principles innumerable persons of great erudition, and laudable life, diuersly dispersed into contrary climates, according to the course of times and different languages, haue enterprised diuers workes of a diuine consonancie, & all to one end, to cause acknowledgement of God, creator of heauen and earth. Which coulde in no wise haue beene done, if all these excellent men had not beene illuminated with one selfesame diuine vnderstanding (as the Platonists call it) or with one selfesame holy spirit (as our doctors teach) which maketh all such as dwell in the house of God to be of one minde, and endueth all of them with one heart, and one soule, and therefore also all the ancient Prophets, and blessed Ambassadors of Iesus Christ, being replenished with his spirit, despising the vaine babble of Philosophers schooles, and all contentious disputations, haue proposed their teachings, with such and so great constancy, though they had to deale with Princes, and people learned and vnlearned, that they haue confirmed them for truth, by sanctity and splendor of life, and by many myracles, yea with their owne blood. And our doctors (imitating this doctrine) lightned and illustrated with the same spirit, haue acknowledged God the only, and very beginning of all things, the free Creator & supreme fountaine from whom all verity, and vertue floweth. Amongst which doctors, foure Greeks and foure Latins shall sing in the litle quire of God like the bases, and fundaments of our Theology, according with the foure Disciples of our Lord, who deliuered the Euangelicall elements in Canticles sweetly distinguished, and yet in agreeable consonancy. For S. Hierome and S. Chrysostome shall vnloose the knottie heads of the holy letters: the one and the other Gregory, to wit, the Romane and Nazianzene, shall pursue the diuine sense, closed and couered vnder the barke of the Letter. Damasceus with S. Ambrose shall remaine in the graue sentences, and allegorical sense. And S. Augustine with Basil shall mount vp in the anagogicall song, to resound the supreme accents of the celestiaall harmony. And for the other celebrated persons, who preceded these men till the time of Saint Hierome, he in the booke of excellent men numbred an hundreth thirty seuen, who were knowne by their writings. To whom Gennade minister of Marcellus, addeth ninetie and one, who haue beene followed of many others till the time of Peter the Lumbard: who emulating Damasceus in reduciag and distinguishing into foure volumes the Theologicall doctrine, hath giuen faire matter for posteritie to dispute vpon. that this point leaueth no doubt, but constraineth euery one to acknowledge that al of the haue bene illuminated, and taught by the soueraigne doctor and supreme brightnes from which all truth and light doth issue. For likewise he alone the eternall God containeth the source of veritie vnable to be emptied, out of which it behooueth vs to exhaust so many, and often times; as we pretend to giue true instructions, and agreeable to the mystries of his omnipotency; because there is no knowledge of the separated substances, of the secrets of nature, and of God the author thereof, which hath not bene diuinely reuealed. For diuine things are not touched with our hands: and the worldly flie from our senses euery moment from whence it cometh; that that which Philosophers call wisdome & certaine science, whether concerning celestiall, or naturall things, is nothing els but error, or at least, a thicke obscuritie. But we know so much, as the pure bright, and cleare vnderstanding, placed in the point of mans soule, doth behold, by meanes of supernaturall light in the mirror of eternitie, wherein we contemplate God, the father and creator of this Vniuers. And when the Philosophers shall confesse him such, as nature teacheth, religion perswadeth, and reason proueth him, then may they concur with the truth, in that which they declare of the elements of the world, fire, aire, water, and earth, and of the nature of things, as hereafter we must discourse. But first we will beginne to enter into some consideration of the precious treasures and learned instructions, wherewith the sacred wordes of Moses (by vs heretofore heard) concerning the creation are fruitfully replenished, and namely, in the space of the fixe daies, which hee describeth for perfection of this great humane building; as I referre to you (A C H I T O B) to giue vsto vnderstand.

Of the space of the fixe daies mentioned in the historie of the creation of the World. Chap. 12.

A C H I T O B. IF we hold for certaine and vndoubted, the fabrication of the Vniuers, as we haue in all our precedent discourse sufficiently proued: then must wee confesse that it is new and made in time, according as holy writ teacheth vs, and all Mathematicians confirme, when by the Genesis of the world they prognosticate the euents that should succede. We haue already made mention of the time, since which, we hold the creation thereof: now must we consider the space of daies which are mentioned by Moses in recitation of this Master-piece of worke of the Almighty, wherein the Prophet hath concealed a mystrie of high, and difficult vnderstanding. For as S. Augustine saith, The fixe daies wherein God performed his works, and the seuenth wherein he ceased; in what sort and maner they are, is very difficult, or rather impossible for vs to thinke, much more to expresse. For the daies which we haue now, haue their euening and morning, the setting & rising of the Sun: and the three first daies whereof Moses speaketh, passed without the Sunne, which was created the fourth day. Hereof therefore grow profound and deepe questions, and principally this, [Whether all things haue been created together, or in the space of diuers daies?] It seemeth that S. Augustine made no doubt that all was not created in a moment: seeing hee saith, (speaking of the creation of the Angels, made the first day) that the second day, nor the third, nor all the rest, were any other then the first day: but that the same one was repeated, to make vp the number of fixe or seuen, for the works of God, and his repose. In another place he speaketh thus, [In the seuenth day, that is, the same day repeated seuen times.] There haue been also diuers ancient doctors that haue taught the like, satisfying themselves with this text of the Wiseman, saying, [Hee that liueth for ever, made all things together.] They also shewed these reasons, [All power finite and limited hath neede of time to worke in, but not the infinite, as that of the soueraigne Creator: and forasmuch, as by an intelligible and eternall word (which Saint Basil interpreteth, the moment of the will of God) all things had their beginning; there is no reason, why there should be any delay for the creation of the light after the darkenes, which was vpon the deepe (as the Prophet declareth) & whereof the euening & morning of the first day were made: or els of the heauen till the second day: the budding forth of the earth, till the third: the production of the Sun, Moone, and Stars, till the fourth: the gathering together of the waters, till the fift: and to sixt the forming of man.] For these reasons (I say) many great personages would conclude that heauen and earth, and all things therein contained, were created at one instant, charging those which thought otherwise, to doe great wrong to the Almighty and soueraigne Creator (to whom all things are of eternitie presented) to suppose that hee should operate by tract of time, and succession of daies: he (I say) to whom eternitie is both the measure and possession together. They alledge also, that the Prophet repeating the creation which he seemed to haue distinguished by daies, said thus in the second of Genesis. [These are the generations of the heavens and of the earth, when they were created, in the day that the Lord God made the heavens and the earth; and every plant of the field before it was in the earth, and every herbe of the field, before it grew:] Whereby (they say) doth evidently appeare that all things were created together. And for that the principall members of this mundane body, are said to haue beene ordained and engendred separatly, that that must be vnderstood to haue beene so expounded, according to the order, through which man (for whom all things haue beene made) is very properly induced as the last worke of God: according to the common saying of the Peripatetiks, [That that which is the first in intention, is the last in execution: but the meanes betweene keeping a like order, do succeed from the first to the last.] By such reason therefore the diuision of daies mentioned in Genesis must be referred, not to the time, but to the order, which is to be considered in the producement of things created. Thus much for their opinions. But others contend to the contrarie, and maintaine that God hath distinguished the creation of the world by certaine degrees and course of daies, according as Moses describeth them, to keepe vs the more attentue, and to constrain vs to abide in the consideration of his works. For it is most certaine that we passe lightly ouer the infinite glory of God, which shineth vnto vs here below, and the vanity of our vnderstanding doth willingly cary vs away. To correct which vice, his diuine bounty would temper his works to our capacitie. And they which hold this opinion haue noted, how the text before cited out of Ecclesiasticus, wherein this word (together) is read, is not properly so in the Greeke copie: But the Greeke word signifieth (likewise) or (in common,) and hath relation not to the time, but to the vniuersalnesse and community of creatures. Now to reconcile these diuers opinions, methinketh we may say, that for the matter, and rich seed of all the beauties and riches of the Vniuers, it hath beene created of God all in one moment; but that afterward hee gaue forme to it, taking out of them the works, which he did in the fixe daies. For thus the Prophet speaketh, [God in the beginning created the heauen and the earth. And the earth was without forme, and voide, and darkenesse was vpon the deepe, and the spirit of God moued vpon the waters.] Behold then the matter of this All, which had his being all at once: the Chaos, the Embryon, created of nothing, which was to take forme, figure, place, and abiding according to the order and disposition of all his parts, and which in the meane while was sustained by the secret power of God. Afterward when Moses addeth, [Then God said, Let there be light, and there was light. And God saw the light that it was good; and God separated the light from the darkenes: and God called the light day, and the darkenesse he called night. So the euening and the morning were the first day.] In this (I say) and in all the rest which ensueth, concerning the works of God in the fivie other daies, is shewed vnto vs the forme that God gaue to the matter in the space of them: creating and forming all creatures celestial and terrestrial contained in the whole Vniuers. See then how wee may resolute this question, [Whether all things were created together, or in diuers daies?] and thus wee may reconcile their sundry opinions.

Let vs further note, how Saint Augustine accustomed to mount (as wee haue said) with the wings of contemplation vnto the Anagogicall sense, discoursing vpon this point, concerning the light, which was said to haue beene created the first day, with euening and morning, three daies before the Sunne; confesseth freely, that it is farre remote from our sense, what light this is, and by what alternate motion, the euening and morning were made: and he vseth this disiunctiue question [whether it were some corporall light (that is some light-some body) in the highest parts of the world farre from our sight: or else a light without bodie, in some place, whereat the Sunne was shortly after kindled: or else by the name of light, was signified the holy Citie of Angels and blessed spirits, whereof the Apostle saith, Hierusalem which is above, is the eternall mother of vs all in the heauens.] Therefore in another place also this great Doctor of the Church referreth the euening and morning, to the science and knowledge of Angelical thoughts, calling it morning, when by the view of things created knowne in themselves (where there is darkenesse, and most deepe night) these blessed spirits aduancethemselues in the loue of God. And if louing and contemplating him, they they acknowledge all things in him (which knowledge is much more certaine, then if one should view them indirectly) then is it day. But it is evening, when the angel turneth himselfe from God to things created, regarding them not in him, but in themselves. And yet this evening cometh not to night, because these angelicall thoughts neuer preferre the workes before the workeman; neither haue them in greater estimation, for so should it be most profound night. Behold then, how deeply Saint Augustine doth discourse in this place concerning the evening and morning. But for the place before cited concerning the point of the light, hee referreth the same termes, evening and morning, to the condition of our soule. For he saith, that that, which it can know and vnderstand in comparison of the knowledge of God, is like an evening, and that yet when it is bent to praise and loue the Creator, then doth it returne to morning. And for the distinct daies, concerning the workes of God, he applyeth them likewise to the orderly and perfect knowledge of things produced: saying thus, [When the minde stayeth in the knowledge of it selfe, then is there one day: when in the acknowledgement of the firmament, which betwixt the water beneath and above, is called the heauen; then is the second day: if concerning the earth, the sea, and all things fructifying, which keepe themselves in the rootes of the earth, there is the third day: and when it stayeth in the acknowledgment of the lights, both the greater and lesser, and of the starres; there is the fourth day: if of the creatures which liue in the waters; there is the fifth day: if of terrene things, and man himselfe; there is the sixth day.] And thus doth this good father trauell to discover the great mysteries closed and concealed vnder the couert of Moses words, which in the relation of his historie he doth most vndoubtedly apply to the capacitie of the rude and common people, with whom he had to deale, deliuering to the wise and more learned enough wherewith to satisfie their mindes. But without farther disputing about this present matter, wee may note, that in the creation of the light, wherewith the world was to bee adorned, was the beginning of forme given to the matter of the world, and of the distinction of creatures. Yea in that the light did precede the Sunne and Moone, which were created but the fourth day; God would thereby testifie that in his only hand light is residant, and that hee can conferre it vpon vs without any other meanes. For we are so enclined, as nothing more, to alligat the power of God to those instruments and organes, wherewith he serueth himselfe; because that forasmuch as the Sunne and Moone doe minister light vnto vs, we will willingly assigne to them, according to our fantasie, such vertue that if the world were deprived of them, we might hope nothing but darkenesse. Wherefore the Lord in this order of the creation cauleth vs to see the contrary, and how it is in him, and by him, that the light subsisteth. Now of ydd (A S E R) we may heare of some excellent mysteries concealed vnder the number of the daies of this mundaine fabrication.

Of the mysteries hidden vnder the number of fixe in the creation of the Vniuers: and of the seuenth day of rest. Chap. 13.

A S E R. THat all things consisted in numbers, and that there was neede of the knowledge of them to conceiue the sacred misteries of God and nature; Pythagoras, Plato, and all other Academicks haue laboriously taught. But they haue spoken so superstitiously & so obscurely concerning the myserie in these numbers, that it seemed, they would euen conceale them from those, who were deuored to the study of their doctrine. Plato speaketh thus in his Epinomide, [If wee take away number from the nature of men, we leaue them no whit prudent, nor capable of science: for the minde can comprehend and vse, of nothing without reason, and none can render a reason for any thing, that is ignorant of numbers.] The arts likewise, this set apart, would altogether perish.] Hee assureth vs also, that number, (to wit the vnitie which is God) is cause of all good, but of none ill. And he calleth mans soule a number, and reasonable measure, by which we measure all things, which may be vnderstood and put in practise by vs, to the end that in our works we may eschewe all error, folly and deformity. Now not onely the Philosophers, but also many great personages, Christians, both Greekes and Latins do testifie vnto vs by their writings, that there bee many mysteries in numbers: Amongst whom Saint Augustine speaketh thus, [The reason of numbers is not to be despised of vs, which how much it is to be esteemed in many texts of Scripture is apparant to those, which marke it diligently. And it hath not beene spoken in vaine to the praise of God: [Thou hast ordered all things in number, waight, and measure.] Now hereupon we must note, that the number, waight and measure, where- by all things haue been numbred, poised and measured, subsist not properly in the things created; no more then the measure by which the cloth is parted into elles, or the weights, wherewith every thing is weighed: or the number, by which all things are counted, doe consist within the things measured, poised, or numbred: but are doubtlesse without them. So then we contemplate the number, waight and measure, by which God hath disposed all things, out of the creatures. And forasmuch as there is nothing, besides all things produced, but God, it is necessary, that in him should consist their number, waight and measure. In him then is the waight without waight, for by it the great worker is not poised, but remaineth stable, giuing all things the power to be mooued, and at last to repose themselves. And in truth, this frame of the whole world duely proportioned, and ballanced by waight, could not sustaine it selfe, if it were not poised by the Creator and Governor thereof; who likewise hath the measure by which he moderateth and disposeth all that is contained there- in, in well ordered iustice, according to the state and proper end of every of his works. And in him also are the numbers without number, because that all things which are in him, are the same onely God. And as he is the true vnitie, hee containeth in himselfe all number, giuing all things the power to be numbred. For all multitude ariseth from one, and no- thing can be one, making with any others a multitude, if by the participation of the highest one it doth not obtaine the state of vnitie. And to it also all things created (imitating the course of numbers, as the true patterne doth the originall, and the end of Gods workes) en- deauour to returne, in such sort as they first proceeded.

of sixe full of deepe mysteries.

Genes. 2.

We neede not doubt then, but that the consideration of numbers doth therewith im- port much doctrine. Wherefore particularly respecting the distinction of the works of the Vniuers in sixe daies (which is the subiect of our discourse) we will note how many haue acknowledged the number of sixe to be full of deepe mysteries. First therefore Mathema- ticians teach, that sixe is the first perfect number, because it is compounded of certain parts perfectly added together, as of one, two and three: for which cause it is called of the Py- thagorians (Gamon) or the Marrying number, because all the parts thereof set aside doe make it vp. Moreouer some parts of it multiplied together, to produce it: as sixe times one, threetimes two, twotimes three. In this consisteth the perfection of the number, which is accomplished by all his parts: and but few such haue beene found out by Arith- meticians. For within the number of an hundred they haue obserued but that of twenty eight, to which they haue attributed such propertie: because it consisteth of foureteene feuen, foure, two, and one: as within the number of tenne, there is but that of sixe which is accomplished by all his parts. Saint Hierom entreating of this number where he writeth vpon Ezechiel saith, that it containeth the sacrament of creatures. And in troeth there could not be inuented any number more proper for the making of the world, then this of sixe, which consisteth of a double proportion that it doth next containe in it selfe: (to wit) of foure with two, which numbers added together make sixe: which can hardly be found in other numbers, but such as are of the nature of sixe: as the double, trible, quadruple, or square thereof, and such like. So then sixe resulteth of that double proportion which makes the diapason in Musicke, which is the perfectest and most entite harmony of all the con- cords. For which it seemeth that Pithagoras would apply it to Natiuities and to Marriages, and then it doth consequently very properly fit the Creation of the world, wherein were ce- lebrated the true nuptials and coniunctions of all things. Likewise sixe, the first perfect number cannot but aptly agree to God, the soueraigne and most perfect Creator, or to his worke, wherein there is no defect: And therefore when hee had finished and accomplished his workes in sixe daies, Moses saith, [Thus the heauens and the earth were finished, and all the host of them.] But if we will farther proceed in the the consideration of this number of sixe: we shall see how by the triangled or three-square figure thereof, it doth properly ac- cord with the creation of the world. For the base or foundation is the number of three, the point a vnitie, & the number of two is the meane betweene both, as appeareth in this figure. Now every worke proceedeth from the three persons in the God- head to the vnitie, from which the outward works (performed in time) are vnse- parable: they tend also to an end, to which all things addresse themselves: and the passage to proceede thither, is the number of two, which we may properly attribute to the matter first created created by God, to formethereof all his workes. For the first beginning of the production and order of creatures was the matter, which in respect of number representeth the nature of the binary, and seemeth to be reduced to the vnity, by the forme, which beareth the shape of the trenarie: so that on every side of the premised figure of the number of sixe, the ternary tendeth to the vnity by the binary. And by this consideration wee may make way to the most high contemplation of the number of seuen, attributed to the rest of the Lord. For we make no doubt, that when we shall bee all reduced to the vnity, as wee tooke our originall from it, then shall the rest of the Sabbath ensue, that is figured by the seventh day; wherein it is said, that God ceased from his workes: and which shutteth vp and closeth the course and circle of all daies. Now that this number of seuen hath bene much reuerenced by men of ancient times, we haue many witnesses. For the Iewes because of the Sabbath (as Saint Hierome writeth vpon Esaie) did honour it much. And Aulus Gellius and Adacrobins, vpon the dreame of Scipio, doe shew great mysteries out of this number of seuen, which they call full and perfect, and attribute great power to it, in the sea, and amongst men. And the Pithagorians (as saith Chalcidius) commended it for the best, most naturall, and most sufficient number. Moreouer, it is composed of three, which is the first vneuen number, that cannot bee divided by any numbers (for vnity is no number, though it giueth all numbers the power to be numbred) and of foure, which is a full euen number, and the first double number of all others. For this cause the number of seuen is oftentimes vsed for vniuersall and generall, and to signifie perfection. As it is written, [The iust shall fall seuen times a day, and shall rise againe] that is, how often, or how many times soeuer he falleth, he shall not perish. Againe, [I will praise seuen times a day] which in another place is thus spoken, [His praise is euer in my mouth.] And we may finde many places in holy Scriptures, wherein the number of seuen hath customably bene vsed for the vniuersallnesse of any thing whatsoever, and to demonstrate a perfection, and soe doth Saint John in the Apocalyps, writing to the seuen Churches, and speaking of the seuen Spirits, which are before the throne of God. For it is certaine, that he compriseth there all the vniuersall Church, and proposeth God in his Maiestie, accompanied with innumerable blessed Angels. But among all the great mysteries, which the auncients haue acknowledged to be concealed in the seventh day, by which the rest of the Lord is, recommended after his worke perfected and finished, this is the most notable, by which they teach vs that this Sabbath day signifieth the repose of those which rest in the Lord euen as the ioy of the house betokeneth the ioy of those which reioyce therein, although that not the house it selfe, but something else doe make them ioyfull: and like as (the effect being signified by the efficient cause) an epistle is called ioyfull, to declare the pleasure of those, whom it delighteth by reading thereof. Likewise when the Scripture recounteth, that God rested, we must not take it childishly, as if he (who by an intelligible and eternall worde spake, and it was made) had trauelled in his worke: but vnderstanding by this manner of speech, that God ceased from all worke, because he no more created any new kindes of creatures; we may conueniently referre his rest, to the rest of those, whom he himselfe causeth to remaine in eternall rest, after that he hath first drawne them to himselfe by faith in this life. Whereas also the Prophet hauing made mention in each of the sixe precedent daies of the creation, of euening and morning, doth mention no such matter of the seventh day: it seemeth he would signifie, that this Sabbath day was ordained to represent the great and last day of euermlasting rest, wherein there should be no more any such distinction of euening and morning, nor of day and night, as now is: but altogether light by which we shall contemplate God face to face in true and perfect felicity, such as eie hath neuer seene, eare neuer heard, nor euer hath entred into the heart of man. Which wee must doubtlesse beleue was figured to the Iewes by the rest of the Sabbath commanded in the Lawe: for these names (Rest, and Sabbath) in the Hebrew tongue full of mysteries, signifie both one thing. In which matter we may further note, how the sacred historie declareth, that man was created the sixt day, which was the euen of the Lords rest; for this agreeth well to the principall thing, which the Lord intendeth in his Lawe: to wit, to admonish man, that hee was not placed in the world; but to returne at length to him, who set him there: and to seeke his rest in him. Thus haue we sufficiently spoken of the subiect, which wee first entreated of: for else if we should fully prosecute the mysteries included in the historie of the creation of the world, wee should haue matter enough to make vp a very great volume. Wee will therefore procede to the particular consideration of the famous works contained in the

A M A N A. THe learned & venerable antiquity figureth, and maketh the vniuersall world (to be) one, and threefold, as signifying and representing (though very far off and much behinde) the omnipotent, triple one, most wise, and most good worker, by whom it hath bene created, formed and ordained. For there is the vppermost world of all, which Diuines name, the Angelicall, and philosophers call the intellectuall world: which (as Plato saith) was neuer yet sufficiently praised. Then is there the celestia world, or that of the spheres, which succeedeth and is next the first; and the third and last is the elementary world which we inhabite, vnder the concavity of the moone. Now as this is the world of darknes; so is the Angelicall world the world of light, and the world betwixt both is tempered with light and darknes. The elementary world is designed to vs by the flowing waters, and instable substance: the Angelicall by fire, because of the shining of the light, & elevation of the place: and the heauen of meane nature is called of the Hebrews by a name signifying the same to be composed of water and fire. In this low world life and death strue for mastery, by a kinde of vicissitude, change and rechange all things: but in the highest is eternall life and permanent operation: and in that of the spheres, is certain assurance of life, but there is changing of works and of places. The elementary is built of the perishing substance of bodies: the intellectual of a nature more diuine and excellent: and the meane is compounded of bodies (but incorruptible) and of a disposition convenient for the nature thereof. The third is mooued by the second, and the second is governed by the first; and this remaineth stable in his worke fit for his owne nature, vnder the holy of holies, the Lord God almighty, which was, which is, and which is to come. And it seemeth that our great Prophet, of whom wee haue learnt the creation of heauen and earth, hath evidently described these three worlds in the structure of his marvellous tabernacle. For he deuider it into 3. parts, whereof each doth liuely represent each world: so that the first being not covered with any rooffe or couering, was open and exposed to raine, snowes, windes, sun, heate and cold: (and which hath more reference to our elementary world) in this former part haunted not only men both cleane and polluted, temporall and ecclesiasticall, but also beastes of all sorts: and there was likewise, because of the ordinarie sacrifices and offerings, a perpetuall exchange of life and death. The two other partes of the tabernacle were closed on euery side, and defended from all outward iniury: euen as neither the celestia nor supercelestia world can receiue dammage. Moreouer these two were honoured with the title of holy: yet so, that the most secret was named the holy of holies, and the other simply the holy or sacred. So likewise the sphericall world is holy, because that it perseuering in the order, which was appointed it by the soueraigne creator, hath in it no fault or crime: but the Angelicall is euen the most holy and most diuine, wherein the blessed soules, incessantly resound this song [Thou art woorthy, O Lord, to receiue honour, and glorie, and power; for thou hast created all things; and for thy wils sake they are and haue bene created.] But moreouer, if wee consider how the last part of the tabernacle was common to men and beastes: how the second all shining with the splendor of the gold, was lighted with the candlelicke divided into seuen lampes (which, as many Greeke, Latine and Hebrew interpreters will haue, doe signifie the seuen planets,) and how in the third the most holy were the winged Cherubins: should wee not say that these three partes manifest vnto our sight three worlds? To wit, this which men and all kinde of creatures frequent: the celestia all where the planets shine, and giue light: and the supercelestia which is the dwelling and abode of the blessed Angels, the way to which hath bene opened by the crosse, and bloudshed of our Saviour Iesus Christ, true God & true man, as the vaile of the temple, by which the holy of holies, being a type of the angelicall world, was separated from the other partes thereof, renting and tearing at the death of our Saviour, was a certaine sacrament to vs? For thereby we had assurance, that from thencefoorth was free access granted man to the kingdome dome of God (of God, I say, who flieth aboue the Cherubins) through the very same entrance, that from the beginning for the sinne of the first man, had beene barred vp by the lawes of iustice.

Thus haue we many notable things concerning the diuision of the vnuerfall world, which we may also call [One,] not onely because the three worlds doe proceede of one onely and selfe cause, and tend to the like end; or else because being duly tempered by numbers, they are ioyned together by an harmonious accord and affinity of nature, and by ordinary succession of degrees: but also because that that which is in all the three is likewise comprised in one of them, and that there is not one wherein all things, which are in the other three, do not remaine. It is most certaine, that that which remaineth in this low world, is in the vpper most of far better stufte: and that which is in those aboue, is seene also in this of farre worse condition, & as it were of a bastard and sophicall nature, for here heat is an elementary quality, in heauen it is an heating vertue; and the Angelicall thoughts, an Idea and exemplary forme. Or to shew this more cleerely; wee haue with vs in this base world the fire, which is an element: the sunne in heauen is a fire in the supercelestiall region the seraphicke, for burning intellect is another fire. But let vs note how much they differ: The element burneth; the celestiall fire quickneth, and the supercelestiall is imbraced by loue. There is also here below water; and so there is another water aboue beeing motresse and mistresse of this belowe, which is the moone, in the first circle of heauen, but the cherubin, or cleere-sighted spiritual substances, are the waters that flow aboue the heauen. And as touching the disagreeable condition among these 3. kinds of waters, the elementary humour quencheth vitall heat: that of heauen nourisheth it: & the supercelestiall hath an intellectuall apprehension of it. Furthermore in the first world, God the first vnitie ruleth ouer the nine hierarchies of Angels, like so many spheres, and remaining immoveable moueth them all vnto him: In the celestiall and meane world the imperial heauen commandeth likewise, as a captain doth his bands, the nine celestiall spheres, in such sort, that though they be moued by continual agitation, yet it remaineth stable by diuine power. So likewise is there in the elementary world, after the first matter being the foundation thereof nine spheres, or circular revolutions of corruptible formes: that is, three of things inanimate, which first are the elements, then their compounds, and thirdly the meanes betweene these two, truly mixed and compounded, but vnperfectly: and such as are the impressions which appeare in the aire. Then are there three revolutions of vegetable nature, distinguished likewise into three kinds, as of herbs, shrubs & wood of old growth. And lastly three other of the sensitiue soule, which are either imperfect (as the Zoophyta) or to speake English [creatures of a middle condition betweene things sensitiue & plants:] or very perfect; but such as are within the bounds of the fantasie not reasonable: & in the third place that which is found excellent in beasts, beeing capable of mans teaching; a mean thing betweene man & beast, as the Zoophyta partaketh of the plant & animal. But it may be we haue said more concerning these things then is requisite for our purpose: I will only therfore adde, that the mutual vicinity & communicatio of the worlds, which we haue here described, is also declared in holy writ. For it is written in the Psalmes, (In wisdom he made the heauens.) And Saint Paul saith of himselfe, that he was rauished into the third heauen, which afterwards he calleth Paradise. We reade also that the Angels of God are spirits, and his ministers a flame of burning fire. And thence without doubt it cometh, that oftentimes to diuine natures are attributed both celestiall and terrestriall surnames: when as sometimes they are figured by stars: sometimes by wheelles and beasts, and sometimes by elements, as we sometimes also appropriate diuine and celestiall names to terrestriell natures. For euen as the the three worlds being girt and buckled with the bands of concord doe by reciprocall libertie, interchange their natures; the like do they also by their appellations. And this is the principle from whence springeth & groweth the discipline of allegoricall sense. For it is certaine that the ancient fathers could not conueniently haue represented one thing by other figures, but that they had first learned the secret amity and affinity of all nature. Otherwise there could bee no reason, why they should represent this thing by this forme, and that by that, rather then otherwise. But hauing the knowledge of the vnuerfall world, and of euery part thereof, and being inspired with the same spirit, that not onely knoweth all things: but did also make all things: they haue oftentimes, and very fitly figured the natures of the one world, by that which they knew to bee correspondent thereto in the others. Wherefore the same knowledge, and the grace of the same spirit is requisite for those, who would vnderstand, and directly interpret such significations and allegoricall meanings. Moreover, besides these worlds, which we have also distinguished, there is also another, a fourth, wherein may likewise be found all that which sublieth in the others. And this is (man) who for this cause as our doctors shew, is vnderstood in the Gospell by the name of every creature, then when Iesus Christ com- mandeth to preach to men the good newes, not to beasts nor Angels, being neuerthelesse enioyned to publish it to every creature. Likewise it is a common vse in schooles to teach, that man is a little world, and that within him the body is composed of the elements, the reasonable soule is celestiall, the vegetable power common to men and plants, the sense common to bruite beasts, the reason participated to Angels: and finally the image of God is therein seene and considered. But of him we have sufficiently intreated in the second part of our Academicall discourses, wherefore of this great vniuersall world must our ensuing talke be. And as we diuided it into three generall parts, so must we particularly discoure of them. First therefore let vs say something concerning the Angelicall and intellectuall world, and of the celestiall intelligences or Angels: (A & A M) shall bee subiect of your discourse.

Open mine eyes you supermundaine spirits (but rather thou, oh father of them) and I shall contemplate the wonder of your citie, wherein God attendeth for those that feare him; that which eye hath neuer seene, eare neuer heard, nor any heart worthily thought vpon. Well I wotte that many call disputations and searching out of the nature, and multitude of angels and their orders, vaine questions, and fit for idle imaginations; but surely they are secrets, which Saint Paul himselfe who had bene rapt vp about the third heauen, hath not onely taught, but hath also protested, that hee had there heard many things, which were not lawfull for him to reueale. And I am likewise of beleefe that the full reuelation of the angelicall, and intellectuall world is deferred till the last day: yet will we here speake soberly thereof, and as briefly as wee can, according to that which diuines haue written, without any waies offending pietie, or christian religion.

2. Cor 12.

Genes. 2.
That the angels are God
his creatures

When the holy Scripture speaketh of the creation of the world, it is not evidently expressed in what order, and how the angels were created. But forasmuch as it is said that God created heauen and all things therein contained, it is most certaine, that therein are comprised the spirits celestiall, as well those that through obedience haue stood in their integrity, as those, who rebelling against God haue bene cast out vnto destruction. Neither is it hereto repugnant that Moses reciting the Genesis or creation of the world, maketh no expresse mention thereof. For wee see how that in silence passing ouer all things, which surmount our capacity; or else couering them vnder the mysticall sense of his words, for those whom God would fully illuminate with the brightnes of his holy spirit, he onely entreateth of those, which we behold with our eyes, yea and that too in familiar and vulgar sort, conforming himselfe to the rudenes of the people, with whom he had to deale. And for this cause hath the opinion of sundry great personages, and namely of Saint Augustine bene, that the angels haue bene signified either by the name of heauen, there where it is said. [In the beginning God made heauen and earth] or else by the name of the light, which he saith was created the first day. But howsoeuer, this is doubtlesse, that the angels are the worke of God. For the holy Scripture doth testifie it in infinite places, with a most cleere voice: and namely in the song of the three children which were in the furnace, who hauing saide (Blesse the Lord all his workes) in pursuite of the narration of them, the angels are also named. And the prophet saith, [You creatures of the heauen praise the Lord, you which are in the high places praise him. All his angels, and all his armies praise him. [Sith also they are the ministers of God appointed to doe that, which he commandeth them (as the apostle to the Hebrews saith) there is no doubt but they are his creatures. Moreover the holy Scriptures teach vs, that they are alwaies watching for our safety: that they are alwaies

ready to defend vs: that they direct our waies, and haue care of vs in all things. And therefore Abraham promised his seruant that the angell of God should bee his guide on the way. And so often and so many times as God would deliuer the people of Israel out of the handes of their enemies, he was serued by his angels to performe this deed as we read that the angell of the Lord slew in one night an hundreth foure score and five thousand men in the camp of the Assyrians, to deliuer Ierusalem from siege. But to stand no longer in so cleere a matter, I will onely adde this, that it is said, that the angels ministred to Iesus Christ after he was tempted in the desert: and that they assisted him in his anguish, at the time of his passions, and that they published his resurrection and his glorious comming.

But to determine of the number and order of Angels, were (me thinketh) aboue all humane power. For Daniell speaking of the Maiesty of the throne of God, saith, [Thousand thousands (of Angels) ministred vnto him, and tenne thousand thousands stood before him.] And David singeth [the chariots of God are twenty thousand thousand Angels.] Saint Iohn also maketh mention of tenne thousand times tenne thousand, and a thousand thousand that giue glory to God: and Iesus Christ himselfe witnesseth that there are many legions. In briebe all the Scripture reporteth of an infinite number of Angels seruing God, whom he employeth in the protection of his elect, and by whom hee bestoweth his benefits vpon men, and doth his other workes. And for their orders, although they be not noted in expresse text of Scripture, yet the different names whereby they are described haue offorded matter subiect to Saint Denis in his celestiall Hierarchie, to Iamblicus in his booke of myseries, and to many other moderne diuines to set downe nine orders & degrees of Angels to wit: The Seraphins, Cherubins, Thrones, Dominations, Vertues, Powers, Principalities, Archangels and Angels: all which are celestiall spirits, to whom the Scripture attributeth such and the like names, according to the ministry wherein God commandeth them to serue, so applying them to our infirmity. For they are called Angels, because God maketh them his messengers to man: and vertues, because that by them God declareth the power of his hand: and Principalities, Dominations, Powers, Signories, because that by them God exerciseth his empire throughout all the world: and his armies, because as souldiers are about their Prince and captaine: so are they present before God, to honor his maiesty and attend his good pleasure, to employ themselves about all things that he giueth them in charge; yea sometimes they are named Gods, because that by their ministerie, they doe as it were in a mirrour represent vnto vs the image of God. And we see that Saint Michael is called in Daniel the great Prince or Captaine: and Archangel in Saint Iude. And Saint Paul saith, that it shall be an Archangell who shall summon the world with a trumpet vnto iudgement. Daniel also declareth that the Angel of the Persians fought, and also the Angel of the Greekes against their enemies: as if he would shew, that God hath sometimes appointed his Angels to bee gouernours of Countries and Prouinces. And Iesus Christ telling how the Angels of infants doe alwaies behold the face of his father, declared thereby that there are certaine Angels who haue them in guard. Saint Peter also being miraculously come forth of prison, and knocking at the house wherein the faithfull were assembled, they that could not thinke that it was he, said that it was his Angel. Yet for all these considerations, I hold it a thing of too difficult enterprise for mortall man to constitute and appoint, which are the degrees of honour among the Angels, and particularly to distinguish one from another by any name or title, and to assigne to every one his place, his abode and office. We will therefore leaue these things for curious heads to dispute vpon. Yet will wee hold our selues ascertained of that, which the holy Scripture doth openly declare vnto vs, and which may best serue vs to our comfort, and for the confirmation of our faith: that is, That the Angels, Gods creatures, are disposers and ministers of his beneficence towards vs: and that such kind of beleefe is a certaine argument against Atheists, concerning the prouidence of God. And for the blessed estate of these celestiall Spirits, it is certaine, that forasmuch as they haue no whit swarued from the light wherein God created them, they remaine in blessednes and felicity) from which they shall neuer more fall. Now if we demaund what this (felicitie) is? Without doubt it is the vision and contemplation of the glory and maiestie of God, whose face (as wee said euen now) they alwaies behold, and to whom they giue praise without ceasing; sing- ing with a loud voice this song, as Esay declareth [Holy, holy, holy is the Lord of Hosts: all the earth is full of his glory.] For there is no good in the reasonable or intellectuall creature, through which it may become happy, but God only. Wherefore the cause of the felicity and happines of the angels, is for that they belong to God in such sort that their nature liueth in

How God

How althings
are in God.

I know well some men be so fantastickall, that they make it a doubt whether there be any angels or spirits. The Sadduces in times past held this opinion, that by the word angell was signified nothing else, but the motion that God inspireth into men, or the power, which he sheweth in his works. But there are so many testimonies of Scripture which contradict this madnes, and histories both ecclesiasticall and prophane are so replenished with wonderfull acts of inuisible spirits, as we daily see come to passe, that it is a wonder how such ignorance could be in former ages, and yet among many remaineth at this day. There haue also beene men of great authority, who discoursing according to the reasons of Philosophy, haue dared to affirme, that God the first father and author of all things did onely produce one intelligence or angell: because, say they, being alwaies of one manner, he cannot by any naturall reason produce diuers things. For this cause therefore they would limite the powerful production of God, to one onely intelligence: which beeing created of God, had recourse to the first thought, whereof it produced the second intelligence: and knowing it selfe, it engendered the soule or moouer of the first sphere, and this moouer knowing also his worke, it proceeded to produce another: and so successiely the cause being varied in substance and operation, diuers effects were produced. Which obscure opinion might haue some colour, if the first and almightie creator were restrained to produce but one effect onely: too absurde a thing to be imagined in the father & author of the vniuers: seeing that not a particular, but an vniuersall effect is answerable vnto him, to wit the world onely, & the entire estate of all things, as we haue heretofore sufficietly declared. And so it followeth, that this vniuers, like a body entire in it selfe, and diuers in the members thereof, was engendered by one onely father and creator, and liues by one onely vniuersall life. But wee will combate against these Philosophers, with more strong weapons, maintaining against them according to the truth, that the soueraigne maker came to his worke without being tied by any naturall law, but free and franke in euery work, as he pleaseth, being abundantly full of all vertue, and of all maner of bounty and essentiall good will, proceeded to his outward work: as these things haue bin declared vnto vs in our precedent discourse. But this by the way, albeit the maxime of the Peripateticks be, (though false) that the first cause worketh of necessity, and that it is alwaies of one sort, which is most true, yet doth it not therefore follow, that it should produce but one effect: seeing that of the sun, which is euer the same, and of the earth, which being stable changeth not, are produced diuers effects, without any variety comming to their nature, yea, and without any tilling of the ground. For herbs, flowers and roots of diuers kinds do grow therein, and many other essences are therein produced by power of the sunne. But if these Philosophers tell me that diuers effects appeare in these things, because that other particular causes doe worke therein together: they haue left the prooffe of this point to their children, to wit, whether this variety proceedeth from diuers causes, or else from the same sunne, fruitfull and full of vertue to engender diuers things. Then with how much greater reason may the first, true & eternall son do it, being abundantly full of all fruitfulness, light & life? For all things were & are in him, not as if they were seated in any local place, but are lodged in his thought, from whence producing them hee is called their father & creator. He only free from the laws of nature without any matter presupposed produceth all things, yea & the matter it selfe altogether full of fertility. But the 2. or naturall cause (as Philosophers speake) requireth the subiect & matter created by God, wherwith it worketh. And here doth that take place which the Prince of Peripateticks saith, [That in comon acceptation of the soule, it is conuenient, that it be made of nothing,] & therefore also our Diuines affirme that the angels can create no nature at all, & that they are creators of things, no more then Gardiners of fruits. And therefore all those, who haue receiued the light of the truth, confesse God alone to bee Father and Authour of all things contained in heaven and in earth: whether spirituall or corporall, visible, or inuisible natures. And let vs neuer thinke that in so great consonancy of the Vniuers, there are many Creatours: nor that there is any more then one onely king and prince, nor many things that consist of themselves. For so should there bee confusion and discordancy in this great world, and so consequently easie dissolution. Thus much haue wee thought conuenient to be knowne, concerning the intellectuall world wherein hauing spoken of the blessed estate of those angels, which are not fallen from God, my minde is, that we say somewhat concerning those who are fallen from their first estate, which we call commonly Diuels or euill spirits. We will heare you then (A C H I T O B) discourse of them.

Of diuels and euill spirits. Chap. 16.

A C H I T O B. I F we here discourse somewhat by numbers, wee shall make more easie way to that, which we would vnderstand concerning the diuels, yea concerning every creature. I say then every number after the vnity, attaineth to be a perfect and accomplished number within it selfe. Now the vnity alone totally simple, doth not passe from it selfe, but therein remaineth in indiuisible & solitary simplicity, because it is most fully content with it selfe, not hauing need of any thing, being full of his owne riches. But every number being by nature a multitude, doth by the benefit of the vnity become simple, because it is capable of simplicity. And although every number the more it departeth fro the vnity, the more it falleth into a great multitude, hauing in it selfe more disagreeablenes, more parts & compolition: yet is there no number how neere soeuer to the vnity, being a multitude and made of vnities, that is one by nature, but by composition. Now if we refer this to diuine matters after the maner of Pythagoras & Plato, we shal say thus: God alone, who proceedeth not from any thing, and from whom all things proceede is an entire, most simple and indiuisible essence, end which deriueth all that he possesseth from himselfe: and by what reason he subsisteth, by the same reason he is wise, he is willing, he is good, and he is iust. And wee cannot imagine any essence, wherof he may consist, but the same being which he is. But all other things are not the same essence, but are through him, and therefore an angell is not this vnity: for so should he be God: or else there should be sundry Gods, which may not bee imagined. For what should be one, but the vnity alone? It resteth then that the angell must be a number, which being so, on the other side it is one in multitude, as every number cometh of the vnity by composition, and every number is imperfect, because it is a multitude, that which is perfect being entirely one. So then the angell being a number, that is, a creature, he is not the same being it selfe, but he is onely an essence, to whom the being arriueth by communication, to the end that he may subsist: Neither is he vnderstanding it selfe, but so he vnderstandeth, as being by a spirituall nature capable of vnderstanding. Those things that betoken imperfection, are incident to the angell, as he is a multitude, or creature. But all that which is perfect & of accoplished forme in him, is by reason of the vnity, wherof it is composed, and which he receiveth, because that he is conioined with God (who is the simple vnity) from whom all being, all life, and all perfection is deriued to the creature. And therefore the Philosophers, as also the wise Hebrewes call the angels (separated intelligences:) because, say they, being separated from the most simple vnderstanding, they receive a certain composition in an essence & vertue, which perfecteth them of a Metaphysicall & supernaturall matter and forme. For this point also, Saint Augustine teacheth, that there is one onely simple good, and therefore immutable, which is God: and that by this good all things haue beene created good, but not simple, and therefore they are mutable. Which is manifest not onely in man, but even in some part of the Angels, as this Doctor of the Church excellently discourseth in the most part of his worke De Cinitate Dei. And these are those, of whom the scripture teacheth, that they haue not remained in the truth: but declining fro their first state haue ouerthrowen themselues, and haue bin made instruments of perdition to many.

But as we heard by our precedent speech some haue beene in this error to beleue, that the good Angels were nothing else, but good inspirations and motions which God gaue men; so there haue beene that thought, that the euill diuels were no other, but euill affections, through the suggestion of our flesh. Yea the impiety of our age hath passed farther: For there are many, which will not beleue that there is any God or deuill. And it is not long since, that certaine talke being moued betweene a Prelate of this kingdome, and certaine others (concerning the diuel) he blushed not to aske them if they had ever seen any one, who had sold him his spectacles, considering he must neede be very old, since (they say) that he came first into the world. Now such contempters of all religion, doe evidently shew their ignorance and beastlinesse. For there was neuer any I will not say Christian, but Eethrike, nor Pagan, endued with any naturall knowledge and faculty of teaching, but hath spoken of diuels and euill spirits, and haue by many writings left to posteritie infinite testimonies cerning their nature & marvellous effects. Yea & the doctrine of the Assyriâs, Arabians, Egyptians, and Grecians confirmeth that, which our most diuine theologie teacheth vs, concerning the euill angels chased from the seruice of God. And amongst other Pherecides the Syrian describeth the fall of the deuils, and saith that Ophis which signifieth the diuelish serpent, was Captaine of the rebellious armie. Trismegistus also the glory of the Egyptians hath touched the same fall. And Homer the most excellent Greeke Poet, and setter forth of mysteries, singeth in his verses the fall of the first rebell, vnder the name of Ate goddess of iniurie and wrong. The Theologie also of the Arabians in imitations of the Hebrew, confirmeth the same, yea the diuels themselves haue oftentimes confessed their own fall: as many writings testifie, and they know, who haue travelled in the searching out of ancients monuments. Wherefore this matter needeth not long disputing, and it is not our intent to satisfie the curious & fantastical of our age, to who nothing is pleasant, saue new doctrine. But pursuing the Christian truth, we say that since the angels haue bin created of God, and the diuels haue beene all created angels, there is no doubt, but they are his creatures, but not of the first condition, wherein they were at the beginning. For they were created good like the other angels and like man, but they haue made themselves euill by their rebellion, pride & sin (like as our first father fell from his native integrity by imitation of them) so that of angels they haue made themselves diuels. And therefore it is written of them, that they haue not persevered in the truth, that is, that they haue not for ever stucke to God, who is the only good of every reasonable or intellectuall creature, as Saint Augustine doth learnedly teach: adding moreover the cause of their fall, when he saith, that the creature which may attaine to the gift of blessednes, can not doe it of it selfe, because it is created of nothing; but it receiveth this benefite from him, by whom it hath been created. Therupon is concluded, that immutable good is no other thing but the true blessed God: and yet that all things which he hath created are very excellent good, because they proceed from him; but yet they are mutable, because they haue beene made not of him (that is of his owne substance, but of nothing. Because then the diuels haue beene created by God, we must vnderstand that they haue not that malice, which now we say is their naturall estate, from their first creation, but forasmuch as they haue deprauid themselves. For that which is damnable in them, they haue gotten it since they turned voluntarily from God. And therefore it is saide that Sathan speaketh of his own when he speaketh a lie; because he abode not in the truth: Whereby it appeareth that he was once in it. And in that he is called the father of lying all excuse is taken from him, so that he cannot impute to God that euill, wherof himselfe is cause. Wherefore as the diuels haue declined from their first estate, God hath not spared them, but hath bound them in the deepe with chaines of darkenes, to reserue them to the iudgement of the great day, who likewise persevering in their first malice and enuy, haue alwaies endeououred and shall continue to the end, to be instruments of perdition vnto men. And therefore all that, which the holy scripture teacheth vs concerning them, tendeth to this point, that we should stand vpon our guards, to resist their temptations, and not to be surprised by their ambushments, arming vs to this effect, with al the armor of God, as Saint Paul doth thereto exhort vs. For he that hath along time iudged them, holds them so with the bridle, that they cannot annoy those which are firme in faith to resist them, nor doe any thing without his will and leaue. But hee maketh them serue for a time measured and prefixed, for scourges as it pleaseth him, in the execution of his iudgements: giving them much power of error in prodigies and miracles, to abuse those which turne from the light of truth, to follow darkenesse and embracelying. And thence spring the Idolatries of the Pagans and inuocations of diuels, which haue caused so many euils to lay hold on man. For the purpose of the diuels hath alwaies beene to make themselves to be serued and honoured of men, to the end that being associated with them, they might likewise bee a most prouoking and effectual cause of the iudgement of God.

And yet how many doe see euen at this day, who make boasts to haue at their command such ministers of iniquitie, whom they thinke to disguise when they call them by the name of familiar spirits? I will not stand here to dispute whether there bee diuers kindes of diuels, or not, as many haue written: But I beleue the word of God, that all of them tend to this purpose, to be hurtfull to men. And though some coniger them by the names of God, and so keepe them bound and chained (as many bragge that they doe) yet are they euer watchfull, till at length they deceiue their masters. I will also beleue that they are not ignorant in ought, which either the reasonable or intellectuall nature can comprehend concerning concerning corporall and temporall things: yea (as S. Augustine saith) by experience of certaine signes vnkowne to vs, they foresee very many things to ensue, more then men doe, and doe sometimes before hand tell the dispositions of them. They are so skilfull, that they said to Iesus Christ clothed with the infirmitie of our flesh. [What haue wee to doe with thee Iesus of Nazareth? art thou come hither to torment vs, before our time?] But (as the same doctor of the Church proceedeth) because they doe not contemplate the eternall causes of times in the wisdom of God, but onely coniecture of temporall things, by the temporall; and of mutable, by the mutable; they are oftentimes deceiued. For they cannot behold the euents of the eternall and immutable decrees of God, which flourish in his diuine wisdom, by such a direct insight as it hath beene giuen to the holy angels: and they see not the thing (if we may terme it so) to which are fastened all causes, and whereupon they turne; neither doe they know the fountaine out of which they spring: wherefore it cometh to passe, that as all things, which are not collected and concluded by their certaine principles; but by erring and estranged coniectures may deceiue; so the diuels are oftentimes beguiled in those signes, whereupon they relie; and tell lies even then, when they thinke themselves most assured to speake truth. But they alwaies tend to this point because of their malignant and enuious nature, to bring all hurt to men, which in the end they cannot auoide, when they forget themselves so farre, as that they wil (against the word of God) take counsell of the diuell: an offence surely worthy of all punishment. Moreover, I doubt not, but as the pure and superiour powers (whom according to the stile of holy writ, wee call the good Angels, which is a word among the Greeks signifying Messenger) doe not commonly suffer themselves to be entreated by euery one, but doe require and attend the cleannes of hart, the holines of life, & the comandement of God: so on the contrary the diuels or euill angels, to who these two names doe properly agree; this last according to doctrine of the Scriptures, and the other Dæmon) of a Greeke word, signifying (to know) they doe make themselves easie, and shew men a kinde of lying fauour, to the end that, drawing to themselves by their craft and subtilty those, who require and seeke their aide in their occasions, they may put God in obliuion, and abandon themselves to be possessed and governed by the diuell, who is their prince. For so in fine it cometh to all those, which serue themselves with these ministers of iniquity: To all Magicians, soothsayers, necromancers, forcerers, witches, and enchanters, with whom the word of God doth expressly charge vs in many places: to haue no communication; commanding also that they should be rooted out of the earth. And what wonders doe they by the aide & helpe of euill spirits; often performing that, which neither art, nor humane vnderstanding can permit to be done? Yet can we no otherwise name all their workes, then very coosenage and illusion: because they doe it, either in apparance onely, or to the hurt and dammage of those, which allow and suffer them. Such were those miracles, as we read in many authors to haue bin done amongst the idols of the gentiles, by the art of the diuels. Of whom Saint Augustine after a long discourse, addeth these words. [What shall we speake of these wonders, saue that wee must flee out of the middest of Babylon? For this propheticall comandement must thus be spiritually vnderstood of vs, to wit; that with the wings of faith, which worketh by charitie, we flee out of the city of this world, which doubtles is the dale of diuels, and of most wicked & impious men. For by how much greater wee see the power of euill spirits in these inferiour things, by so much the more must we most firmly cleaue to our mediator Iesus Christ, by whom wee mount vp from below.] And indeed it is by his grace that we may discerne the spirits whether they be of God, or not; yea that sathan cannot deceiue vs, though he were transformed into an angell of light. Otherwise let vs not doubt, that if we will harken to him, or to his ministers and spirits, whom the fooles of this age flatter with the name of familiar spirits, that he will easily glide into our soules, to lead vs at last in triumph to his kingdom of perdition, where we shall deerely buy the familiarity of so pernicious an enemy. Wherefore let vs rather haue alwaies in our heart, & in our mouth, that praier which our Sauer himselfe hath taught vs, [That he leade vs not into temptation, but deliuer vs from euill.] And let vs leaue the magicians and forcerers; which run to their owne destruction, seeking after the spirits, who lead them to the eternall Gehenna, which is prepared for the diuell and his angels. But now sith it is time to put an end to our talke this day, hauing surueied the angelicall or intellectuall world, according to the capacity of our feeble spirit, we will to morrow entreate of the celestiall world, or of the spheres. Whereupon you (A S E R) shall begin to discourse.

Of the celestiall or spherical world. Chap. 17.

A SER.

IF we begin our speech concerning the spherical, and of the elementary world, and entreate of them both according to the proper definition, wee shall doe very well, to the end that that which we entend to discourse of, may more easily be vnderstood. The world then, which yesterday we called the threefold one being contemplated with one view, is the perfect & entire composition of all things and the true image and admirable workmanhippe of the Godhead. The greatnesse whereof is incomprehensible, and yet limited: beeing also adorned with all bodies, and kindes of creatures which are in nature. And the description thereof is properly called Cosmography, which doth comprise in it the first part of Astronomie and Geography, that is, the order and reason, as well of heauen as of the earth: vnder which wee vnderstand all natures and essences in them contained. And for this cause it seemeth that God beeing Father and Authour of all things, is oftentimes called in the Scriptures, creatour of heauen and earth. And as the Greekes did first call the heauen (Cosmos) because of the surpassing beauty: so afterward the name of (Mundus) hath beene attributed thereto, because of the perfect and most pure hiew and neatnesse thereof. Againe, because the world is a solide body, that is full of celestiall or elementary substances; and because it is of a round and orbicular forme, performing a circular motion without intermission vpon his owne poles, and round about the earth (as about the center thereof) it is called a Sphere. For a sphere is a body containd vnder one round superficies, in the midst whereof is a point, from which all lines that are drawne to the circumference are equall. But as we consider the world in this sphere, so must wee also contemplate it into two distinct parts, which manifest themselves by continuall experience and natural reason: to wit, the elementary region, continually occupied in generation and corruption, in change and alteration of all things, as well liuing, as not liuing, and the celestiall part, being of inuariale substance and adorned with innumerable stars, as well fixed as wandring, which inuiron the said elementary region round about: so that the elements beeing diuersly intermingled, infused and proportioned are the materiall cause & nouriture of all things: and the heauenly part by the light thereof, by the motion and influence of the starres, is the formall cause of their figure, variety and speciall difference, and from it proceedeth their life. Now that we may entreate of this first part of the world, which we haue named in our first deuision of the Vniuers (the world of the spheres) we must note that this celestiall regio (which philosophers call the first essence, thereby meaning that it is of another, and more simple nature then the fower elements) is by them diuided into eight orbes and particular heauens, one ioyning to the other, and all concentricall, that is, hauing one common and selfe same center, to witte, that of all the world; and of these heauens the greatest doth inuiron, and by a spherical order enclose within it that which is next and lesse then it selfe, beeing each discerned by the proper and particular motion of those starres which they containe: all which motions doe varie one from another. And these eight orbes or spheres are, the heauen of fixed starres, which keepe an vchangeable distance betweene themselves, and for this cause it is called the firmament: then follow the seven planets, of which the sunne and moone are properly called Luminaria or great lights. And for Saturne, Iupiter, Mars, Venus, & Mercurie, they are especially named planets, that is wandring in their motions. Whereupon we may note in regard of their names, that Astrologians to the end to make their doctrine to be more easily retained, & for certen good respect & secret reaso, making themselves like painters to instruct the ignorant, haue also named and represented these stars by personages of diuers habits and countenances: as likewise they haue disposed vnder diuers figures the twelue signes of the Zodiacke, which are certaine stars, appointing to one the fashion of a ramme, to another of a bull, to another of two twinnes, and so of the rest. So likewise they haue signified the images of heauen, which are out of the Zodiacke, one by a Bares, another by an eagle, another by an harpe; this by a dog, and that by a dragon, and so of the rest. To the sunne it selfe they haue assigned a proper forme and figure, as also to the moone. And we see that painters haue alwaies made the picture of stars with five beames, to denote their twinckling light, though all of them do not glister so, but are of round fashion, without points or corporall beames. But returne we to our matter concerning the heauens and celestiall spheres, and let vs speake of their order and situation.

The firmament, which is the eight heauen, as the highest and greatest of all the rest, and as the vttermost ornament and beawtie of all the world, doth enuiron round about the heauen of Saturne; that of Saturne, the heauen of Iupiter; that of Iupiter, the heauen of Mars, and that of Mars, the orbe of the Sunne, which possesseth the middle place among the seven planets: then the heauen of the Sunne compasseth round about the heauen of Venus; that of Venus the heauen of Mercury; and lastly that of Mercury, the heauen of the Moone, which is the least and lowest of all the rest, and placed next about the elementarie region. And this number and order of the heauens is commonly received of all Astronomers and Philosophers; and sheweth it selfe to bee such both by naturall reasons, and by Mathematicall obseruations. Moreover, for so much as by the Astronomers ring and other instruments fitting for the demonstration of this science, one may perceiue that these eight spheres are distinguished and separated one from the other, certaine reason doth ther-upon conclude, that beside these there is a ninth, which is called first the moouer, which is the guide of the heauens, and which by his owne power and violence doth carry away all the other with it, beeing no whit gouerned by any lower circle, but onely by that intelligence which mooueth it, or else by the commandement of God, to whome all motion is drawne, as to the first moouer, to the end that the whole harmony of heauen be not confused as Aristotle in the end of his Organon proueth. True it is also, that some moderne Philosophers doe place betweene the firmament and the first moouer a ninth sphere, which they call the Christalline heauen, for that some starres are not seene therein. And this is because that they cannot perceiue, how there might be made in the eight sphere, the motion called Trepidation or tottering of the fixed stars if there were not a ninth heauen enclosed within the first moouer. For it seemes not likely to them, that the firmament which is turned with three motions, should be ioyned to the first moouer which is carried with one only course. For this eight sphere hath one daily motion from the west to the east vpon the poles of the Zodiacke, which is the circle of the signes, vpon which (according to Ptolemy) in each hundred yeeres it runneth one degree, or else in sixty yeeres, as others hold; then hath it the foresaid motion of Trepidation. Whereupon they conclude that there is a ninth heauen, that hath onely a twofold motion, betwixt the starrie heauen and the first moouer, which is onely turned with one motion; to the end that in good order all things may be reduced to the first moouing. For as Aristotle in his profound Philosophie saith, it is necessary, that by most fit agreement and consent euery thing may be reduced to that, which is the cause thereof. But because Ptolemy, Hermes, Aratus, and other auncients, most exquisite beholders of the heauens and of their motions and aspects, are contented with the number of nine spheres, many therefore reiect the opinion of those which make tenne: because that nothing maketh for them but onely the motion of Trepidation, which, say they, may be well considered vnder the first moouer, but for the ninth sphere. Besides which, our diuines do yet declare to be a tenth heauen, which they call Emphyreall, vitall, flaming and diuine, into which are receiued the soules of the blessed. And it seemeth that Plato and his Academicks, especially Plato in his booke of the world, doth consent to them. But this heauen and throne of God, cannot properly bee reckoned with the other nine. For they bee moouable, but this is stable and immouable, they be of one substance onely, and this of another. Wherefore we may aptly referre it to the Angelicall and intellectuall world, whereof we discoursed yesterday. And if we may be permitted againe to discourse by numbers, as we haue begun; it is certaine that as the number of ten retaineth a double nature, because it doth partake with that number whereof it is the end, and with that other whereof it is the beginning: so the tenth in all the prime kindes of things doth consist of double nature. For man, which is the tenth kinde of things subiect to corruption, and at whom the other nine finish, is of a corruptible and incorruptible composition. So the nine heavens end at the imperiall heaven, which in that it is materiall, agreeth with them, but in dignity of matter it doth participate with the supercelestiall throne. As likewise they that speake of the nine orders of angels, lay, that they ende in Christ their king, who holdeth and embraceth in all perfection both the nature of angels and also of God; to whome at last all things must be reduced, as to him, of whom, from whome, and by whom all things consist.

Now that, which heere we speake of the heavens, may likewise be learned out of Moses, the prince of all Philosophers, or rather of the creator of all things himselfe, who hath spoken by the mouth of his prophet, as also by himselfe. For after Moses had praised the Eternal that he would be alwaies with him, & that he would by continuall oracles instruct him as there should be great neede, that hee might rule such a number of people, and that hee might give them the law; [I will be (saith he) with thee, and will dwell in the midst of thee: And according to all those things, which I shall shew thee, even so shal you make the forme of the Tabernacle. They shall make an Arke of Shittim wood, whereof the height and bredth shall be a cubite and an halfe.] Such as haue diligently interpreted this text, do amongst other mysteries finde therein the nine heavens aptly represented: for a cubite is sixe palmes, then a cubite and halfe hie and broad are nine palmes. And againe when he commandeth that vpon the same arke he should make a crowne of gold, which should serue it for a couering, and which was of precious stuffe, farre above that of the arke of wood, they should thereby make vs vnderstand, that the tenth heaven was figured. Which for that cause is not numbred commonly with the other nine, but is considered by our vnderstanding to be the beginning of an other combination and coupling. For tenne as it doth accomplish the other numbers, so is it the original of the tens so an hundreth finishing the tens, beginneth the hundreths: So this couering of gold, otherwise called propitiatorie crowning the arke, was beginning to a better thing, for vpon the same were placed the Cherubims, and there were obtained the mercitull and fauorable graces of God. In such sort likewise the imperiall heaven, though it accomplisheth and finisheth the number of the nine heavens, yet is it the beginning of spirituall and diuine things and retaineth an angelicall nature; yet so, that it is proportioned to the spheres, who are appointed to haue a place. Againe we haue heeretofore heard in the generall diuision of the vniuers, how in the partition of the Tabernacle into three speciall parts, was very aptly signified that of the world, beeing a threefold one. How also by the seven lampes of gold ordained to be set to the candlestick in the arke, might fitly seeme to be represented the seven planets shining in their spheres: as likewise by the bodie of the same candlestick, out of the sides whereof proceeded sixe branches, to wit, three out of either side might be particularly denoted the sun, which is placed in the midst of the planets, whereof there be three on each part in round forme, which like cups or vessels receiuing influences frō above, do conferre them on things here below, by which meanes fundrie flowres do spring vp. But because it would be too tedious for vs to compare all that which belonged to the making of the Arke with that which is taught vs concerning the spheres, wee will come to conclude that there be nine Heavens: to wit, the first moouable, by which the supreme worker and first moouer of all, mooueth all things. Then is the starry heaven or firmament, by which the same Creator distributeth his power into innumerable instruments to performe such things as he executeth, especially by meanes of the seven planets, which haue euery one their heaven, according to the order heretofore declared. And vpon which, (according to our yesterdaies speech) the Hebrew doctors, and many other Diuines doe teach, that certaine spirits (which they call celestiall, or separated intelligences) doe make abode, who being before the throne of God, reioycing in his presence, doe behold in his countenance as in a mirror, all things which may be contemplated, and at the very becke of the prince of nature, doe put his will in execution, vsing the heavens as instruments by which, and according to the number of diuers influences proceeding from all the starres and signes, here below are produced with one concurrence, mettals, stones, plants and liuing creatures. But before wee more ampie touch these things, which respect the nature & admirable effects of the heavens in all creatures, we must first entreat of their figure and motion, which (A M A N A) shall be the subiect of your discourse.

as particular. Chapter 18.*

AMANA, That the heauen is generall and particularly of circular forme, and altogether round; the Latin name (Orbis) by which the ancients haue commonly called it, is a sure testimonie vnto vs. So likewise there are many natural reasons, which declare it to be such. For all the partes of the frame thereof doe consist of themselves, doe sustaine themselves, and doe comprehend themselves, not hauing neede of any stay of point, hauing neither a beginning nor ending place. Moreover, this roundnesse of heauen may bee knowne by the sight of the eye. For on which side soeuer you beholde it, you may see the halfe in our hemisphere, as it doth shew it selfe: which could not come to passe in any other figure, but in a round; which also is the most perfect, and most capable of all other figures to bee comprised in one selfe-same circuit: and is therewithall the easiest to moue euery way. And therefore it is not onely conuenient, but also necessary for all the heauens and celestiaall orbes, of which wee before intreated, as well because of the perfection of their essence, as by reason of their proper motions, which are circular, and correspondent to a round forme, and besides all this; because these spheres are placed one within another making their revolutions vpon diuers poles, and in diuers spaces of time. Which could not be obserued, nor the integritie of the whole heauen maintained, if the celestiaall forme were any other than round and circular. For the proper and naturall motion of the Spheres is circular, that is, framed equally distant round about their center, which is the point in the midst of the world, so that neither the whole heauen, nor any of the particular spheres, doth wholly abandon or passe out of his owne place and situation, but onely the partes of them doe incessantly change place, in that they turne about their said common center. And therefore is this circular motion much more noble and perfect, then that which is made by a right line, either mounting from the center of the world towards the circumference, or else descending from it towards the center: which motion is proper to the foure elements: For fire and aire do mount vpwards, but water and earth descend naturally downewards. Also fire mounteth higher then aire, and earth descendeth lower then water, and each of these enuiron the center of the world, which is the lowest place of all, and farthest from the circumference, which is the highest of all. So then the circular motion is naturally due and conuenient to the most noble and most simple body, which is the heauen and most necessarie for it: as it appeareth more cleerely to vs by the continuall motion of the starres, both fixed and wandring, which proceedeth of the onely moouing of their spheres. For wee must note that the starres are nothing else but certaine firme, cleere, and solide partes of their heauens, made in round forme like the heauen, whose motion they follow, which likewise receiue their light from the sunne, who is the very source and fountaine, wherinto the soueraigne creator hath put the brightnes of the whole vniuersal world.

Now this circular motion of heauen is found by obseruation to haue two principall differences: that is to be made vpon sundrie pole and axes, and in sundry parts and positions of the world, as also in diuers spaces and quantities of times. [Wee call that the axes of the sphere which is the diameter that passeth through the same vpon which it is turned, and the vttermoost points of the same axis are the poles.] For the whole vniuersal world hath his proper and naturall motion like a living creature, and euery of the orbes and particular heauens haue also a peculiar motion, like to the parts and members of the whole great body. For which cause, as also for diuers other considerations many learned personages haue affirmed, that the world is an animal or living creature. And amongst others Origen is wholly of that minde, who enforceth himselfe to prooue it, as well by reasons as by authority of holy Scripture. And therefore he saith thus in this booke of principles. [Though the world be ordeined to diuers offices, yet the estate thereof must not be thought to bee dissonant, or any whit disagreeing. But euen as our body alone is composed of many members, as is contained by one soule; so I thinke we must suppose that the vniuersal world is a great and vmeasurable animal, which as by a soule is sustayned by the power and wisdom of God.] The Platonists doe all with one mouth teach the same thing. And amongst many reasons, by which they would confirme this point, we will take onely that of Plato in his Timæus, which, me thinkes, is most excellent. [There are (saith he) two motions, the one proper proper, the other strange or exterior; now that is more diuine, which of it selfe is mooued, then that which is stirred by the power of another. And this motion proper and diuine is in our soules onely, from which the beginning of the other strange motion is taken. Seeing therefore that all motion proceedeth of the ardor of the world, and that this ardor is not mooued by exterior agitation, but of it owne accord, it is therefore necessarie, that there must bee a soule. Whereupon we gather that the world is an animall, and that not without vnderstanding.] Now if thereupon any aske why heauen changeth not, nor becometh diseased, nor dieth, nor faileth as other liuing creatures doe? The answer of Chalcidius in this point pleaseth me very much, whē he saith, commenting vpon Timæus, [That which is instituted by God without meanes, is free and exempt from change, from age, from sicknesse, from oldnes, and from death.] And in this point agree all Academicks: as also might be well prooued by circumstance, if that be well considered, which the sage philosopher Moses declareth to haue beene produced by the creator, without helpe or matter, and that which hath beene also performed by meanes of the second causes. For though man was created and formed by the hands of God, yet was he not made without dust or earth, which was a meane subiect. But the eternall hath made the heauens, and the whole frame of the world of nothing: For which reason it might seeme perpetuall, and not perishing. For as wee haue heretofore declared; though the heauens and earth must passe away, yet doth not this plainly conclude an annihilating of them, but rather a changing and renewing. For so speaketh the kingly prophet, saying, [The heauens shall waxe old as doth a garment, as a vesture shalt thou change them, and they shall be changed.] And of this consideration we may frame an excellent reason concerning the immortality of the soule, because it was made without any meanes by God himselfe. But leauing this argument, let vs pursue that, which wee beganne to say concerning the principall differences of the circular motion of the heauens.

Wherefore the first and vniuersall motion of all the sphericke world, is that, which we see is made round about the earth, from the east by south towards the west, alwaies with one and the same orderly celeritie and swiftnes, and without any ceasing, which performeth his course in a naturall day, which is diuided into fower and twenty equall hower, as is plainly shewed vnto vs by the ordinarie course of the sunne. So that the whole heauen, and each of those celestiaall spheres, doe follow the saide daily motion, though it bee not proper to them but accidentall, in that they are the partes of the vniuersall world. For (as wee shall presently see) every sphere hath an other proper and particular motion. But this same, whereof we speake, doth in such sort by accident agree with all the parts of the world, that the most thinne and subtil elements, especially fire, and the superiour region of the aire, are in like sort carried away therewith. So likewise doth the sea, though it environeth not the earth round about, in some sort follow this motion by ebbing and flowing every naturall day, not performing an entire reuolution. Wherefore nothing but the earth remaineth vnmoueable, because of the waight, and insensible quantity of it in respect of the whole world, as being the center thereof. The stablednesse whereof is very necessarie, that so both the vniuersall and each particular motion may be discerned; for otherwise there should be a confusion instead of harmony. And for this cause many haue supposed, that this whole Vniuers generally considered, is the first and very true moouer of the vniuersall motion, and not any heauen or particular orbe. Now for the second kinde of circular motions, it is that which is proper to every of the eight sphers and celestiaall orbs, which are the parts of the whole heauen, from the firmament to the sphere of the moone. For each of these spheres (as is evidently perceiued by the starres enchaſed therein, which can haue no motion but according to their heauen) performeth his owne naturall and peculiar motion, contrary to the first, and vpon other poles and axes, to wit, from the West by South towards the East. And the entire reuolutions of those spheres, are done and finished in diuers spaces of time, to wit, of the greater and superior more late, and of the lesse and inferiour (being next to the elements) more soone. For the heauen of fixed starres, according to the most likely opinion and apparant obseruation of Astronomers, performeth his owne reuolution in thirty six thousand common yeares, without bissext, whereof each containeth 365. naturall daies: Saturne the highest planet, in thirty yeares; Iupiter, which hath his circle much lower, in twelue; Mars in two; the Sunne in 365. naturall daies, and almost one fourth part of a day, which make vp the time and space of a yeare. For one shall alwaies finde, that number of daies being runne out, the shadow of the Sunne to be such, as (if you marke it) was the yere before before, at the very same instant, yea to the difference scarce of a minute. Whereby it commeth that from foure yeare to foure yeare, is reckoned a bissextile day, which serueth to make the yeare answerable to the course of the sunne. The revolution of whom, Venus and Mercury do neere approach vnto: and for the Moone she maketh hers in seven and twentie natural daies, and almost one third part of a day: so that in so small time she maketh as much way in regarde of vs, as Saturne doth in thirtie yeeres: because he is the farthest from, and shee the neereft to the earth, which causeth her course to be shorter then any other planet. And this is the consideration, which hath giuen occasion to many to cast the distances and spaces which are betweene the spheres: saying, that there is nine teene times so much distance betweene the Sunne and Moone, as is betweene the Moone and the earth, & so of the rest, Pythagoras himselfe, a man very ingenious, counted by his calculation (as Plinie relateth) that there were 125000 stades or furlongs between the earth and the circle of the Moone: and that from the Moone to the Sunne there werethe double of them, and betweene the sunne and signes of the Zodiacke the triple. Now a stade (or furlong) was measured by the ancients to consist of one hundred fve and twentie common paces, or else of seven hundredth and fiftie feete. But so certainly to determine of the dimensions and distances betweene the spheres, should (me thinketh) be too great an enterprise for the capacite of our spirits. Yet may the curious by some infallible reason of Geometrie, or rather by imagined coniectures resolute vpon it. And to conclude our discourse concerning the motions of heauen, we see that though by the rapiditie and violence of the continuall motion of the first moouer, all the spheres are carried away with it, in the space of fower and twentie howers from east by south towards the west, returning by north, or midnight towards the east; yet neuertheless every one of them hath his proper and particular motion, cleane contrary to the vniuersall, that is, from the west towards the east. Which is chiefly done because that by the reuerberation of these contrarie motions, the aire may be parted and disperfed, which otherwise would heape and gather together, and become immooueable and heauy, because of the continuall revolution of the world, turning alwaies one way. And besides these principall differences of the circular motion of the heauens, all the planets haue other motions offarther consideration, which are called circuits of the great revolution, and which doe concur in the great yeare, which is taken for the time when all the planets shall fully finish their courses together. But we haue said enough concerning this matter, considering the entent of our discourse; wherefore we will prosecute as briefly as we may the other particularities seruing for the knowledge of the spheres, euen so much as we shall hold needful for our present historie of heauen and earth. Then you shall discourse to vs (ARAM) of those circles which shew themselues in the sphere, and of the diuersitie and disposition of them.

A good cause of the motions of the spheres.

Of the circles in generall, and particularly of the Equinoctiall and Zodiacke, and of their signes. Chapter 19.

ARAM. IN the sphere of the world are two kindes of circles demonstrated, whereof some are named greater, and some lesser circles. They which haue one selfe same & common center with the whole heauen, are called greater circles, and are one equal parts. But such circles as haue their centers out of that of the sphere, are called lesser circles, of which those only; that haue their middle points alike distant from that of the whole heauen, are equal one to another: being by so much the smaller, by how much their center is farther from the center of the whole. And therefore they which haue their centers vnequally distant from that of the heauen, are vnequall, and that is greater then the rest, whose middle point is neereft to that of the sphere: and consequently the one is so by much the more vnequall to the other, by how much the center of the one is farther distant from the center of the other. And it is to bee noted that all circular motion of any heauen and planet whatsoever, must bee considered and measured by meanes of a greater circle: to wit, that which is directly placed betweene the poles of the same motion, and is equally distant from the same: because it is a circle of the greatest circuite and swiftnesse, that may bee designed by the same motion. But wee must vnderstand, that among all the circles, there is one part mooueable that is incessantly turning therewith, and the other fixt and immooueable, seruing for to discern the better the accidents and effects of the sphericall motions and moouing circles.

Of the greater and smaller circles of the sphere.

First

First, then to entreate of the moueable circles, as likewise to prosecute that which wee haue heard in our precedent discourse that there bee two principall motions of heauen, whereof one is of the vniuersall world, making his reuolution from the East towards the West, and the other contrary from West to East, as is proper to the planets: we must imagine in the sphere of the world two principall circles, to wit, the Equinoctiall or Equator for seruing for the first of those motions, and the Zodiack or Eclipticke for the second. The Equinoctiall then is a great circle, diuiding the totall sphere into two equall parts, being placed directly betweene the two poles of the world, and equally distant in all parts from them. By the which circle is measured and considered the prime and vniuersall motion of the whole world: and consequently the time, which is nothing else but the measure of the succeeding of the same motion, which is alwaies of one selfe same course and quickenesse, and whereof the said circle is called the Equator. Vnder which the sunne directly comming (which is twice every yeare) the daies are of equall length with the nights throughout the whole world: for which cause likewise the same circle is called the Equinoctiall, that is the circle of equall nights. And the poles thereof are those of the whole world; about which the vniuersall and regular motion is made: whereof that which is in the North parts, is called by the same name, either the Pole Articke, North-pole or Septentriniall, which is alwaies seene where we inhabite and about which there is a certaine figure of seven fixed starres, turning circularly, which is called the great Beare, or most commonly the Waine. And the other pole opposite to this is named the pole Antarticke, south-pole, or Meridionall being towards the south, and is alwaies hid from vs. For the second great and principall circle among those which are moueable, it is nominated the Zodiacke or Eclipticke, or else the oblique circle: and it is that, wherein the twelve signes are placed of diuers names and figures, being indeed obliquely placed in respect of the Equinoctiall, and poles of the world: so that one halfe thereof extendeth towards the north or pole articke, and the other moitie declineth toward the south and pole antarticke. And this circle is the very path way of the sunne and rest of the planets, all which keepe their peculiar motion in the Zodiacke, to the end to distribute their influence and vertue vpon the earth, for the life and production of all things. Now the Zodiacke doth diuide in the midst the Equinoctiall, and is thereby diuided also into two equall halfes. And the points of these interfections are called Equinoctiall points because the sunne being in them, they daies are vniuersally equall to the nights; as also the points of the foresaid Zediacke, which are the meanes betweene the said Equinoctiall points are named Sunsteads or Tropicks, that is to say, stations, or reuerfions of the sunne: because that, it arriuing about those points, the meridian altitudes and artificiall daies do long remaine in one estate, without any notable variation; as also for that comming to the said Sunsteads, it returneth toward the Equinoctiall. And thus the two Equinoctiall points, and that two Sunsteads diuide the Zodiacke into foure parts, answerable to the foure seasons of the yeere: which are the Spring, Summer, Autumne, and Winter. Of which, the Spring time beginneth at that Equinoctiall point, from which the sunne by his proper motion, commeth and enclineth towards the highest point called Verticall. Sommer beginneth at the Sunstead next following. Autumne at the other Equinoctiall: and Winter at the second sunstead; so that the said Equinoctiall points are called by the names of the foresaid seasons. And because that every natural action hath beginning, middle, and end: therefore each of these said quarters of the Zodiacke is diuided into three equall parts, & so the whole Zodiacke into twelve: which parts are named signes, because they signifie, and designe the most notable and apparant mutations of things heere below, being chiefly caused by the yeerely course of the Sunne along the Zodiacke. Every of the said seasons of the yeere is likewise diuided into three parts, and the whole yeere into twelve, called moneths, that is to say measures of the time, wherein the sunn passeth the said twelve signes. And as the twelve months haue beene diuided some into thirtie, and others into thirty one natural daies; euen so is every signe parted into thirtie degrees, and the whole Zodiacke into 360. Then every degree into 60. prime minuts, and every prime minute into 60. seconds, and so consequently into other subdiuisions so far as one will. Wherein is to be noted, that this number of 60. must alwaies be obserued, because it may be diuided into more equall parts then any other number vnder 100.

Now forasmuch as the sunne, according as it is remooued or approacheth neere the highest points called Verticall, doth cast forth his beames more directly or oblique vpon the earth; for this cause also the heate, and proper action of the starres and planets is more forcible;

cible, or feeble in things here below, and according as it findeth them prepared causeth diuers effects. Which diuersity is notoriously apparant from signe to signe. And therefore the twelve signes of the zodiack are called by certaine proper names, extracted from the nature and property of things correspondent with their said effects. The first signe is nominated (Aries) because that the Sunne then beginneth to approach to the highest point, and the heate thereof doth encrease, which mixing with the humilty that the precedent winter had brought in, maketh the temperature of the aire hot and moist, which agreeth with the nature of a ram. The second signe is called (Taurus) because that when the sunne is therein, the heate fortifieth it selfe, and consumeth the moisture, so that the temperature of the aire tendeth somewhat to drinesse, which seemeth very answerable to the nature of the bull, which is of greater power then that of sheepe. The third signe is named (Gemini) because the Sunne beeing therein, hath his heat redoubled: and amongst all kinde of beastes the males and females haue naturall copulation, two and two together to engender one like themselves, and to continue their kind. The fourth signe is said to be (Cancer) for euen as the crabbe goeth backward, so the sunne entring into this signe retireth backe towards the Equinoctiall from whence he came, making his declinations contrary to those of Gemini. The fift signe is called (Leo) because the sunne being therein, by the redoubling of his beames, the heate is strong, and drinesse great, euen as the lion is a puissant beast, of hot and dry nature. The sixt signe is named (Virgo) for as the virgine is a weake creature, and of her selfe barren, so the sunne being in this signe the heate diminisheth, and drinesse ruleth; whereby the production of things ceaseth, and the earth becommeth barren. The seuenth signe hath to name (Libra) because the disposition of the aire is then in ballance betweene the wasted heate and new begunne coldnesse and because also the sunne beeing in this signe, the daies and nights are in ballance betweene the decreasing of the one, and increasing of the other. The eight is called (Scorpio) because that then the colderuling with drinesse, are great enemies to nature, and doe corrupt the aire, which hath the proper qualitie of hot and moist: whereupon ensue plagues, and other dangerous diseases, which surprize the creature, like the venome of a Scorpion, which lies in his taile, and is engendered of corruption. The ninth signe is named (Sagitaris) for the sunne being in it, the too much weakened heat is surmounted by cold, wherupon there ensue fogs & frost, and other alterations of the aire, as hurtfull to creatures, as enuenedomed arrowes. The tenth signe is nominated (Capricornus) because that the sun entring therinto, is the farthest that al the yeere it can be from the vertical point, so that by rigor of the cold mixed with drines, which hath then full domination: as also by reason of the debility of heat, the disposition of the aire is melancholy, retaining the nature of a goate. The eleuenth signe is signified by (Aquarius) because then the drinesse is surmounted by the moisture now beginning, the cold neuertheless remaining: wherefore the aire is cold and moist like water, and disposed to snowes and raine. The twelfth and last signe is (Pisces) because as fishes are cold and moist, following naturally the water, hauing yet some little naturall heat: euen so is the temperature of the aire, then cold and moist, hauing yet some heate growing by the approach of the Sunne to the vernall Equinoctiall point, so that the colde diminisheth. And thus much concerning the signes of the zodiacke, and the names to them ascribed, for which cause the fixed starres, which are in this circle and comprised within the said signes, both of the one side and one the other, haue bene painted according to the fashion of the said beasts: and their influence iudged from the causes by vs heere declared; and not that the said signes haue taken their names of the nature and disposition of the said starres. And by this consideration of the property of each signe in the zodiacke, wee learne, that by the introduction of one qualitie, ensueth the expulsion of the contrarie; and by the augmentation of the one, the decrease of the other. Which must onely be vnderstood concerning the qualities happening in the aire, by the radiation of the sunne onely, being strong, meane and weake, and the disposition of inferiour things, without comprising therein the other constellations and aspects of the planets, changing and greatly altering the said disposition of the aire: neither doe we touch the opinions of professors of iudiciall Astrologie, who for other reasons and principles of the said art, attribute to the same signes other qualities then those that we haue expressed. But from them we may extract fower triplicities, which make the twelve signes correspond with the fower elements; to witte, Gemini, Cancer, Leo, with the fire: Pisces, Aries, and Taurus, with the aire: Sagitaris, Capricornus, Aquarius, with water: and Virgo, Libra, and Scorpio, with earth. Now must we pursue our purpose concerning the circles of the sphere, as well great as small, moouable as immoouable: the treatise whereof (A C H I T O B) I refer to you.

Of the two great circles named Colures, and of the fower lesse circles and parallels, of the five zones of the world and immoouable circles. Chap. 20.

A C H I T O B.

BESIDES these two principall moouable circles which haue bene declared vnto vs in the precedent speech, there are also demonstrated in the sphere two other great circles; whereof one passeth by the Equinoctiall points, and the other by the Solstits or sun-seeds and poles of the zodiacke, and both by the poles of the world, where they are diuided into three angles. And by this meane they part as well the Equinoctiall as the zodiacke into fower parts; the parts whereof answere together in iust and equall proportion. These two circles haue to name Colures, that is to say, vnperfect, because they haue an vnperfect reuolution in turning with the sphere vpon the points of their circumference, and not about their proper poles, like other circles. One of them then is called the Equinoctiall colure, and the other the Solstitial colure. And the one passeth by the circle of the zodiacke at the beginning of the signes Aries and Libra, which are the Equinoctiall signes: and the other at the beginning of the signes Cancer and Capricorne which are the Solstitiall signes. And it is to be noted that the arck of the Solstitiall Colure comprised betwene the Equinoctiall and one of the Solstits, is the measure of the greatest declination of the Sun: which must of necessitie be equall to the arck of that Colure, which is between one of the poles of the world, & the next pole of the zodiack. For by how much one greater circle declineth from another, by so much the poles of the one are distant from the poles of the other, because all greater circles are equall, and haue one common center, and doe equally part themselves: and likewise their declination is iust in the midst of their cuttings or interfections.

Of two circles called Colures.

Of the two tropicks.

Of the two polary circles

Of the five zones of the world.

We must also consider in the sphere foure principall lesser and moouable circles; whereof the two first doe limit out the whole oblikenesse of the Zodiacke, and the declination thereof from the Equinoctiall, as also the conuersions of the Sunne towards it. And these circles are nominated Tropicks, that is, turning or conuertive, because they passe by the two Solstits of the zodiacke. That then which passeth by the first point of Cancer, which is the Sommer Solstice, is called the Tropicke of Cancer, or Sommer Tropicke: and that which passeth by the first point of Capricorne, or Winter Solstice, is named the Winter Tropicke, or Tropicke of Capricorne: being therefore one equall to another, because they are equally distant from the Equinoctiall. For the two other lesser circles, they are those which be described about the poles of the world, by the poles of the zodiacke, limiting the diuision or distance of the said Pole: and for this cause they are called Polarie-circles, and doe retain the names of the Poles of the world. For one is named the North or Arcticke-circle, and the other the South or Anarcticke circle, being also equall one to another by the same reason, as is vnderstood of the Tropicks. And you must note that these said foure lesser circles doe diuide the whole sphere into five parts or principall regions commonly called zones: whereto as many parts, or diuers regions answere vpon the terrestriall globe: which zones are different as well in figure and greatnesse, as also in nature or accidentall disposition, caused chiefly by the radiation of the sunne. The first then of these five parts or regions of the sphere is comprehended betwene the two Tropicks, and deuided by the Equinoctiall in the midst, for which cause it is the most ample of all the rest. The two extremest and smallest are comprised about the poles of the world, within the Arcticke and Antarctick circles: wherefore the one is called the North, & the other the South zone. And the other two are meanes betwene the greatest, which is middlemost, and the two extremest or least, which are about the poles of the world, being larger towards the two tropicks, then towards the polary circles, which together are the bounds of them. And among these five zones which enuiron the earth, some parts of them are become habitable, and others not, by meanes of the diuers effects caused by the sunne. For the meane region about the Equinoctiall, is for three causes temperate, first, because the

the sunne being vnder, or about the said Equinoctiall, it maketh a greater circuit in the vniuersall motion of the whole world, and runs faster away; for which cause his heate maketh not so great impression vpon the earth. Secondly, because it passeth suddenly from the South to the North part, by reason of the transuers disposition of the zodiacke about the Equinoctiall. And thirdly, because the daies are there equall with the nights, whereby the heate of the one is tempered by the coldnes of the other. But about the Tropicks the heat is excessive in Sommer. First, because the sunne is then in those stations, wherein his shining endureth longer vpon the earth, and by reason also that he performeth lesse compass, and passeth slowly away, whereby his heat taketh more deepe impression. And besides all this, the dayes are longer then the nights, in such sort that the heat of the one surmounteth the cold of the other. For the two polary regions and the circumiacent parts, it is manifest that they are farre out of the sunnes way; whereof ensueth, that by the too much oblique radiation thereof, heat is there exceeding feeble, and cold great and intolerable. Finally, in the middelt or about the two other foresaide regions betwene the Equinoctiall and poles of the world, the disposition of the aire is temperate; as well by reason of the commixture of the heat, which is about the Tropicks, and the cold which is about the polary circles, as because of the meane radiation of the sunne, that is to say, neither too direct, nor too oblique. So then the middle zone, comprised between the two Tropicks is temperate about the midd; and intemperate through excessive heate, about the extremities thereof: whereupon it is in this part called the Torrid zone, because the sunne doth alwaies turne about it. And the two polarie and extreme regions, are perpetually intemperate through colde. And the two meanes are temperate about the middelt; and in one extreame thereof intemperate with heate, and in the other with cold. But thereof followes not, that all intemperate places should be inhabitable, but onely very hard, and difficult to dwell in.

Hitherto hath our talke beene concerning the principall and mooueable circles of the sphere: Now let vs intreat of the immooueable. Even then as the Zodiacke and the Equinoctiall are the two chiefest amongst the mooueable circles: so are the Horizon and Meridian amongst the immooueable. By the Horizon is meant a great circle imagined in heauen, which diuideth that halfe of heauen which is seene, from that halfe which is not seene: that is, which parteth the Hemisphere vnder vs, from that which is aboue vs. And to the same circle one of the poles is alwaies the verticall point, and the other pole is the point opposite. Wherefore by how much each place hath his point higher, by so much doth the Horizon of each place differ; for there are so many Horizons as there be particular places. And therefore the horizon of those, which haue the verticall point (that is, the point which is right ouer head) vnder the Equinoctiall is named the right Horizon, because it must needs passe by the poles of the world, and diuideth the Equinoctiall at right angles one equall to another. Whereupon it is also called a right sphere because it seemeth to be rightly placed in respect of that Horizon, and the starres to make their motion directly by the vniuersall motion of the sphere. But the Horizon of those whose zenith is out of the Equinoctiall towards the one or other pole of the world, is called oblique, because that one of the poles (to wit, that which the verticall point is next to) is elevated aboue the said Horizon; & the other pole is so much depressed vnder the same: which for this occasiō doth deuide the Equinoctiall at oblique angles, vnequal one to another. Wherefore also the sphere is said to be oblique, because it is obliquely placed in respect of the said Horizon: and the stars turne obliquely in the vniuersall motion. And therefore it is euident, that all direct Horizons are of one selfe same disposition, but among the oblique, there are as many differences of oblique, as are distances betwene the verticall point and the Equinoctiall, or as the elevation of the pole is diuers aboue them. For the Meridian, it is a great circle, which passeth by the poles of the world and that point of heauen, which is directly ouer our heads, wherefoeuer we are: and deuideth both the Equinoctiall and Horizon at right angles, separating also halfe the sphere being east, from the halfe that is west. The poles whereof are the interfections of the Horizon and of the Equinoctiall. And because it deuideth the naturall day, and the artificall day (whereof we must hereafter entreate) into two euen parts, it is called the Meridian, or midday circle, which is as much to say, as the noone-tide circle. For whensoever the sun is come from the east to this circle, aboue the Horizon, it is high noone: when to the opposite point vnder the Horizon, it is midnight. All places then, according as they are more orientall, or more occidentall, haue their proper Meridian, and they which lye alike east, or west, haue one selfe Meridian, though they be not alike distant from the Equinoctiall. And you must vnderstand, that euery Meridian is a right Horizon to some, and euery right Horizon a Meridian.

Of verticall circles.

Of parallell
circles.

Now do I next proceede to the other immouable circles of the sphere, without which, no man can vnderstand the making & vse of many instruments especially of the Astrolabe, which representeth the sphere reduced into a plaine forme. Of these circles, some are called verticall, some parallels of heights: then are there circles of houres, and those which distinguish the twelue houses of heauen. The verticall are certain great circles, which proceed from the vertical point (wherof they are named) about the Horizon, which they diuide into 360 degrees, and of the number of those is the Meridian. But there is one especially called the vertical circle, which in the right sphere is Equinoctiall it selfe, to wit, that which deuideth the Meridian at right angles, and the Horizon also in the same points, where it is separated from the Equinoctiall, which circle with the Meridian designeth the four principall angles of the world, that is, the exact points of East, West, North and South, diuiding both the Horizon and vpper hemisphere into four parts, one equall to another. And the other vertical circles serue for to discern in what quarter of the Horizon the stars rise and set, or in what part of the superior hemisphere the same stars are eleuated above the Horizon, & how much they are distant from the Meridian, or from the foresaid principall vertical circle. Now for the parallels of heights, they be circles being euery where alike distant one from another, diuided from the Horizon from degree to degree towards the vertical point, whereof the greatest is next the Horizon, and the least of all neere to the said superiour point. Which parallels do deuide euery quadrant of the foresaid vertical circles, comprehended between the vertical point and the Horizon, into 90. degrees, and are also diuided by the same circles into 360. degrees. Moreover they determine or distinguish the heights of the stars, which are about the Horizon, as wel in the east, as in the south & west. For by the height is to be considered of euery star, you must vnderstand the arch of the vertical circle, which passeth by the center thereof, comprised betwixt the Horizon, and the parallell of the same, passing also by the same center. Whereupon ensueth, that in all vertical circles, which are equally distant from the Meridian, the stars haue equall heights, which commeth to passe in time equally distant, or reckoned from noone tide. And the greatest altitude that any star may haue, is when it commeth vnder the Meridian circle, at what hower soeuer it be. Now must we look vpon the hower-circles, and those which deuide the twelue houses of heauen: wherof Asse I impose the taske on you to discourse.

Of the hower circles, and what is done by them in sunne dials: and of the circles, which deuide the twelue houses of heauen. Chap. 21.

Deuision of the Equinoctiall.

Of the hower circles.

ASER Sith that time is nothing else but the measure of the prime and regular motion of the whole world, as we haue heretofore declared, & that this motion is measured by the Equinoctiall, as out of our percedent speech may be excerpted: thereupon it is consequent that the Equinoctiall is the measure of time, and that the entire revolution of the same circle comprehendeth the naturall day: whereupon ensueth that the diuision of the one must needs bee answerable to the parting of the other. Now the Equinoctiall is diuided into twelue signes, and each signe into thirtie degrees, as is the zodiack. Therefore parting each signe into two halues, the whole Equinoctiall shall bee deuided into foure and twentie equall portions, containing each fiftene degrees: which are the measures of foure and twenty such houres of a naturall day. You must therefore imagine by the hower-circles twelue greater circles (therein comprising the Meridian) which passe through the poles of the world, and by the distinctions of the foresaid foure and twenty parts of the Equinoctiall: so that each quarter thereof comprehended between the Meridian & the Horizon, is diuided by the said circles into six of the foresaid parts making together the number of foure and twenty houely spaces, wherof the said circles receiue their name. Amongst which, that which diuideth the Meridia at right angles, passeth by the intersections of the Equinoctiall & Horizon; and maketh the distinction of six houres, both before & after noone.

So

So that there is no greater circle which may be deuided into foure and twenty equall parts by the hower circles, but onely the Equinoctiall, except it bee conioyned therewith. Wherefore as well the oblique Horizon, as the Verticall circle, which cutteth the Meridians at right angles, is diuided into foure and twenty vnequall parts; which are so much the more one differing from the other, as the poles of the world are eleuated above, or vnder five and forty degrees: and though these parts are vnequall, yet the spaces of the howers are equall in the said circles, because they proceede of the equall parts and diuisions of the Equinoctiall; yet so, that the said equall spaces aswell in the Horizon, as in the Verticall circle, which are equally distant from the Meridian, are equall, as well on the one side, as on the other: and are by so much greater the one then the other; by how much they are farther distant from the same Meridian. Wherefore those next to the interfections of the Horizon and the foresaid vpper circle, are the greatest of all: and in the same sort are the foure quarters of the said circles diuided. It is to be noted, that every right Horizon is ioyned with the hower circle of sixe howers, without any diuision: and the Verticall circle ioyned with the Equinoctiall is diuided equally as it is. But in the most oblique situation of the sphere, where one of the poles of the world is the superior point, or zenith, the Horizon is right with the Equinoctiall, and diuided like it by the said howerly circles, which are all of them then called Verticall circles.

Those dials therefore or quadrants, which are made to take the height of the sunne, are composed by diuers considerations: for some depend vpon sections made by the foresaid hower circles, as those which are grauen on the face of the Equinoctiall, and are therefore called Equinoctiall dials: or else vpon the plaine of the Horizon, which are named Horizontall: or vpon the face of the Verticall circle, which diuideth the Meridian at right angles, which are erected towards the south, and are nominated Verticall. In which three sorts of dials, the hower spaces are noted by straight lines proceeding out of one onely point, which representeth the center of the world: and the Iudex or gnomon to shew those howers, representeth the Axis, vpon which the heaven maketh his first, and vniuersall motion. The other sunne dials depend vpon the coextension or impression of the foresaid hower circles: as those which are described vpon the face of the Meridian circle, and are erected towards the east or west, being named Laterall, and can serue but onely for the forenone, or afternone: or such as are made vpon the face of the sixe howers circle, hanging & inclining towards the south, by the axetree of the world, for this cause named hanging dials. In which two sorts of dials the hower spaces are designed by parallell lines, and the Iudexes by the axetrees of the circles, or else they are described and erected perpendicularly vpon the face of the said circles. And in all the fore recited dials, and such like, the hower spaces are vnequall, and haue notable difference one from another: except those onely, which are drawne vpon the face of the Equinoctiall: because it alone is diuided into equall portions by the hower circles; whereof the projection in plano must obserue equall spaces. And by consequence it is euident, that onely Equinoctiall and Horizontall dials serue for all howers of the day at all times of the yeere, and the Verticall onely sixe howers before, and sixe howers afternone: the hanging dials tenne howers: five before, and five after noone: and the Laterall from sunne rising till noone, or from noone till sun set. Moreover it is manifest, that all these dials, except the Equinoctiall dials, must bee described particularly according to the proper eleuation of the pole to every oblique Horizon; because the houre spaces and Iudexes are diuers, according to the varietie of the said polary eleuations. But the Equinoctiall dials may serue vniuersally, in applying them according to the height of the Equinoctiall, aboue every oblique Horizon; because those spaces are equall and of one sort.

But breaking off this talke of dials, let vs now entreate of those circles, which with the Horizon and meridian diuide the whole heaven into twelue equall portions, which are named the twelue houses of heaven. First, then it is to bee noted, that as the Sonne and the rest of the planets in performing their reuolution by their proper and peculiar motion in the zodiacke, according to the radiation of the Sunne, being notably diuersified from signe to signe, and according to the disposition of elementarie substances doe imprint their influence and vertue diuersly, causing sundry effects vpon the earth: so likewise these faire celestiall lights being turned every day about the earth, by the first and vniuersall motion of the whole sphere, doe make the very like mutation of their power and influence vpon the terrestriall Globe, by the variation of their shining; as may bee marked from

signeto signe, either mounting aboue; or descending vnder the Horizon. For this cause you must diuide the entire sphere of the world in regard of the Horizon beeing right or oblique, into twelue equall parts or signes, which are called houses, that is, notable mansions of heauen. Which is done by the proper Horizon and Meridian, with foure other great circles and particular Horizons, passing by the two interfections of the saide proper Horizon and Meridian circle, and deuiding euery quarter of the principall Verticall circle, (which maketh right angles with the saide Meridian) comprehended betweene the saide Meridian and the Horizon, into three signes, which amount together to the number of twelue. And these houses, or notable mansions of heauen begin at the east side of the Horizon: and the first sixe are distributed vnder it, and the other sixe aboue it, according to the order of the twelue signes of the zodiack and the proper motion of the planets, which is from the west, eastward. So that by the Horizon with the Meridian, the fower principall angles of the saide houses are distinguished: that is, the east angle, which is named the Horoscope, beeing the beginning of the first house; the west angle of the Horizon whereat beginneth the seventh house; and the midde heauen, which is the third angle, and there beginneth the tenth house; and for the fourth the angle vnder earth, where beginneth the fourth house, by the Meridian. Euen so (as we haue heard) as the colours distinguish the two Equinoctiall points, and the two Solstices or sunsteads of the zodiack, which are the fower notable points thereof agreeing with the fower angles aforesaide. For the Horoscope agreeth with the vernall Equinoctiall point; midde heauen with the sommer Solstice: the west angle with the Autumne Equinoctiall point: and the angle vnder the earth with the winter Solstice: and so consequently the fower quarters of the foresaid Verticall circle are correspondent to those of the zodiack, which make the fower seasons of the yeere, & each whereof is diuided into three signes, as also euery quarter of the saide circle into three houses equall to those signes; so that the sixe houses, which are aboue the Horizon doe accord with the sixe septentrionall signes of the zodiack; and the sixe other houses with the south or Meridionall signes. And these twelue houses of heauen are called by diuers names; for those fower which begin at the fower foresaid angles, are named Angularie houses: the next fower following are called Succedent, and the rest Cadent. Moreover we must note that in the right sphere, each of these houses comprehendeth one signe of the Equinoctiall, because this circle is ioyned with the foresaid Verticall, and all the circles which distinguish them passe by the poles of the world, because they consist in the foresaid sectiōs of the Horizon & Meridian: which hath caused many to erre in this point, who would make the distinction of the saide houses in the Equinoctiall, both in the oblique & in the right spher, lightly following the authority of Ptolomie, not noting how that authour had the sphere right to him, so that in that respect he spake well, referring the manner how to distinguish the saide houses in the oblique sphere to the iudgement of all good Astronomers. Finally it is to be vnderstood, that euery house is diuided into thirty degrees, like the signes of the zodiack, and that by other great circles, proceeding from the foresaid interfections of the Meridian and Horizon. Moreover you must note, that euery great circle which passeth by the said interfections, and by the true place of any star, which is proposed, is called the Horizon thereof: for all the foresaid circles (as already hath beene declared) are but oblique Horizons except the Meridian, which representeth the right Horizon. Then to erect the twelue houses of heauen, is nothing else but to finde the twelue principall interfections of the zodiack, and of the foresaid circles, which is preformed by the ascensions of the arcks of the zodiack, aboue each of the saide circle (whereof wee must presently entreat) not regarding which arcke of the saide zodiack is contained in each of the saide houses. Wherefore (A M A N A) let vs heare you discourse concerning the ascensions and descensions both of the Starres, and of the signes of the zodiack.

titude of the Sunne, or degrees of the Zodiacke.*

AMANA. WE should reape small fruite and commoditie of things, hitherto by vs entreated of in the sphere, if we should be ignorant in the ascensions and descensions both of the starres and signes, and other arckes of the zodiacke, according to the vse and principall consideration of good Astronomers, who marke what houre the Starres ascend above the Horizon, or descend vnder it, whether it be day or night: and how long time the signes and other arckes of the zodiack are eleuated above the said Horizon, or depressed vnder it; not respecting the simple apparition or absence of the said Starres and signes, which diuers doe vsually obserue, and which the Poets doe commonly mention, when they would expresse and describe the seasons and monethes, and other parts of the yeere. To enter then into the substance of our discourse, we must vnderstand by the ascension of any starre, that we propose, the arcke of the Equinoctiall, comprised according to the order of the twelue signes of the zodiacke, betweene the beginning of the said signes & the orientall part of the Horizon: then when the center of the saide starre attaineth to the same part of the Horizon. And consequently the descension of the same starre is the arcke of the said Equinoctiall, comprehended according to the order of the said signes betweene the beginning of them, and the west part of the Horizon, when the same Horizon passeth by the center of the saide starre. Which consideration is euery whit agreeable in each part of the zodiacke, or elsewhere. For the stars are in this place taken for points, how-soeuer they be of notable greatnes: wherefore it is necessary that their ascensions and descensions should be measured and discerned by the arckes of the Equinoctiall, hauing some conuenient beginning common to all Horizons, as the vernall Equinoctiall point is the beginning of the signes of the zodiacke. And by the same arckes taken as aforesaid, and for that the Equinoctiall is the measure of time, one may know at what hower and minute the starre riseth above the Horizon, or descendeth vnder it, or attaineth to the Meridian circle, either above or vnder the earth, by the first and regular motion of the whole world. And you must note, that the said ascensions or descensions are called right ones when they are referred to the right Horizon, or to the Meridian circle, which retaineth such qualities in all obliquenes of the sphere, as the right Horizon doth: and consequently they are called oblique, when they are referred to the oblique Horizon.

What the ascension, de-scension of any starre is,

For the ascensions of the signes of the zodiacke, very necessary to be vnderstood, for to measure and know the quantitie of the artificiall daies and nights in all places of the earth, as hereafter we may declare: it is to be noted, that the ascension of euery signe is nothing else but the arcke of the Equinoctiall eleuated together with the said signe above the Horizon; as the descension is the arcke of the said Equinoctiall which descendeth vnder the Horizon equally with the saide signe: wherefore according as this arcke coascending or descending with any signe is more great or lesse, so likewise the time that the said signe shall bee eleua-ted above the Horizon, or depressed vnder it, shall be longer or shorter. And it is to bee noted, that that signe of the zodiacke wherewith is eleuated one signe of the Equinoctiall precisely, is said to haue an equall ascension: I omit heere to specifie the accidents and differences of the ascensions and descensions of the signes, which are particularly considered both in the right and in the oblique sphere, which are common to the arckes of the zodi-acke, (which arckes are particles or the fower quarters of the said zodiacke, and do begin at the Equinoctiall points, and Solstices:) for our intent is not particularly to discourse of eu-ery thing that Astronomers teach concerning the sphere, and which cannot be vnderstood, but by demonstration of the materiall sphere, or by the figures placed in their bookes, which it is necessarie to marke diligently to conceiue this part of the Mathematicks. But we will heere summarily and grossely run ouer the most notable points required for our instruction in the vniuersall description of the whole world, and of the most noble things which come to passe heere below by reason of the prime and vniuersall motion of heauen. Yet may we not steppe out of this matter without considering in the ascensions and

Of the ascen-
tion of signes.

discensions of the sunne, that is, concerning every degree of his way, which is the zodiacke, the orientall and occidentall latitude of him; and which he obtaineth from degree to degree in the zodiacke, either in rising above, or descending vnder the Horizon. But for the other planets or fixed stars, no mention it made of the concerning this point. It is then most manifest by that which wee have already heard, that the interfections of the right or oblique Horizon, with the Equinoctiall and verticall circle, which diuideth the Meridian at right angles, are in the midst and equally distant betweene the interfections of the said Horizon, and of the Meridian, and that they designe the points of the true east and west. And because that the zodiacke declineth from the Equinoctiall partly toward the pole arcticke, and partly towards the antarcticke: the sun doth not rise in the true point of east, nor set in the direct point of west, but when it is vpon the Equinoctiall points, which are in the interfections of the zodiacke and Equinoctiall. For while the sunne is in the north part of the zodiacke, he riseth and setteth on the north side; and when he is in the south part, he riseth and setteth on the south side: and that in diuers distances from the true east and west, according as the true place of the sun declineth more or lesse from the Equinoctiall. The arcke then of the Horizon, which is between the true east and the center of the body of the sunne: when it is come to the easterne part of the Horizon, is called the orientall latitude of the sunne, and that which is comprised betweene the direct west, and that same center when it is in the west part of the Horizon, is called the occidentall latitude of the sunne. As also the latitude of the starres is taken from the zodiacke, towards the one or other pole thereof. For all stars both fixed and wandring, hold their longitude and latitude of the zodiacke, as of the Equinoctiall their declinations, ascensions and descensions. So that the latitude of the sun both orientall & occidentall, is necessarily northerly one half of the yeere, & the other halfe it is southerly. And likewise the orientall latitude is equall to the occidentall in one day. And because the variation of each latitude proceedeth of the diuersitie of the sunnes declinations, they are therefore such on the septentrionall part, as on the meridionall. Consequently you must note; that in the right sphere, the foresaid orientall or occidentall latitude is such without difference, as is the declination of the sunne: because the right Horizon passeth by the poles of the world, and sheweth both the one and other. But in the oblique sphere those latitudes are greater, then the declinations of the sunne: and so much the greater and more different, as the pole of the world is eleuated above the oblique Horizon, and the place of the sunne declineth from the equinoctiall. So that the greatest are those of the solstices, which doe most decline from the Equinoctiall: and besides these, there are fower points in the zodiacke, which haue equall latitude both orientall and occidentall, that is, two on the north side, and two on the south side. But thus much may suffice concerning this matter, for our purpose. And that we not swerue from the substance of our former discourse, it will bee good for vs to intreate of the daies, both naturall and artificiall, which are caused by the prime and regularg motion of the whole sphere, with the night likewise, as you (A R A M) can manifest vnto vs.

Of the naturall artificiall daies, and of the nights of their diuersitie and cause. Chapter 23.

Of naturall daies.

A R A M. AMongst the most excellent and note-worthy things which depend vpon the first and vniuersall motion of the whole heauen, and vpon that which hath bene expounded in our forepassed talke; there appeareth next to be handled the vnderstanding of the greatnesse and quantity of the daies, and the parts of them, called houres; as also of the heights of the Sunne above the Horizon, and of the shadowes as well right as oblique. Beginning then with the daies, you must note, that some are called naturall, some artificiall daies, which with vs are named properly daies, though indeed they be but parts of naturall daies, and so of nights. Now the naturall day is nothing but the time of the entire revolution of the body of the Sunne about the world, made by the naturall and proper motion of the vniuersall sphere: which revolution must alwaies begin at the Meridian circle, and comprehend the time, which is from one noone till the next ensuing. But because the Sunne this while goeth contrary in his owne peculiar course; the point of the the equinoctiall, which is vnder the Meridian with the sunne, performeth his revolution sooner then the sunne it selfe. Wherefore you must adde to the entire revolution of the Equinoctiall, the ascension being taken in the right sphere, from the part of the Zodiacke, which the sunne hath passed that while, to haue the entire revolution of the sunne, and the true measure of the naturall day. For all accidents of ascensions: which happen in the right Horizon, are common to euery Meridian circle in the right or oblique sphere: whereupon ensueth, that the true naturall daies are vnequall one to another, both because of the proper motions of the sunne, as also because of the saide ascensions taken in the right sphere. For the sunne, by reason of the obliquenes of the Zodiacke declining on either side from the Equinoctiall (which onely is the measure of time) is irregular in his owne proper motion, and performeth not euery naturall day a degree precisely, but sometimes a little more, sometimes a little lesse. And though it should make a degree iust, yet would not the ascension in the right sphere be equall. For these causes then, the true naturall daies are vnequall. But this inequality is scarcely to be perceived by vulgar iudgement and sensible obseruation. Moreover it is to be vnderstood, that forasmuch as the motions of the planets: and the middle coniunctions and oppositions of the sunne and moone, cannot be reduced into tables nor be calculated, but by equall daies, and euen revolutions of times: there must be assumed for this cause, certaine naturall daies, one like alwaies to another, which are called middle, or meane daies, containing each the entire revolution of 360. degrees of the Equinoctiall, and about that 59. minutes, and almost eight seconds of a degree: Which make vp the quantitie of the regular and middle motion of the sunne, correspondent to one of the said euen and meane naturall daies, according to which daies the tables of the foresaid motions are composed and calculated. And by this meanes the proposed terme of an entire yeere is reduced into true naturall daies: which of Astronomers is called the Equation of the daies.

For the artificiall day, thereby is vnderstood that part of the naturall day, which the sun maketh passing from the east by south to the west, through the proper & vniuersall motion of the whole world: During which time, the sun illuminaterh the superior part of the Horizon; for which occasion, the said part of the naturall day is properly termed day. And that which remaineth therof, being comprised betweene the west to the east passage of the sun, is named night: during which time the shadow of the earth is about the said Horizon in forme of a round Paramis, which doth then deprive that superior part of the light and shining of the Sun, whereby the darkenes is caused, which is called night. And also the two twylights, that is the clearenesse which we see before Sunne rising, and after Sunne setting, are parts of the night. For the true artificiall day beginneth, when the Sunne is in the East part of the Horizon; and endeth, when he passeth to the West. And these daies and nights are called artificiall, because that according to the diuers and artificiall situation of the Sphere, and according to the true place of the Sunne in the zodiacke, that they differ in quantitie one from another. To vnderstand which varietie, you must know that in all artificiall daies, of what length soeuer they bee, there rise about the Horizon sixe signes of the zodiacke, beginning at the true place of the Sunne; and the other sixe signes which beginne at the opposite point doe rise in the night time: because that the zodiacke and horizon are great circles of the sphere, which do alwaies diuide one another equally. And according as with the sixe eleuated signes, by day or night, any part or quantitie of the Equinoctiall doth arise about the Horizon, either more or lesse, by so much the artificiall daies and nights are of shorter or longer continuance, so that the ascension of the eleuated signes by day, is the true measure of the artificiall day, and the ascension of the other eleuated signes by night is the measure thereof. Because then, that in the right sphere, together with the moitie or one halfe of the zodiacke, where soeuer it begin, the moitie of the Equinoctiall doth precisely rise about the Horizon; for this cause therefore the artificiall daies are equall to the nights in the said right sphere. So that all the revolutions of naturall daies comprised betweene the two Tropickes, are diuided by the right Horizon into two iust halfes, and at right angles like the Equinoctiall. But in the oblique sphere the daies are neuer equall to the nights but twise a yeere, that is, when the sunne is in the first point of the signe of Aries and of Libra: which points are for this reason called the two Equinoctiall points. For in the oblique sphere there are but the two halfes of the zodiacke, comprised betwixt the said Equinoctiall points which may haue equall ascensions, because that the two Colures do neuer agree with the Horizon, which cannot diuide the zodiacke and Equinoctiall also into two equall parts together, ther, except in the same Equinoctiall points. Whereof the one is neuer with the Horizon without the other; because the said greater circles, are in them diuided into two exact halfe. But out of these Equinoctiall points, while the sunne is in that halfe of the zodiacke, that declineth from the Equinoctiall towards the Pole, which is eleuated above the Horizon, that is, from the vernall Equinoctiall point, by the Sommer Solstist to the Autumne Equinoctiall point, the artificiall daies are longer then the nights. And during the time that the sunne is in other part of the said zodiacke, which declineth towards the opposite Pole, which is depreised vnder the saide Horizon, the nights are longer then the daies: which inequalitye is so much the more, by how much the sunne is neerer to the Solstists, and the sphere is more obliquely placed in respect of the Horizon. So that the artificiall daies encrease from the winter Solstist, by the Vernall equinoctiall point to the sommer Solstist; and do decrease from the same by the Autumne Equinoctiall point, to the winter Solstist. I do not heere particularize the diuersitie of daies, which commeth to passe all the yeere long from degree to degree, being a thing little necessary for the substance of our discourse, and which they may easily learne, that will study vpon the Astronomicall sphere: But that wee may finish this day without going from our sphericall matter; let vs speake somewhat concerning the howers of the day and heights of the sunne, and of his shadowes; the declaration whereof I commit (ACHITO) to you.

Of equall and vnequall, temporall and artificiall howers: of the heights of the sunne above the Horizon, and of his right and reuerse shadowes. Chapter 24.

Of equall
howers,

ACHITO HAVING entreated of naturall and artificiall daies, it now resteth that we say somewhat concerning the parts of them, which are called howers. Euen as then there are two principal and great circles in the sphere, the zodiacke and the Equinoctiall: so likewise are there two manner of howers: one sort are equall and naturall, taken from the Equinoctiall, the other vnequall, temporall or artificiall deriued from the zodiacke. Equall howers are spaces of time measured by the ascension or reuolution of one halfe signe: that is, of fifteenth degrees of the Equinoctiall. For time must bee diuided according to this circle, which is the measure thereof. And though the Equinoctiall bee first diuided, as euery other circle, into twelue equall parts, called signes, and each of those into thirtie degrees like the zodiacke: yet neuerthelesse, because that each signe demaundeth more time to bee eleuated above the Horizon, then the facilitie of distinction and supputation of time requireth, therefore is euery signe diuided into two equall parts. And so in the whole reuolution of the Equinoctiall are 24. halfe signes of 15. degrees a peece, which make the distinctions and measures of 24. howers, diuided by the hower circles, whereof we haue heretofore spoken. Which howers we call equall, as well by reason of the equalitie of the 24. halfe signes, as also because that one requireth no more time to bee eleuated above the Horizon, then the other. And for that the Equinoctiall is the measure of the regular and naturall motion of the whole world, and that euery signe is measured naturall and commonly by the said equall howers, they are therefore called naturall and common howers. We must know then, that the Sunne maketh his entire reuolution about the earth, betweene one noone and the next following, according to the naturall daies in 24. howers, and one fifteenth part of an houre: because the same reuolution comprehendeth the whole Equinoctiall (which is the measure of foure and twenty howers) and nine and fifty minutes, and eight seconds besides, which are almost one degree, which is the fifteenth part of the measure of one equall hower.

Of vnequall
howers,

Concerning vnequall howers, they are referred to the Zodiacke, being in number foure and twentie, that is, twelue of the artificiall day, and twelue of night. And the day-houers beginne at Sunne rising, and those of night at Sunne set. And they be all vnequall one to another, whereby they haue their name. Which that we may well vnderstand, wee must note, that in all artificiall daies and nights, of what quantitie soeuer they bee, there riseth above the Horizon one halfe of the Zodiacke, comprehending sixe signes, which beginne in day at that degree, where the Sunne is; at night in that degree, which is diametrically opposite: And thus there are eleuated by day twelue halfe signes, and as many by night.

And

and shadowes of the Sunne. 695

And as one halfe signe of the Equinoctiall maketh the space of an even hower; so one halfe signe of the zodiacke maketh the space of an vnequall hower. Whereby appeareth that in each day and night there are twelue vnequall howers in the day, and twelue in the night. And that these howers must bee vnequall one to another, it appeareth in this, because that the zodiacke, by reason of the obliquenes thereof, cannot bee the measure of time, but the Equinoctiall onely. Wherefore it is necessarie that the time of the said howers should bee measured by the arcks of the Equinoctiall coascending aboue the Horizon, together with euery halfe signe of the zodiacke containing fiftene degrees. And for that the arcks of the zodiacke, which are equall, cannot haue equall ascensions, even in the right sphere: it is necessarie that the said twelue howers both of day and night should bee vnequall one to another, and by so much the more vnequall, by how much more the Pole is elevated aboue the Horizon, according to the diuersitie of the artificiall daies & nights: whereof they likewise are called artificiall howers. They are also named Planetarie and temporall, for that they are taken in the way of the planets, which is the zodiacke; and also because the ancients haue assigned the time of the seven naturall daies of the weeke, to the domination of the seven planets, attributed to the said vnequall howers: and haue appointed to the said naturall daies, the names of those planets which raigne, the first vnequall hower of the artificiall day. But leauing this discourse, we must now entreat of the altitudes of the sunne, and of his shadowes, according as hath bin declared in our antecedent speech.

That we may better then vnderstand the reason of shadowes, we must first haue knowledge of the altitudes of the sunne aboue the Horizon: because that the diuersitie of shadowes proceedeth from the variety of those heights. Now by the height of the sunne is vnderstood the arcke of the verticle circle, which passeth by the center of the body of the same sunne, being comprised betweene the same center and the Horizon, and distinguished by the parallel of the same Horizon, which passeth together with the same center, as heretofore hath beene related. So that the height of the sunne increaseth from sunne rising till noone, and proportionally decreaseth from noone till sunne set. So that the greatest altitude that the sunne may haue in an artificiall day, is at the noone houre: wherefore it is called the Meridian altitude. Which surmounteth the height of the Equinoctiall in the oblique sphere, by the quantitie of the declination of the sunne, so long time as hee is in that part of the zodiacke, inclining towards the pole, which is elevated aboue the Horizon: and is lesse then the height of the Equinoctiall, by the same quantitie, when the sunne is in the other moitie of the zodiacke, which inclineth towards the opposite pole. So that the least altitude that the sunne may haue, is vnder the winter solstice, and the greatest is when he is in the summer solstice. But the sunne being in the Equinoctiall points, his Meridian altitude differeth not in the oblique sphere, from the height of the Equinoctiall. Whereupon ensueth, that in all the degrees of the zodiacke, which are a like distant from the one or other solstice, the sunne hath one selfesame Meridian altitude. And thereupon ensueth, that in all howers, whereof the one is before none, and the other after, and equally distant from noone, as are ten a clocke in the morning, and two a clocke after none, the sunne hath one selfesame altitude: which is the cause, that in all sunne dials, being composed by helpe of the said howers, as the old quadrants are, the hower spaces serue indifferently as well for before, as after noone. And because that the altitudes of the sunne vary according to the obliquenes of the sphere, the said sunne dials cannot serue generally, but onely to that polarie elevation, whereunto the altitudes of the sunne haue beene calculated. Concerning shadowes they are made by meane of solide darke bodies exposed against the Sunne: And of those some are called right shadowes, and some reuerse shadowes. The right shadow is that which is caused by interposition of the shadowing bodie, rightly erected vpon the Horizon: and the reuerse shadow is that which proceedeth from euery shadowing body, equally distant from the said Horizon. So that the right shadow reacheth out at length vpon the Horizon & all superficies: and the reuerse shadow is turned over perpendicularly aboue the said Horizon. Whereby it is manifest, that right shadowes are infinite, and reuerse none at all, either at Sunne rising, or Sunne set. Againe, right shadowes decrease by little and little from Sunne rising till noone; and doe proportionally increase from noone till Sunne set: to which the reuerse shadowes are contrary. So that the least right shadow, and the greatest reuerse shadow that can be in any day whatsoever, is at noone tide. And you must note, that the Sunne being elevated aboue the Horizon more then 45. degrees euery shadowing body being directly erected vpon the said Horizon, surmounteth his right shadow; but

696 Of the substance and nature of heauen, euery reuerſe ſhadow ſurpaſſeth his ſhadowing body which cauſeth it. And when the ſun is raiſed leſſe then fortie ſiue degrees, the contrarie commeth; for the right ſhadow exceedeth his ſhadowing bodie and the ſhadowing body ſurpaſſeth the reuerſe ſhadow. But if the ſunne be preciſely fortie ſiue degrees high, then all ſhadowing bodies are equall to their ſhadowes both right and reuerſe. From which equalitie is extracted the Geometrical ſquare, which is ſet in quadrants, or vpon the backe of the aſtrolabe, by which are meaſured (by meanes of the ſhadowes, or viſuall lines, repreſenting the ſaid ſhadowes) all lengths, heights and depths, by reaſon that the two ſides of the ſaid ſquare, which meete at right angles in the center of the inſtrument, repreſent two ſhadowes one equall to another. Yet Geographers doe commonly uſe but right Meridian ſhadowes, to know in what part of the world the regions of the earth conſiſt: and how farre they decline from the Equinoctiall: which ſhadowes doe vary leſſe about the Solſtills, then about the Equinoctiall points, like to the altitudes of the ſunne. But we haue ſaid enough concerning this matter: and to morrow we will proſecute our firſt diſcourſe concerning the celeftiall world, now in- treating of the ſubſtance and nature of heauen, and of the particular effect of the ſpherical bodies in things here below, whereof you (A S E R.) ſhall begin to diſcourſe.

*Of the ſubſtance and nature of heauen, and of the celeftiall bodies:
and of their continuance and change.*

Chap. 25.

A S E R.

Being this day to intreate of the ſubſtance and nature of heauen, and of the particular effects of the ſpherical bodies in things here below; wee ſhall make more eaſie entrance thereto, if we firſt beginne with ſome brieſe conſideration concerning all eſſences. Firſt then will wee propound this principle, that among all creatures in heauen and earth ſome are ſpirituall, and the reſt corporall. By the ſpirituall wee meane thoſe that haue no body, and cannot be perceived by corporall ſenſes (as are angles, or diuels, & the ſoules or ſpirits of men:) And by the corporall, we meane all other creatures, that are viſible and ſenſible to the ſenſes of our bodies. Now of theſe, ſome are without life, and the reſt liue. And amongſt thoſe which are without life, there is a difference in two points: One is, in that ſome haue naturall motion, and the reſt haue not. And amongſt thoſe which haue this motion, ſome are mutable and corruptible, and ſubiect to change, and the reſt are immutable and incorruptible, perſiſting alwaies in their eſtate, during the courſe of this world. Stones, mettals, minerals and ſuch like creatures, are of the number of thoſe that haue neither life, nor any naturall moouing whatſoeuer, but like the earth it ſelfe. The water, aire, winde, and fire are creatures which though they haue not life, yet haue they moouing: but they are ſubiect vnto corruption, as are all other creatures compoſed of the elements, whether they retaine life, or not. For by reaſon that they are compounded of matters and contrarie qualities, they doe at length corrupt and are changed, not in regard of their firſt nature and ſubſtance, which periſheth not, though it change formes, but returneth alwaies into the ſame elements, whereof euery compound conſiſteth. And though ſtones and mettals be exceeding hard, yet are they not exempt from corruption, but are conſumed by uſage, yea euen gold and ſilver, which are the moſt precious mettals and of ſo excellent temper, that they reſiſt fire. But the celeftiall bodies, whereof we entreat now, conſiſt of ſuch matter, nature and ſubſtance; that being in perpetuall motion, they euer preſeue in their entire and firſt forme, not being ſubiect to any change in their bodies, nor any way conſuming, like to the other creatures, which are vnder them.

Diuiſion of all eſſences, or natures.

Nothing periſheth in regard of the matter.

But

But what this matter or substance is, hath beene much disputed on amongst the learned. For some Philosophers haue affir me, that the heauens, starres, and planets which we behold, are compounded of the same elements, whereof all other creatures are made; but yet of the most pure parts and portions of them: And vnder this reason (viz.) that they could not be visible, if they were not created of visible matter. For none can make a visible thing of an inuisible. Whereupon they conclude, that there is in the composition of celestiall bodies some portion of earth and water which are visible elements, and more water then earth, because it is more pure and cleere then the earth is, and because it hath motion. And in that they are, most splendant, cleere and moouable, they attribute the principall cause thereof to the nature of the aire and fire, and the most subtile parts of them, whereof (say they) they are singularly composed. But others hold, that the heauens consist of another kinde of substance, then of the elements, which they name a fift essence, of most rare and different substance from the elementary, and much more excellent and noble. Others more cunning finde in the heauens diuers and vnequall substances. Whereunto may seeme to accord that which Americus Vesputius hath declared in the discourse of his third Navigation to the Indies, concerning the magnitude of the stars, making mention of three very great ones, called (Caponi) which are not cleere. And many other authors haue noted diuersity of shining and cleerenes among the stars, and that some part of heauen is thicker then the rest. But whatsoeuer may be vtilly invented in this matter, it seemeth very well, that heat is the substance of celestiall bodies, which is inseparable from brightnes, which is a similitude and semblance of light, hauing the substance of it and of heat so annexed with it selfe, that it is almost nothing else. So that the light, brightnes & heat may be taken for one selfe same substance & matter of heauen, and of all the spheres. Which we must moreouer note to be established and ordained by God, that the Sunne, Moone, and all the other stars and planets are no whit changed since the day of their creation, any more then their saide spheres: neither are they more wearied, worn, or corrupted, for all the labor which they haue performed by the space of so many yeeres, then they were the first day of their creation. For you must not hold it for a change and alteration of their natures and qualities; in that according to their diuers courses, the stars and planets are sometimes far from, & sometimes neere to one another, and that they haue oppositions, coniunctions, and diuers and different respects, according to the variety of their motions: nor yet for the eclipses of the Sunne and Moone. For such changes are not in their proper bodies, substance and quality, but only in regard of vs, and our sight.

But to this constancie, stablenes and continuance of the heauens and the celestiall bodies, the words of the Kingly Prophet in the Psalmes may seeme to be repugnant, when he saith, [Thou (O God) hast aforetime laid the foundation of the earth, and the heauens are the works of thine handes. They shall perish, but thou shalt endure: euen they all shall waxe old as doth a garment: as a vesture shalt thou change them, and they shall be changed. But thou art the same, and thy yeeres shall not faile.] Also it is written, that the heauens and earth shall passe: That the day of the Lord shall come like a Thiefe in the night, and in which the heauens must passe away like a noise of a tempest; the elements must melt with heate, and the earth with all the workes that are therein, shall be burnt: That the heauens being set on fire shall be dissolued, and that wee looke for new heauens and new earth, according to the promise of God: in whom dwelleth righteousness. All these testimonies yet, do not contradict that which we heeretofore said concerning the nature of the celestiall bodies. For wee referre their stability and continuance to the course of all this great world, which God hath ordained and established to endure, till the consummation and ending thereof: in such sort, as he hath declared to vs in his word. Moreouer, it is onething to speake of the heauens comparing their nature with that of other visible and corporall creatures, and another thing, when we compare them with the nature of God or of his word, as the holy Scripture commonly doth. For according to the doctrine thereof, a thousand yeeres are as one day before God: wherefore also this visible frame, both celestiall and terrestriall, is nothing else, but as a vesture which weareth, waxeth old & is cleane done, after that it is worn all out. And sith that both heauen and earth are created by the word of God, there is no doubt, but they shall faile rather then it. For it remaineth for ever like God, from whom it proceedeth from all eternity. There is yet diuersity of opinions amongst the ancient doctors about the vnderstanding of the holy Scripture, concerning the matter which we do now treat of. For some indeed say, that the heauens shall perish with the rest of the world, if it so please the crea-

and if he will haue it so, considering that all creatures both visible and inuisible receiue their essence and continuance, not from themselves, but from God alone: Yet for all that doe they not thinke that the heauens shall altogether faile, nor that God will haue it so. And others maintaine that though the heauens must passe & be dissolued according to the word of God, that yet this defect shall not be an entire annihilating, but onely a certaine change which shall come to them, by which they shall be renewed in far more perfection. Wherto it seemeth that S. Paul agreeth, when he clearly testifieth concerning all creatures in generall, that they are subiect to corruption because of the sin of man: and for that cause they doe attend with great desire for the reuelation and redemption of the children of God, because they shal not be relieved nor deliuered from the seruitude of corruption, to be in the liberty of the glory of them, and restored to their integritie, til the day ordained by the creator, for the acceptation of his into eternall felicity. For thereupon ensueth, that the heauens and celestiall bodies sigh and grone, attending together with the other creatures, this blessed day to be changed, renewed & restored, which S. Peter likewise teacheth in the place before cited. Yea and some Philosophers accord with him concerning the dissolution of the world by fire, but not concerning the cause thereof. For they refer it not to the sin of man, which hath infected the heauen, the earth, and all things contained therein, and put the world into disorder and confusion: but to the nature of fire, which at last consumeth all, and whereof they giue a reason by naturall causes. There are also some Astronomers, who affirme, that some change may be perceiued in the spheres and heavenly bodies concerning their courses and ordinary motions, and that they are somewhat different from those which they haue had from the beginning, how they waxe weary, are worne, and become old in their function, like to other creatures: although this change doth much lesse appeere in them, then in the other works of God, but we will leaue this argument to the professors of Astrologie. And let it suffice vs, for conclusion of this matter, to consider what the stability and continuance of men in this world may be, seeing that all other creatures must receiue a change, & haue an end, yea the very heauens themselves. For what are all people in respect of this great Vniuers? And againe, what is euery one of them particularly, in comparison of the generalitie of mankind, and of all those which haue already gone before vs? But let vs returne to that which concerneth the heauens & sphericall bodies, considering that which doth touch their motions, besides that which hath beene already declared, which (A M A N A) shall bee the subiect for you to discourse vpon.

Of the motions in generall, of their first cause and of their vniou in all nature. Chap. 26.

A M A N A. EAre we enter into the declaration of the subiect, which is now propounded vnto vs to discourse vpon concerning heauen, my desire is, that we may call to our memorie that which we haue already heretofore heard of the nature of the heauens, concerning the matter whereof they are compounded, and concerning their beauty, stability, and continuance. For so shall we reduce the ende of our discourse to that principall point, whereunto we haue already from the beginning destinated it; that is, so much the better to acknowledge our God, and his providence, to the ende to glorifie him. I say then, that if wee considerately meditate vpon the excellencie of the celestiall bodies, wee shall therein finde a more expresse image of the eternitie and maiestie of God, and of his diuine and immutable nature, then in any of all the other visible creatures. Moreover we may accept of them as a testimony and example, not onely of the immortalitie which G O D hath ordained for mens soules, which are spirituall natures: but also of that which hee hath promised our bodies after our resurrection. For that hee can accomplish his promise, wee neither may nor must make doubt of, if we beleue that hee is Almighty: No more must wee make doubt of his will, sith hee hath declared it vnto vs in his word. If then hee hath beene able to create the heauens, and the Starres and planets, which in them are, like splendant precious stones enchafed in rings, of a matter so firme and durable, that it remaineth incorruptible, and as it were immortall, whether it be taken from the fowre elements, or be of an other quintessence, as we haue already heard: It shall bee no lesse easie for him to make our bodies incorruptible & immortal, hauing deliuered them from from corruption & death, to which (through sin) they were subiect. Now let vs pursue that which particularly concerneth the heauen in his motion, wherein we haue notable signes of the glory and bounty of our God.

To vnderstand then sufficiently that which concerneth the present matter, we will first note, that there be three sorts of motion in the whole world. For there is one which tendeth to the middest and to the center of the Vniuers, which is in the earth the lowest of elements: which motion for that it descendeth, is proper to the most heauie elements, and to such creatures as doe most participate with them. Then is there another motion contrary to the first, which alwaies tendeth from the middest, and from belowe vpwards: and this is proper to the most light elements, and to those natures which do neereft approach vnto them, and which participate with their qualities more then the rest. But the third kinde of motion is that: which neither mounteth nor descendeth eyther one way or other, but goeth round, euer turning about the middest like a circle or a wheele. And this is that which is proper to heauen, and to the sphericall bodies, beeing most certaine, disposed, and composd by a most constant and firme order. For though that all the elements, and all other creatures which haue motion, obserue an order therin, yet is it more subiect to change according as the inferiour bodies are subiect to the superiour. But those haue a more certaine course, because they depend not vpon other bodies, which are aboue them, but immediatly vpon God, without the meanes of any other corporall nature. And therefore of all the motions, which are in all creatures, that of the heauen and heauenly bodies is chiefest and most excellent. For whereas some attribute the motions of the spheres to the angels, as if God vsed their ministry heerein (as wee haue already declared) whether it be so or not, yet this is most certen, that the heauens haue their motions immediatly from God, seeing there are no corporall natures aboue them, whereby they may bee moued. For the angels are certaine spirituall creatures, on whom if the omnipotent hath imposed this charge, we must be content to leaue the vnderstanding thereof to him alone, sith it is so much hidden from man. Now in that the celestiall bodies, and the elements, and all creatures haue their proper motion, wherein they continue according to the first ordinance established in nature by the soueraigne creator thereof, we are much to admire both the cause and effects of such a constancy. I intend here to speake of a neere cause, which is a secret amitie ingrafted into euery creature toward his owne nature. For there is a loue an appetite or vniuersall inclination in all creatures, which vrgeth and inciteth them to desire and searce that which agreeth with their nature: so that there is none so insensible, which hath not in it selfe this amitie innate, which neuer pusheth it to follow the nature thereof: and for this cause may wee say, that all motions proceed from loue. And passing further, wee may contemplate the loue of God, as the eternall source of amity and inclination of all nature, and as the first cause of causes, and we shall say, that in the same loue, God louing himselfe, proceeded to his worke, which hitherto we haue celebrated, and doe now meane to prosecute. For sith that God is the soueraigne good, and that all goodnesse is by nature louing, it cannot be but he must likewise loue himselfe exceedingly, and consequently loue all that which he iudgeth to be good, inso much as it proceedeth from him, who is the supreme good, and the limit of all goodnes. This loue then not being able to be idle, nor yet the good which it loued, would manifest both the one and the other, first in the creation of the world; namely, in that of man; and then againe in the restauration and reparation of his fall. So we learne, that the first motion, whereupon all the rest depend, is the loue of God, which proceedeth from his bounty, which he would not keepe shut vp nor enclosed in himself, but would manifest and communicate it with his creatures, whom he hath created, to the end that he might be glorified in them and by them. And as he loueth them for his owne loues sake, and for that they were his worke: so bath he set in them the seeds of loue, both towards him and towards themselves, according to the diuers nature, which he hath conferred vpon them. It is then his natural loue, which constraineth them by a secret feeling of nature imprinted even in those essences, which haue neither reason nor vnderstanding, to take delight in that, which is agreeable to their creator, and to follow his ordinance, tending all to him, and to that which hee loueth, because it is good, and therefore good, being done according to his will; and because it pleaseth him to iudge it and approoue it for such. Whereupon we may conclude, that loue and amitie is the good, by which all creatures haue an accord and agreement, first with God their creator, and then one with another: and that vpon the same cause their conuersation and perfection doth depend. Wherefore loue must be the bond and vnion of all the world, which is an vniuersall peace and concord betweene God and all his creatures. For the diuine providence hath so disposed all the order of them, that they be all conioined one with another by such loue and amitie, that euen they which seeme to be cleane contrary, are allied, reconciled and vnited togeiher by those, which haue more correspondencie between them. In such sort as we may therein behold, a very pleasant and perfect harmonie, like as in musicke; wherein although it seemeth that the notes, tunes and sounds be different one to another; yet notwithstanding, there is such a moderation in them, that they yeeld together a goodly concord and sweet melody, keeping their proportions, times & measures. As then by such peace and concord the celestiaall spheres follow the generall and comon course of the first, highest, and greatest of all, within which they are contained and inclosed; performing likewise each of them his particular course, without endommaging themselves, as wee haue heretofore made mention: so do all the elements follow the heauen, and obserue their order after it, every one in their degree, from the highest to the lowest, hauing their motions agreeable to their nature. And euen as living creatures haue their agreements and coniunctions one with another, every one in his degree, according to the covenant and participation of nature, which they haue together, and as they are either neere to, or farre off one from another: enen so is it in the agreement and consent of nature, which is between the celestiaall bodies and the elements and all creatures composed of them. For this cause, as the angels retaine the first degree among living creatures, and then man the second next them, by reason that in his nature he neereft agreeth with the angels, and doth neereft approach them: so doth the heauen and celestiaall fires retaine the first degree among creatures, which are without soule and without life, in their proper and conuenient motions, according as wee haue already declared. And as man doth in some sort holde the middle place betweene the angels and the most perfect beasts, so doth fire betwixt the heauen and the aire: and as the aire doth keepe the middle place betwixt the fire and water; so the water is a meane betwixt the aire and the earth. But these things will claime a fitter place, when we come to entreate of the elementary world. Wherefore we wil returne to that which onely concerneth the heauenly bodies: which forasmuch as we haue saide to be of the number of those creatures which are without life, being contrary to the opinion of the most famous Philosophers: my minde is, that we should consider neerer of this matter, because that by the excellent politicall and military order, which is amongst them, it seemeth that they are not altogether deprived of life, reason, and vnderstanding: as A R A M we may learne of you.

Of the life, reason, and vnderstanding of the celestiaall bodies: and of the excellent politicall and military order, which is amongst them. Chapter 27.

Four kinds
life.

A R A M. THis being true, that all creatures haue a certaine motion agreeable to their nature, and a naturall loue which euerygeth them to seeke and pursue that, which is most naturall for them; as hath bene already related in our antecedent speech: it seemeth that this can hardly come to passe, but that there must bee in them, some kinde of soule and life, yea euen in those creatures, that are most insensible. And more I will say that it is not onely to be presumed, that they haue some kinde of life, but also a naturall vnderstanding, which wee may properly name inclination; sith there is no essence but can follow his proper course and order in his owne nature and peculiar motions. For the stones themselves, and mettals by a kinde of soule and vegetatiue life, doe growe and increase in the earth: wherefore it seemeth that they are nourished in the earth like to plants. Yet we must note, that to speake properly, there is neither soule nor life attributed vnto them. For according to the common rule of the learned, there are but foure kinds of soules and of life: except by abuse of the language, this name life bee taken generally for the estate of all creatures. But when it is taken in his proper signification, the soule and life is onely attributed to foure kinde of creatures: that is, to herbes, trees, and plants, a nourishing nourishing or vegetatiue soule and life * sensitiue plants, as sea sponges, oysters, cockles, &c. a sensitiue: to perfect beasts a soule and life cogitatiue or knowing: and to men an intellectuall or reasonable soule and life. Though therefore that stones and mettals doe encrease and grow in the earth, yet this is done by addition of matter, which is conuerted into their nature, rather then by any nouriture which they draw from the earth, as plants do. And therefore when we speake properly of life, we must vnderstand something more, then that which simply call (being.) And yet one may sometimes signifie (the estate or being of any thing) by the name of life, taking the word generally, and not in his most proper signification: for the being of euery creature is like the life thereof; in so much as thereby it is conserued in his proper estate. And so it may seeme that Saint Iohn meaneth, saying, That all things were made by the eternall word of God, and that without it nothing was made that was made, and that in it was life: for heere the word, Life, might bee taken for the being of all creatures. In this respect it may be permitted vs to say, that all creatures haue life, but not like any of those which are properly called liuing creatures and each one according to the distinctions by vs before alledged.

A kinde of creature of a middle nature betweene plants and beasts.

John 1.

Now let vs speake of the naturall vnderstanding which seemeth to bee in all creatures. I know that to speake properly, vnderstanding and reason cannot be attributed but onely to angels and men. For although all creatures obserue their order and course in their naturall motions: yet doe we not conclude that they do this by vnderstanding and reason, whereof they should participate with men, but rather by a naturall inclination, which God hath bestowed vpon them to guide and direct them so. Yet it seemeth, that there is great difference betweene the celestiaall bodies, concerning which wee now discourse, and the other creatures which are without life and vnderstanding, considering their well ordered motions and incorruptible nature, as we haue heretofore shewed. For this is the cause why many Philosophers haue taught; that the heauens retained some kinde of life and vnderstanding: briefly, that the world was an animal or liuing creature, for the reasons heretofore alledged. And therefore some haue supposed, that the celestiaall and luminarie bodies did nourish and preserue themselves by the moistnesse and vapours, which they attracted and drew vp by their heate, out of the water and other elements. And for faculties of sense and reason, they also considered the same to be in them; because that they haue their course and motions so well ordered and comprehended one by another, that therein can be found no fault, disorder, or confusion. Which so excellent order could not bee kept nor maintained (it seemed amongst them, without great reason and vnderstanding and wisdom, yea more great then is seene in all the men of the world together. For although they were created partaker of these graces and gifts; yet so farre they are from maintaining such an order amongst them, as do the celestiaall bodies; that contrariwise there is nothing but disorder and confusion in them, & in all their actions. For these reasons therefore sundry Philosophers haue concluded, that as there animals or liuing creatures in the earth, in the waters, and in the fire, so likewise are there in heauen; and that the sunne and moone and the other planets and stars are celestiaall animals, not onely liuing, but also participating of reason and vnderstanding yea some haue named them celestiaall intelligences. And in truth they which haue good skill in Astronomie doe consider how the Sunne, the goodliest and most excellent of the lights of heauen, possesseth the middle place amongst the seven planets like the king and prince of them, and which hath about him the lords of his court. For on one side is Mars the warrior, which hath charge of armies, and on the other side Mercurie his Orator and ambassadour. Then is there betwixt him and Mercury the planet Venus, which is the day starre, messenger of the morning, which alwaies attendeth on the sunne, at his rising and setting, for she riseth euery day before him, and setteth euery day after him, & vnder those is the Moone. These two planets seeme to bee allowed him like mistresses of his house, and huiuswifes of the most moist natures. Then about Mars is the milde and benigne planet Iupiter, to the end to moderate the vehemency and fury of him. And higher yet is Saturne, who is colde, slowe, and sadde; wherefore he may the better temperate the heate of Mars, and serue the sunne like a sound and well staied counsellour, neere about his prince. Then may be seene the high heauen, commonly called the firmament, which containeth all the rest of the starres, vnder which the sunne marcheth in his royall magnificence accompanied (like a king) with his court & armie, all in gallant order. Is it not then a goodly policy, & like a royall court, a celestiaall common wealth, and a braue army, wherein euery star and planet keepeth his ranke and order? And not onely for these considerations, but even by testimonies of Scripture, there are some will vnder take to prooue, that the celestial bodies haue reason and vnderstanding. For the prophets, namely Moses and Isay, sometime addressing their speech to the heauens, call them for auditours: As when they say [Oh heauens, heauens, heare that which I shall speak, and giue eare to my words.] So that they wonder, why these holy men should call to the heauens, if they had neither soule nor life, nor reason, nor vnderstanding. And the Psalmist in his canticles doth exhort the heavenly bodies to praise God no lesse then the angels themselves. But now let vs tell them, that if by these authorities wee must conclude, that the spheres haue in them a soule, life, sense, and reason: wee might say the like of the aire, of the clouds, waters, fire, haile, snowe, vapors, windes, yea and of all earthly creatures, to the very plants. For the royall Prophet inuited them all to praise the Lord, as well as the heauens. Yea he proceedeth farther, when he saith, that all of them performe the word of the Lord. And when Moses and Isay call the heauens to record, they doe as much to the earth, as if it had eares to heare, and vnderstanding or to vnderstand. We must then know, that the Prophets vsing this manner of speech doe speake to insensible creatures, and which are without vnderstanding, the better to moue them to their duty, and the more to induce them to acknowledge their ingratitude and rebellion against God, by rendring to him that honour and reuerence, which they should beare to his Maiesty, which is of such weight and vertue, that the very sense and feeling thereof reacheth to all nature and to every kinde of creature. Whereby we must learne, how great reproach shall redound to men, and the number of witnesses that shall appeere against them, if they will bee more deafe at the voice of God, then the deafeest creatures, and if they will bee lesse moued with his presence, and hardlier acknowledge it, then those his works which are farthest remote from reason & vnderstanding. And in truth what shame may this goodly order which wee whilome spake of, to bee amongst the celestiall bodies, every day breed in vs? For if they had a soule, life, sense, and vnderstanding; we might lesse woonder to see them euer continue and maintaine such a constituted order. Because we might ascribe the good government of them to the reason and wisdom, which might bee resident in them. But if they haue neither sense nor vnderstanding, by meanes whereof they might attaine to that intelligence and wisdom, for to know how to guide and governe themselves: so much more iust occasion hath beene given to the Prophets to appeale to them as witnesses and iudges against men, and leave to looke to other creatures, seeing that they shew in effect, that they doe better vnderstand the voice and word of God, whereby they haue beene created and disposed, and which hath appointed and ordained the estate wherein they serue; then men doe, whom hee hath made partakers of reason and vnderstanding. Wherefore wee will heere note, that when the Prophets do exhort the insensible creatures to praise God, it is chiefly for two reasons. The first is, in keeping enery one their order, they glorifie God after their fashion, and according to their nature, because they are like preachers of his puissance, wisdom, and bounty, and as witnesses of them, and of his glory towards men: and the other reason is so much the better to induce men to praise their creatour, as it behooueth them. But for the Philosophers, yea the Pythagorians and Academicke, which proceede farther concerning the life, reason, and vnderstanding, which they contemplate in the spheres, saying, that they are replenished with soules lodged in them, and by which many of the Diuines also will haue to be meant, the angels and celestiall spirits, who (say they) moue the heauens: but what, and how many there are of these intellectuall formes in the sphericall bodies, he only knoweth, who (as David saith) counteth the number of the starres, and calleth them all by their names. I will onely say thus much, that sith every planet hath his proper force and influence vpon things here below, it seemeth very fit, that it should haue his governing intelligence, which giueth it the vertue to worke: considering that the operation cannot proceed simply from a body. But now I enter into a new matter, the discourse whereof (ACHITOBI) I impose on you.

ACHITOB. Some might maruell, why christian philosophers do alwaies (when they in-treat of the sphere) retaine the names of the gods and goddesses of the ancient idolaters; which the Pagan philosophers, both Greekes and Latines, haue long agoe giuen to the starres and planets. But this should seeme no more strange, then that we yet obserue in the daies of the weeke the names, which were attributed to them by the said authors, and which they haue likewise taken from the names of the planets, except sunday. For, because that these celestially bodies haue bene so called at the first by those, who haue most curiously and diligently searched them out, and left precepts of the Astronomicall doctrine; therefore doe these fond names yet remaine amongst vs, like many other things taken from the ancients. But the discourse is very great and of deepe study, concerning the diuers properties, vertues, and powers which Astronomers assigne to the planets, aboue all nature, yea and ouer all men: of whome making their predictions, they name one man a Saturnist, another a Martialis, or Louialis, or elle a Mercurialis, or a Ven-erian or a Phebean, or a Lunatist. In such sort, that the diuers affections, inclinations and manners of men, are by many holden, not to proceede onely of the matter diuersly disposed (as there be some that esteeme:) but also by the diuers influence and sundry forme, not in specificall diuersitie, but particular and proper. And thence it cometh, that Ptolomie and other professors of Astrology do teach, that the stars & planets do giue influence of good and of euill: for (say they) by Saturne is infused a firme and stable prudence: by Iupiter, a righteous iustice: by Mars, a constant force and puissance; by the Sun, an ardent charity: by Venus, a milde hope: by Mercury, a penetrating faith: and by the Moone, a moderate temperance. Moreouer, that by Saturne, as by a most graue and sublime fautor, men are induced to the most profound mysteries of all diuine and naturall Philosophie; That by Iupiter they are gouerned in a good due temper, so that they make and obserue lawes, and dispose all things with equitie, pursuing alwaies that which is righteous. That from Mars they receiue the abilitie and power to performe any exploit, to the end to bee fortunate in their enterprises. That the sunne bestoweth vpon all, generation, operation, and life; as charity (which is appropriated to him) adorneth all the vertues, likelife, and forme. That Venus giueth grace, cheerefulnesse, and loue; by which men being moued do performe all high matters with delectation; because wee could not sustaine the labour, which is in the study of naturall and diuine matters, no not in temporall things, if loue did not thereto inuite vs; wherewith being afterwarde recreated, we easily suppress the affliction which continuall thought in profound matters and of difficult vnderstanding doth bring vnto vs. That Mercurie maketh vs prompt, sharpe and subtil in euery businesse, but chiefly in searching out of the truth, and in obtaining eloquence, musicke, and glory. That the Moone in the foresaid effects of the other planets, giueth a more neere and variable motion; so that shee causeth to bee correspondent to man (as to the end and image of the whole Vniuers) all the loftie members of it. All these properties (I say) are attributed by sundry Astronomers to the planets, in regard of the good which they cause to men. Againe, others acknowledge some of them to bee the cause of many euils, and those they call ill planets, not celestially.
For they say that Saturne is foolish, niggardly, difficult, inducing to dangers, fraude, mis-chiefe, treasons, violence, captiuitie, banishment, losse, perisurie, contumacy, wrath, hatred of all good, feare, anguish, griefe, burials, sorrow, and losse of children; also that he causeth sorceries, empoisonings, and theft, and maketh Magicians. Of Mars they say, that hee prouoketh to treason, warre, murder, boldnesse, rashnes, pride, sedition, contention, rapine, ambushments, woundings, flights, disloyalties, villanies, foolish loue, easie offending, many cogitations, ill counsell; and that he maketh Princes violent, cruell, inhumane, desirous of bloud and slaughter, periured, deceitfull, inconstant, cursing, and full of all vic-kednesse, and that he foresheweth a mishapen and impudent man: and that he is pernicious to birthes, causing abortiue fruit: Finally, that in all parts of heauen he menaceth some mischiefe. For the rest, I passe them heere in silence, that I may not bee too tedious in this matter, which some Mathematicians and Poets ascribe to other planets, making them cause of many other euills, according to the diuers constellations, where they doe contemplate them. But to speake my minde, wee like Christians must beleue, and not thinke as many naturallists doe (who in stead of acknowledging a God, do forge to themselves an I-doll of Nature, that it should bee the planets or starres, who like fountaines or Ladies of vertues, properties and powers, giue influence to men of the foresaid qualities: but onely that in disposing their bodies, beeing compounded of the elements, vpon which the planets worke, they serue to aide them to abound in vertues or vices, according as their minde being moderatrix of all their actions, doth dispose her faculties, to intend good or euill. For this cause we say, that to those which want the gifts and graces of Gods spirit, all things cannot but succeed badly, and the influences of the speres hurt them rather then otherwise, yea some more then other some: as to the contrarie, the minde of the faithfull wel instructed doth correct the nauities of the stars, and deliuereth himselfe from all peruerse inclination. This is it, that the thrise great Philosopher Mercurius saith, entreating of those whom the diuine power, whatsoever it was, had forsaken, leauing and abandoning them to the euill (as hee speaketh) and all that, which was sensible in them. For thus saith hee. [Of such the forces of anger and appetite, which beeing well directed would cause euery good worke, turne into a nature deprived of reason.] So then wee learne, that very vaine is the faith that is giuen to the palnets, to constellations, and to foolish diuinations and superstitious prognostications of Astrologians. For true Christians feare not the signes of heauen, nor their aspects and regards: but do wholly depend vpon the grace of God and of his providence, which turneth all to the good of his elect.

which may be foreseene and knowne the euents of men. But let vs rather hold with that which Jeremie teacheth vs, saying, [Fear not the signes of heauen, according to the gentiles: for the customs of the people are vaine.] Which is as much, as if he had said, that such curious obseruations, full of superstitions, are friuolous and false, belonging to pagans and idolaters, and not to the people of God. For this cause also we haue in the bookes of the other prophets many things spoken against the predictions and prognostications of the Chaldees and Babylonians, namely in Isay. For God, which is aboue all nature, hath meanes which men cannot perfectly know, either by reason of their ignorance, or for that those meanes are supernaturall. So that it happeneth, that things oftentimes succede cleane contrarie to that, which the Astronomers haue forespoken and prognosticated, according to their contemplation. But I would willingly aske them, what foundation they can haue, when (like prophets) they enterprise to foretell men, good lucks & ill lucks, and all euents which they must expect, and chiefly to kings, princes, and other chiefe personages? For where doe they finde, when God created the stars and planets, that he gaue them commission to reueale to Astrologers, what should be the nature and complexjon of euery one, according to the planet vnder which they should be borne? And againe, how can such iudiciall science haue certaine, seeing there are a thousand men that are borne euery day in the world, in one selfesame countrie, at one selfe same time, hower and instant, one sometimes to be a king, and another a poore shepheard, being neither like in nature, nor like in manners, but sometimes more contrary then fire and water? For this is much prooued in many twiannes, as the scripture giueth vs a notable example in Iacob and Esau. For they were borne so close to one another, that Iacob held with his hand the sole of his brother Esau's foote: and therefore the name of Iacob was giuen him. And by how much the one was humble, good and peaceable; by so much the other was proud, wicked and warlike. And who can beleue that God hath set markes in any of the signes in heauen, to signifie to men that, which he hath ordained concerning euery one in his eternall counsell, which is hidden from the angles themselves? Surely whatsoever wee can learne, is through his holy spirit, which hee communiceth to such as he pleaseth, reuealing to them his secrets, as heretofore he did to his most faithfull seruants. And therefore he that would haue most certaine prognostications, must not goe away to seeke and aske them of other more true Astrologians then the prophets and apostles, with their writings. For they haue surely foretold all that must come to passe in the world, to the very consummation of time, and chiefly touching the monarchies, empires, and kingdomes of the earth, namely Daniell. And I beleue that God hath not created the starres and planets more for kings and princes and other great personages,

sonages, then for the simple & least. Too sound & true a prognostication haue we against them all in Isay, by which he prophesieth, that euery kingdome and euery nation which serueth not the Lord shall perish. So likewise all the blessings and cursings of the law, are so many most certaine propheties, of all that which good and bad men may expect for good or euill. Now I could in this present matter, concerning the influence of celestiall bodies vpon men, produce the testimonies of the most renowned amongst the ancient diuines, against those, who attribute so much vertue to the starres: but because the authoritie of a Christian is of no value with the Atheists and superstitious, which are willingly the greatest idolaters of nature, I will bring them the prooffe of strangers, yea of those, who first gaue the precepts of prognostications: by which they may easily finde their teachings thwarted by themselves, and to haue beene left otherwise by them, then the troupe of their followers do suppose. Let them reade the text of Ptolemie, prince of Astronomers, in the beginning of his Apotelesmes (which is as much to say, as the effects referred to the natiuitie hower) there shall they see that hee attributeth this to the starres, that to the manner of the birth, something to the seed of the parents, one thing to the diet, another to the place, and another to the orders: So that very little resteth in the planets. And the author concludeth his speech in this sort: [As we commend phisitions, who search out the originall of the disease, and the causes in diuers fashions: so must not wee be dispised, if to iudge vpon the infant borne, we inquire of the region, of the birth, diet manners, and other occurrences.] And in his booke entituled (Alarba) he saith. That oftentimes such accidents meete in the infant borne, that he cannot receiue the celestiall influence, sometimes very little, and sometimes much, which many are ignorant of. How then can any by the starres onely determine of that, which must happen to man from the hower of his birth, as infinite many doe beleene? But because some, who are abused by this iudiciall science, doe willingly reply, that Astrologians and prognosticators do oft foretell many things, which are afterward found true: I desire that wee may examine their reason, which (A SER) I leaue to you to discover.

Of the truth which is found in prognostications of Astrologers, and how the starres are appointed by God for signes, and that from their influences no euill proceedeth. Chapter. 29.

A SER. WHo diligently should marke in predictions and Astrologicall prognostications, the falshoods and truthes which therein are found, I doubt not but he should perceiue these much more rare, then the other. But people doe commonly take so great delight to be deceiued, that it sufficeth them, if they bee once told truth, for a thousand times wherein they haue beene foretold lies. And God knoweth, how the professors of this arte doe aduance that point as much as they can, and doe dissemble in all others, whereby their leasings may be discovered. And when they will most floute fooles, they vse ambiguous and and obscure manners of speech, like the answers, which long agoe the diuell made by oracles, both of Apollo, and other pagan idols. For such kinde of speech is fit to stricke the ignorant in a dumper: who though they vnderstand not the Prognosticators speech, yet according as things come to passe they will expound them to their minde, and chiefly, when among many things, some one doth stumble vpon some like apparance with that prediction, although the astrologer speakes at aduenture, and sometimes vnderstands not himselfe: yet this is certaine, and is daily seene by experience, that indeede the most cunning in this science foretel many things, which are after found true. And this may happen chiefly in three manners. The first is, when they containe themselves within the bounds of Astrologie, and will prognosticate nothing, but whereof they foresee the causes most manifest in nature: as in the eclipses of the Sun and moone, the changes thereof, in the courses of the planets, their aspects, and dispositions, and such like naturall inclinations, the knowledge whereof they may by their arte attain vnto. But when they passe farther, it happens to them which is sometimes seene in bad archers and bowmen, who though they take their aime badly, neither yet draw right, may neuerthelesse shoote so often, that by great chance, one or other may hit the white. But this comes not often; for if one should reckon the badde shoots, they would be exceeding few that had hit in respect of the rest. And in this sort haue we in the beginning of our speech meant, concerning the copious and ambiguous manner of Astrologers writings and speeches, very proper for their intention. Finally God in his secret and most iust iudgement, doth many times permit that the things foretolde by such deceiuers do oftentimes succcede, to the intent to punish the curiositie and vanity of men, as it commonly falleth out, and hath in olde time beene knowne by the oracles of diuels, and by the predictions and diuinations of Necromancers and inuocators vpon euill spirits. For they who rather beleue such inuentions of the diuell, then the true and sacred word of God, deserue to be holden in error, by the euents which they expect, when they trust to the father of lying, to the end that they may afterward receive their due and condemnation. So came it to Saul when he went to the witch, to vnderstand the issue and euent of the Philistims warre against him. For he heard that which he desired not to know, and that which was prophecied to him came to passe. Thus in three manners do we perceiue that Astrologers may oftentimes prognosticate the truth. But because some suppose to haue a very good foundation for iudiciall Astrologie, in so much as Moses saith, speaking of the creation of the sunne and Moone and starres, that God set them for signes; I would desire them to consider, that the Prophet expoundeth himselfe in these words, [And God said, Let there be lights in the firmament of heauen, to separate the day from the night, and let them bee for signes and for seasons, and for daies and for yeeres: And let them be for lights in the firmament of the heauen to giue light vpon the earth.] Heereby it is apparent to vs, that God created the planets to distribute the light, and to distinguish and signifie vnto vs by certaine signes the times, seasons, yeeres, moneths, daies & nights, for all politicall, publike and private order. For it is most necessarie, that men should direct themselves according to times and seasons. But although the starres were giuen vs for signes in this respect, and that after the deluge they were in that estate reordained by GOD: yet must wee abstaine from superstition, and too much curiositie which abuseth many in Astrologie (as is aboue saide) and which often occasioneth that they not being able to prognosticate vpon euery cause apparently by the starres, according to their desire, do search and haue recourse to other meanes, to wit, to Necromancy, and Geomancy; by which they diuine what they list, leading men into double error, and prophaning the contemplatiue doctrine of the heauen, which is otherwise of it selfe good and profitable.

But beside all this I might likewise say, that if all things heere below were disposed and directed by the gouernance of heauen, and the influence of the planets, as our naturalists (better Philosophers then Christians) do maintaine: we should behold nothing saue what were good, as being gouerned by good causes. And in this case I demand what become of those euill influences of the starres, vpon which Astrologians do found their predictions? I will not heere alledge that which Moses teacheth vs, saying, that God saw that all things which hee had made were good (for perhaps they would not beleue it:) but let them giue eare to Mercury, whome the ancients called the thrice great and supreme in Philosophie, Metaphysicks, and Theologie. For hee left written vpon pillars in Egypt (as Jamblicus in a long discourse declareth) how that all influences of the starres are good: and if there chance any euill, it must bee imputed to the indisposed subiect, and not to the planets: demonstrating this by the brightnesse of the sunne, which of it selfe is good, and yet hurteth the bleare eie, because of the badde state thereof. Plato also saith, [God hath made the Moone encreasing and decreasing, and hath established the moneths in the yeere, and hath taught by a kinde of happie fortune, to bring in count the number of them. Whereupon ensueth, that the earth being most fruitful, conceiue and engendreth her fruite for the nouriture of man, at such times as the winds gently blow; and the raine prosperously droppeth into her lappe. But if any euill befall herein, we must not blame the diuine and celestiall nature but the humane, which leadeth an vniust life.] And the Stoicks Hieracles crieth out in the verses of Pithagoras in these termes:

- ;; Each one, through his owne euill, it will be;
- ;; For from the heauenly source no vice doth flow
- ;; To soile our soules; the cause are onely wee;
- ;; The blame of mischief then on mortals throw.

And Plato in the sixth booke of Lawes, and Aristotle in his Politicks doe testifie, that man hauing attained to the true doctrine, becommeth a very diuine and perfect debonaire creature: but not hauing beene well brought vp, he becommeth the most cruell of all creatures borne vpon the earth. What then remaineth for vs to attribute to the Starres? I demand of them also, who affirme some influences to be euill, from whence (will they say) that this malice malice proceedeth? Whether from God which commandeth : or from the intelligence which mooueth the heavens: or from the heaven it self? Surely it cannot come from God, who is the soueraigne good, and the first cause ordaining all things. For that is euill or sinne, which is done against the will of the creator, or which declineth from his iustnes: and in nature, euill cannot proceede from the spring of goodnes. Wherefore it should be too foolish and absurd a thing to thinke, that euill should take originall from God: all good: and that from the soueraigne gouernour should proceede the violation of the law, seeing that his will is his owne law it selfe. For the intelligence or angel, which some say continueth in the rion of the spheres, and to whom some assigne the cause of euill influences: I would faine aske them, whether this intelligence doth so worke by the commandement of his Prince, which is the eternall, and soueraigne gouernour of the world, or else against his will and ordinance. If it accomplish any thing according to his precept, certainly that cannot be bad: for nothing is bad but that which is done contrarie to the order established by the prince of Nature. But if it operate against his will, it might seeme to turne to the scandall of the Omnipotent creator, to suffer his seruants so arrogant in rebellion vnpunished. For at the beginning he spared not those amongst the angels, who exalted themselves in pride: And for the rest who persisted in obedience, he in such sort confirmed them, that they cannot sinne any more. Whereupon also ensueth that the Intelligences, being loyall seruants of the Eternall, do not cause euill influences, neither yet do dispose any thing to euill, since they alwaies accomplish the ordinance of the Soueraigne good. And for those, who not beeing able to blame God, nor the moouing intelligence, doe accuse the heavens, as cause of euill influences: I desire them to tell me, if the heavens be malicious, whence cometh their malice? Whether haue they beene created euill, or else beene depraued by euill manners? Or else, their nature failing them, did they become euill? Certainly they were not created euill by the most good worker. Neither haue they beene depraued by manners or failing nature because they haue no choise in their workes, and for that their motions and influences are naturall and invariable, not of freewill, as all Philosophers affirme. Againe I aske them, whether the heavens giue influence, as second causes, or as instruments? If as instruments, then sith they neither mooue nor operate, but according to the will of the Prince, who created them; he should remaine in fault: which is already confuted. But if it be as second causes, seeing the worke is performed by that which liueth, the error should be referred to the intelligences, who mooue them, and are ordained for soules to the spheres: to which we haue also satisfied. I will farther adde this point. That the heavens do work either by nature or by will. If by nature, sith the order thereof is established by God, the sentence of Aristotle is worthe the remembrance, where he saith, [What wee possesse by nature, wee are therein neither praised nor blamed: for the praise belongeth to the worker, and the blame cannot be assigned to the order of the soueraigne Good. But if the heavens worke freely, being guided by an intelligence, it must needs follow, that being the causes of so many mischiefes, which abundantly light on man, they are guided by a furious, or else by a couetous soule. If by a furious, seeing there is a certaine planet, which (as these Astronomers say) doth alwaies designe violent influences, wherefore is it not consumed with such a sempiternall furie? Moreouer why say men, that a planet is inflamed sooner in one house, then in another? What meeteth it in his owne house or in another, that disposeth it to signifie euill? Againe, how is that inflamed with furie, which they affirme to bee immutable? But if the heavens be led by couetousnes, what profit or gaine do they attract from thinges here below? For this couetous desire remayneth onely in themselves. And whosoever coueteth euill, doth it (as the Philosophers say) because that hee is as it were intoxicated and overcome by inebriating matter. But sith the matter of the heavens is far from all change and error, it is neither inebriated nor subuerted. Wherewith then will they blame the heavens? If any say that by nature they are euill, how is it, that this euill should come into their nature? For the Sages collect these reasons and originall of euill in nature: either for that the efficient cause cannot gouerne the superfluitie of the matter; or else cannot supply where it faileth; or else cannot duly dispose it; and such other reasons as presuppose a feeble power of the cause. But for as much as the smith and carpenter of the heavens is of infinite power, how should hee faile in his workmanship? For there was no other cause which might encounter him, since that without any aide, hee framed the heavens: neither could any thing resist the infinite worker, who reduced all thinges into a due and proper estate, as wee haue heretofore amply declared. Yet notwithstanding so many reasons, how many are there which obstinately leauing to the vaine and curious obseruations of the starres, as an infallible rule of the life and estate of man, do about all things feare, least in the ascendant of the natiuitie, any euill planet should haue domination? And indeed doe we not behold that Astrologers, and about all Magicians, are so much sought after amongst vs, that many do (as one may say) hold him to be miserable, who knoweth not his Horoscope? To the end then that wee may better expell out of the braine of every one such foolish opinions, let vs (I pray you) stretch out this discourse in particular against such as accuse Saturne and Mars for most euill planets: the charge whereof (A M A N A) I commit to you.

Of the Planet Saturne, and how it is nor euill, nor any other starre. Chapter. 30.

A M A N A. WE shall doe very well, if keeping our selues from the superstition and curiositie, which misguideth many in the study of iudiciall Astrologie and Diuination, wee stay our selues in the most simple and most certaine Astronomie, which the spirit of God teacheth vs by creation of the world: that is, to contemplate the creator by his works. For so should we become good Astronomers and Christian Astrologers, if (I say) contemplating the heauens, and all the ornament of them, we propose them vnto vs, as vniuersall preachers of the glory of the Soueraigne, and consider them as the high workes of his hands, as the Psalmist doth exhort vs. And so by creation of the Sunne, Moone, Stars, and other celestiaall bodies, we shall learne to meditate, what light there is in him, who dwelleth in the inaccessible brightnes, and which is the father and fountaine of all lights, as also, what good wee are to hope for him. For by that good, which the corporall light bringeth vnto vs, for our bodies; and the Sunne, Moone and Starrs, for the life of men, we may somewhat iudge, what felicitie is prepared by the Diuine and spirituall light for our soules, and by God our Creator, in whom it abideth: beeing a sure meane not to feare the signes of heauen, nor the constellations and aspects of the starres, wherewith many do so menace men, as if in heauen, as in a court of tyrants, it were ordained, that so many mischiefes as should happen to the world, should be contriued.

But let those who so charge the starres of crimes, and therefore turne over the bookes of Pagan Astrologers, and Atheists, rather then diuine writings, lend a while an eare to some good witnesses, whom they themselves cannot reprove, and who doe euen praise the planet of Saturne, the malice of whom wee haue heard to be so great. Behold then first of all, how the prince of the Astronomicall doctrine deposeth and testifieth concerning this planet in these termes: [If Saturne be onely signifier in the estate of the minde, and Lord of the place of Mercurie, and of the moone, and blaseth towards the corners of the world good aspects and beames, the child shall be a lover of good things, of great and firme counsell, and a searcher out of secret things and diuine.] Likewise Iulius Firmicus adorning this planet with many great praises, saith, that from his vertue proceedeth a quicke and subtile spirit in the deliberation of affaires, a certaine word, a stable amitie, a long foresight, and a roiall counsell. There be also many moderne Astronomers, who say of the same Saturne, That euen as the common and ciuill life is designed by Iupiter, so likewise the solitary and diuine life is appropriated to Saturne: Yea the ancient Philosophers and Poets haue sung that he is most good, and that the golden world did passe vnder him: saying that Iupiter did afterward vlurpe the kingdome, having chased out Saturne, and that then beganne the siluer age. And let vs note in regard of the most famous Poets amongst the ancients, that they haue by their writings penetrated into the most profound cabinets of nature, and approached the secrets of the diuine thought. For they sung not iests (as some hold) which the old Fathers would not mention to their little children: but they haue beene acknowledged of the Sages for great Diuines, who hid the mysteries both of the one and other nature vnder the vaile of fables, and for this cause are they celebrated of such as vnderstand well their doctrine. That it is so, Aristotle doth plainly manifest, is that hee confirmeth great points of Philosophy by the testimony of Simonides, and of Homer. And Archefilans the inuentor of the new Academic, ascribed so much honour to Homer, that hee neuer went to bedde, but hee read some of his verses first, and said likewise in the day time that hee might haue more leasure to reade (that hee went to his beloued. Anaxagoras also yea and our Basil with laud admire the excellent vertue in the writings of this Greeke Poet. And how many bee there likewise who esteeme Virgil the imitator of Homer, for a Doctour in all naturall and mortall Philosophie? For many referre all that, which hee hath fained, to an allegoricall sense. Eucretius also entreateth of all the precepts of Philosophy in verse. And Orpheus singeth more loftily then humane knowledge can extend to, the mysteries of Theologie and of the sacred ceremonies, which hee had learned out of holy letters, as himselfe confesseth. Ouid likewise hath covered many of the secrets of Pythagoras, and of the creation, and disposition of the Vniuers, in his Metamorphosis: but because hee depraue them with too lasciuious a discourse, he loseth very much of their dignity. Wherein hee hath bene imitated of many other Poets, as in this our age, wherein there are very many, who doe the office rather of bards, then of the true children of the chaste Muses, because they delight to weaue poisoning sense in the webbe of their faire words. Such indeede Plato commaunded to be chased out of the common wealth. But to returne to our purpose; it is most euident that these auncient Poets, great Philosophers and Diuines,, doe testifie that Saturne is an happy and willing Planer. And in so much as they accuse him for deuouring all his children, except fowre, they themselves interpret that of Time, by which indeed hee consumeth all things, except the fowre elements, which still remaine, because that out of them, and into them all nature is changed. And thereof it commeth, that they so call them, to witte, the fire Jupiter, the aire Iuno; the water Neptune, and the earth Pluto. Moreouer if wee will in excuse of Saturne, consider the cause of the malice, which commonly Astronomers attribute vnto him; it is certaine, that the euils wherewith they accuse him proceed from his cold and dry nature, by which he seemeth to fauour melancholie, whose property is to oppresse and stoppe the desiring power and naturall loue, whose seat is hotte and moist. And in that they separate Saturne from humane society, wee must vnderstand, that this is not the planet which properly they meane, but rather the childe disposed to such complexion and disposition, partly through the influence of the starres, partly through his birth and seede of the parents, or the place of his generation, or of his foode, and partly also through the disposition which hee may gette by nurture and manners: and especially if the said planet ruling in the nativity of the child, it be invaded with the drines of Mars, and coldnes of the Moone. But yet one may correct euery such euill influence. For the child increasing in yeeres and iudgement may addict himselfe to study and contemplation of high and diuine things, which are the delights of him, who leadeth a solitary life: and doubtles he shall perceiue that Saturne is not euill, but doth rather fauour him with a good influence. And if any find himselfe heauy by reason of his Saturnine complexion, let him meditate on that which is written, [Blessed are they which mourne,] if he be pensive or silent, let him hearken to that which is saide, [Mary hath chosen the good part:] if he haue desire to store vp riches, let him lay vp in heauen. For so may he easily correct euery euill inclination, which he shall naturally haue. And as much may we speake of him who shall be stirred vp with the inflammation of Mars. For if the Martial choler maketh him hasty, and subiect to anger, let him not vse it against the poore and little ones, but to repress vices. For as golden Chrysolome saith, [Where there is no wrath nor indignation, there science profiteth nothing; the iudgements are not constant, & crimes are not corrected.] Let then wars, murders, boldnes, magnanimity, spoiles, captiuities, flights, violences, and such like bee exercised against the enemies of God, and for the publike peace: and then this Mars will not be euill, but rather numbred amongst the saints and seruants of God, with Phineas sonne of Eleasar; commended for his zeale, and with David who fought the battels of the Almighty. But if among Warriours there happen deceit, periurie, fraudes, temeritie, furie, man slaughters, thefts, and such mischiefes; all this commeth to passe, because the rule of reason is broken. And then this gate being open, the winds of passions whiske out, and blow violently, like a great tempest. But so long as they remaine vnder the commandement of Eolus; to wit, so long as reason duly governeth; euery violent motion proceeding from Martial choller, is easily moderated, and turneth to profit. The like must be iudged of Venus, who is saide to induce men to a lustfull and lasciuious desire. For if we gouerne well the concupiscence or appetite heared by this planet, the Sunne and Mars, thereto ministring feruor; thereupon would ensue a good loue inflamed towards God and our neighbour. So then wee may conclude our speech, that men doe wrongfully complaine of their nature or the influence of the starres, when they should rather accuse the peruerseness of their ill inclined will, which causeth their voluntarie sinne, as in the second part of our Academic wee haue related. But this will bee more cleere vnto vs, if we consider how the stars worke in man, not in constraining, but disposing: which (A R A M) shall bee the subiect of your speech.

Of the Planets in generall, and how they worke in man, not in constraining, but disposing. Chap. 31.

A R A M. MAny holding opinion, that wee obtaine nothing by the influence of the starres, doe reiect the doctrine of Astrologians as absurde, and altogether from Philosophie. And amongst other reasons, they alleadge that there haue beene many graue philosophers, who haue applied their care and diligence, to search out the causes of things, borrowing their knowledge from Phisicke, from the Mathematickes, and from many other artes and sciences; and yet neuer looked after the causes in astrologie: namely Pythagoras, Plato, Aristotle, Plotin, Anicen, Auerrois, Hippocrates, and others the most renowned auncient authours. But one may answere them, that as it was forbidden by the Mosaicall lawe, that any should reape his field all throughout, but should leaue some corner for the poore and needfull, whereof they might make bundles and fardles to sustaine themselves, and appease their hunger: so it may be, that the former philosophers haue left to their posteritie, in the spacious field of the secrets of nature, ynough for others to gather and to search out after them. And indeede if any one should set himselfe against vs, saying, [Saint Augustine, Ambrose, Ierome, Origen, Damascene, and other doctours both Hebrewes, Greekes and Latines, haue with most diligent labour founded the sense of the Scriptures, without touching that, which now you doe: wherefore that which you say, is not true.] What could this conclude against vs? For it is a common thing in schooles, that nothing is concluded of pure negatives. And the Sages condemne not that, which any one hath found out for excellent by the subtilty of his owne witte, though it neuer before had beene touched by others. Wherefore no man is to bee condemned, if he make a farther search of causes, then many ancient Philosophers haue done, who would not passe the bounds of the elementarie nature, being contented to sound the causes by the power and qualities of these inferiour bodies, as many of our age doe, whose theoricke and practicke doth too much faile. Let vs moreover adde, that the most renowned among the ancients accord in this point. [That the inferiour things, and such as are called naturall, doe drawe to them the fauour of the superiour and celestiall, rather by one aspect then by another.] Which skill is holden excellent to be knowne. But for the Peripateticks, who abased in their sensible objects, content themselves with the sensible qualities for the cause of all effects, saying, that if there be found any effect, ouer which such a quality hath no power, that this proceeds from a cause to vs vknown: we may evidently see, that they haue erred in all their teachings. For when Aristotle intreateth in the Meteors of the heate of the Sunne, he saith, that he proceedeth from two causes ioyned together: to wit, from his motion and place: not from his motion onely, as being quicker then Iupiter, Mars, and Saturne: which forasmuch as they are more remote, their inflammation in a very quicke motion, doth not attaine to vs. Neither also can the heate of the Sunne proceede from the Moone, Venus and Mercurie, because that though they be neerer vnto vs, yet being more slow in motion they are not so much inflamed. This reason he deliuereth, and this makes me to wonder, how a person so celebrated could imagine an inflammation in such things, as receiue no strange impression, for hee would attribute that to the distance and motion, which should be referred to the naturall vertue. Might not some other then, better sound the cause why the interiection of the Sunne beames doth bring heate, though Aristotle a more subtile searcher of naturall causes, could not attaine to it? Which perhaps he abstained to doe, because he would not passe the limits by him appointed in his basest Philosophie phie, which he calleth naturall. Yet neuerthelesse mounting somewhat higher, in that which he writeth to Alexander, he teacheth, that in taking of medicines the aspect of the heavens must be diligently obserued. But Hippocrates proceeding farther, doth foretell the diseases, recovery & death, by the house of the moone, & the aspects therof, which the other planets. A Physitian must be an Astronomer. And Haly in the beginning of the worke of this author, and according to his aduise, saith that the phisition ignorant in astronomie, is like a blinde man that gropes for his way with his staffe. Besides, it would be too long to collect that which Plato in his obscure discourse, and diuers Academicks and vnkowne Philosophers, doe teach to be extracted from the heavens, both how, and when.

And what doe the heavens by their continuall motion, but onely worke in vs? Some may say, they giue influence to the elements and to plants. But I demaund, are not our bodies heated by the sunne, and altered, and (with cold) benumbed by the Moone? The simple vulgar is not ignorant hereof. Why then doe we not say, that the starres communicate other influences no lesse knowne to the Sages, then these of the saide lights are to the vulgar? And yet not that their power performeth entire effects. For with them (as we haue heard) concur the diet, manners, natiuitie, and place, but aboue all, the liberty of the minde is alwaies dominant, to moderate and gouerne all the inclinations thereof, which indeed proceedeth of the proper spirituall nature thereof, which moueth the body; and not the body the minde: and with this consenteth that which Ptolimie saith in the beginning of his Apotelesmes, and in his booke of fruite, speaking thus, [A good Astrologian may well preuent much euill, which otherwise might happen by the disposition of the starres, if beforeknow their nature, and forecast how to hinder that it happen not, and that the ill disposed subiect receiue no damage by the place, by which it should receiue profit. So then, wee should not impose vpon Saturne, an harmefull sadnesse, or wicked seuerity: nor vpon Mars, a cruell rashnesse: nor on Mercurie, a cautelous mallice: nor on Venus, lasciuious loues, nor an inconstant proceeding, on the Moone: no more then hee that hath bleere eies, should impute his infirmitie to the light, nor the flaming of an house to the fire, nor the bruite to the stone, nor bonds, prisons, and executions of malefactors to the seuerity of the iudge. For euery euill effect ensueth vpon the indisposition of the subiect receiuing, and not vpon the influence of the superiour powers: which (to the contrary) wee may maintaine (as already we haue done) to be of it selfe good still, yea by the particular ordinances of the starres, according to the doctrine of Mathematicians. For thus many of them say [Saturne disposeth the intellectuall vertue, he prouoketh to wisdom, and to contemplation of diuine and humane things, and pierceth to the brightnesse of true Philosophie. But if the Saturnist apply his profound thoughts to euill, to accomplish his disordinate appetite, then hee wholly intendeth to deceite, fraude and coggings, and yet the loftiest and diuine part thereof called Synteresis, resisting it in him, then full of melancholy, hee feeleth himselfe so oppressed with anxietie and tediousnesse, that he supposeth that most good and profitable, which is most noisome and damageable, and as he findeth himselfe more oppressed with the often remembrance of his wicked life, many visions do oftentimes present themselves vnto him, like semblances of the dead, shadowes of the deceased, horrors of sepulchers and tombes of such as are departed. To the inner eie of his thought presenteth it selfe the wrath of God, the assaults of the diuell, despaire and hate of saluation. And as much may we speak of the Martialist, who if he excite the violence and force of his courage, not to zeale of iustice as he ought to doe, but to accomplish his desires and carnall appetites: then commits he theeueries, rapes, and many other mischeifes. So that thereupon some will attribute euill to the planets which are called welwilling: For the ordinance of Iupiter, which by the hot and moist, or by a debonaire nature guideth to clemencie, might be so much augmented, that the curbed and peruered spirit might be forced to an entire dissolution. So the noble and milde influence of Venus, which maketh man benigne, if it be not moderated, will make him be effeminate, and a slave to all lustfull appetites. And the Sunne, father of life, and giuer of light, directeth men to true wildome and roiall dignitie, and yet if the splendor of the minde be abused, and that it be conuerted into pride, it mounteth into an ambitious presumption, arrogancy, and scorning of others. Thus then may wee say, that many euils may proceede from that which is good; as of the abundance of wine wherewith any man is glutted, doth arise the oppression of the heart, abating of vertue, and many such accidents: though being moderately taken, it reioiceth the heart, and comforteth the naturall powers. So the water likewise, which is a good element, and very profitable for all, drowneth and choaketh those which take not heed thereof, and ouerturneth those buildings which are not very firme. Wherefore let vs conclude, that all influences are good, so that the subiects be well disposed, and can vse them: and especially, that the stars and planets operate in man, not in constraining, but in disposing his inclinations, the which by reason, the minde may alwaies moderate & correct. And taking occasion vpon this matter, let vs come to the true Astronomie and Astrologie of Christians, which is to contemplate the glory and greatnesse of God by the worke of the heauens: as (ACHITOB) finishing this daies worke you may relate to vs.

Of the true Astronomie, which the heauens teach vs, and especially the sunne in his admirable effects. Chapter 32.

ACHITOB. IT is not without cause that the Prophet saith, [The heauens declare the glory of God, and the earth sheweth the workes of his handes.] For there by hee euidently teacheth; that the worke of the spheres, and their well ordered motion doe demonstrate, as with the finger euen to our eies, the great and admirable prouidence of God their Creatour, euen as if the heauens should speake to every one. In another place it is written, [This high ornament, this cleere firmament, the beauty of the heauen so glorious to behold, is a thing full of Maiesty.] Though then that the heauens haue neither voice nor speech like men, yet when the workmanship of them, and the goodly image: pourtraied and placed in them, doe present themselves vnto vs, it is as much as if God spake to vs. For sight belongeth to the eies, as hearing doth to the eares: and that which offereth it selfe to those, is as the sound is to these. Wherefore in every deede wee may call not onely the heauens, sunne, moone and starres, but all other creatures also, visible words, which speake to the eies, as those which are in sound and voice doespeake to the eares. If likewise wee can very well vnderstand dumbe folkes by the signes which they make vs, and say that they speake by signes: why then should wee not hearken to the language of God, speaking by the heauens, and by the signes, which hee hath placed in them? For may wee not truly say, that they speake vnto vs by signes? And if wee call booke (dumbe teachers) because they teach by the meanes of writing, which they lay before our eies, what fairer booke may wee see written in a fairer letter, and of more neate impression, and printed with goodlier characters, then this great booke of the whole Vniuers, and chiefly of the heauens? Again, if it be needefull for vs to seeke out images to represent God, that so he might become visible to vs, where may we finde them fairer and more liuely, and which speake vnto vs a language most easie to be vnderstood, if we be not altogether deafe? Wherefore it is not without good cause, that when God, willing to make his greatnesse, his magnificence and prouidence knowne to his people, saith by Esay, [Lift vp your eies on high and behold who hath created these things, which is hee, that bringeth out their armies by number, and calleth them al by their names. By the greatness of his power, and mighty strength nothing faileth.] This is it in all these considerations that Dauid in the place before alledged, after he hath acknowledged, that there is no language nor speech, where the voice of the heauens is not hearde, doth further, adde, that their line is gone forth through all the earth, and their words vnto the endes of the world: meaning by this line, the magnificent frame and excellent workmanship of them. For all is so well made and composed therein by the workemaster, that it seemeth to haue bene all drawne out by line, rule and compasse. And when hee speaketh of their words, he vnderstandeth the marke and impression which in is them; by which they preach vnto vs in stead of words. And for this cause also hee saith before: that one day vttereth speech vnto another day, and one night teacheth knowledge vnto another night: which is as much, as if he should say, that one day teacheth and preacheth another, and the night doth the same: because that from day to day, and from night to night, God manifesteth his power and glory.

And let vs note, that the Prophet proposing vnto the heauens thus in generall, as true preachers of his diuine prouidence, maketh principall and expresse mention of the Sun, because it is the most goodly creature, the most agreeable, most profitable, and necessarie for men, men, and for all the rest of the works of God. For this cause also, every one giueth more heed vnto it, then to all the other celestiaall bodies. For it is by the course and means of the Sunne, that we haue ordinarily daies and nights, and that they be sometimes longer, sometimes shorter, and another time equall (as hath beene already tolde vs) and also, that wee haue the distinction of yeeres, and of the diuers seasons of them, as of the spring time, summer, autumn and winter, and of the time fit to sowe, plant, till the earth, and to gather the fruits thereof, and generally to performe all other workes necessary for the life of man. And then may very well be considered one the course and compasse of this goodly light, which is from the one end of heaven to the other ende, and how there is nothing that is hid from the heate thereof. Shall we let passe in silence the gallant course, which every day it maketh, compassing the whole world in the space of fower and twenty howers, with out being any whit weary? For from the hower, that God hath created it, it hath neuer desisted from worke day nor night, and hath neuer failed one iot, neither shall cease, so long as the world shall endure. And therefore it is also said in Ecclesiasticus, [The sunne also a marvellous instrument, when it appeareth, declareth at his going out, the work of the most high.] And presently after, [Great is the Lord that made it, by whose commandement it doth runne hastily.] Then speaking in generall of all the planets and starres, [It is a campe (saith he) pitched on high, shining in the firmament of heaven; the beauty of the heauens are the glorious starres, and the ornament that shineth in the high places of the Lord. By the commandement of the holy one they continue in their order, and faile not in their watch.] And who is it, except the blinde, that beholdeth not this goodly sunne, to passe out of his pavilion, like a magnificent king, that marcheth forth of his palace? Who seeth not the faire countenance that he sheweth to all, being as the eie, & mirror of the whole world? Who vieweth not his trim locks, and the golden and yellow beard of his raies, by which he spreadeth his light, and heate vpon all creatures? In such sort that as none can auoide his heate, so none can fly from his light. For as it is written, [By the word of the Lord are his workes: The sunne that shineth looketh vpon all things, and all the works thereof are full of the glory of the Lord. At noone when it burneth the country, who may abide for the heate thereof? The sunne burneth the mountaines three times more then hee, which keepeth a furnace with continuall heat: it casteth out fire vapors, & with the shining beames blindeth the eies. Hast thou commanded the morning since thy daies (saith the Lord to Iob) and hast thou caused the morning to know his place? That it might take holde of the corners of the earth, and that the wicked might be shaken out of it? For (as it is said in another place,) They are among those, which abhorre the light, and know not the wayes thereof, nor continue in the pathes thereof. The murderer riseth early, and killeth the poore and needy, and in the night he is as a thiefe. The eie also of the adulterer waiteth for the twilight, and saith, None eie shall see me, and disguiseth his face. They digge through houses in the darke, which they marked for themselves in the day: they know not the light. But the morning is euen to them as the shadow of death, if one know them, they are in the terrors of the shadow of death.] By which testimony: aptly agreeing with that, which is written euery man that doth euil hateth the light, we may know, besides the greatnes of the works of God, which principally shineth in the creation of the Sunne, how euen they, who would not behold the light thereof but flye from it as much as they may, because they hate it and feare it as the death, cannot for all that auoide it. To the ende then that wee may reape some profit by this discourse, and so finish this daies talke, let vs thinke, that if the most ignorant and most doltish, are inexcusable for their ignorance and ingratitude towards God; for the sermons of the heauens, which they continually make to all creatures: how much more are the learned, and chiefly Astronomers and Astrologians; if they know not very well how to vse their science to the glory of God. For they are called Astronomers, because they haue the knowledge of the lawes and rules, which the soueraigne creator hath established and ordeined among the Starres and their courses and motions according as their name deriued from the Greeke tongue importeth: as also the name of Astrologie will inferre as much, seeing that thereby is signified, that they vnderstand and can render a reason of the nature, and of the effects of the celestiall bodies. Wherefore then, sith they haue greater knowledge, then the ignorant and common people as well by the knowledge, as by the obseruations and continuall experience of the effects of the planets, they shall bee therefore found the more capable before God; if they vnderstand not the language of the heauens, thereby to learne how to glorifie him. And yet so farre are the greater part of them from doing that which we say, that contrariwise we see very many, which impute that to the spheres, that they should attribute to the spheres creator, and so draw men from God their Father, by the vanity of their humane dreames, vnder colour of their Astronomie and Astrologie, causing them to stay in regard of the creatures with them, and so make them Atheists, as they are, when they acknowledge none other God, but an idol of Nature. And therefore I desire that we may to morrow againe proceed to behold the admirable effects of the Sun, being most apparant to all, & most easie for to know, by which the rudest and most simple may learne to come to God: as among other effects is that of the rising and setting of this goodly light. For the providence of God shineth marvellously in this point, as (A S E R) we may learne of you.

Chapter 33.

A S E R.

With vnderstanding wee read the bookes of the heauens, we shall verily esteeme the celestiall bodies to be the chiefe naturall Phylosophers, Doctors, and Astronomers, by whom God dayly teacheth vs that the principall Astronomie and Astrologie, which hee will haue vs learne, and whereof wee must not be ignorant, without being conuicted, as well the vnlearned as the learned of very great vnthankfulness towards him, and of more beastly brutishnesse, then is amongst the bruite beasts. For he hath assigned vs teachers and masters which keep common schoole with vs day and night, as by our precedent discourse we haue already vnderstood. And yet the greatest part of men, yea almost all, doe no more profite in this schoole, then the very beasts, though indeede it standeth continually wide open to all: yea and they, which should chiefly learne out of this great booke of nature touching the knowledge of the creator of all things, are those which oftentimes are farthest to seeke. For in lieu of committing themselues to be guided by this booke, so to approach to God, as hee pointeth out the path and way to those, who haue eyes to see and a spirit to vnderstand; they rather take occasion therein, by the vaine dreames of their owne apprehensions to wander from the truth. And for this cause Moses, Dauid and the other Prophets and seruants of God, speaking of the workes of the creation, and of the diuine providence in them, doe propound vnto vs, but simply, those which are most apparant to all, and the most easie to be vnderstood, because they will not onely teach the most learned (who are they which willingly make least profit in their writings) but will also instruct the simple and ignorant, who God doth oftentimes make capable of his secrets. For which cause likewise these holy fathers speake not of the spheres, and heavenly bodies subtilly, as Philosophers in their schooles doe, but rather vulgarly; to the ende that the most rude and playnest may vnderstand their Philosophy, replenished with the doctrine of saluation. For is very necessary that every one should bee instructed therein, accordug to his owne capacity.

To pursue then our yesterdaies speech, begun concerning the Sunne, which the holy Scripture setteth so often before our eyes as an vniuersall Preacher of the Soueraigne Majesty, I pray you let vs first consider, what ioy and what good it is, that men receiue by it; so long as it distributeth his light, as we haue already heard, being like the chariot of God to bring it to them. Likewise how much pleasure and profite receiue they by his heate: Againe, doe we not see how he hath his determined time to make vs day? And how that after he

he hath lightened one part of the world, during such time as was assigned to him by God the Creator, he then transporteth his light to the other part? And when he hath performed his task on one side of the world, he returneth to the other without any ceasing, rest, or fainting. Wherin we must especially acknowledge Gods woonderfull prouidence, who hath created him neither greater nor lesse then is necessarie to performe the office, which hath beene committed to him. And for his greatnes wee may truly iudge that it is immense and admirable, because that in what place soeuer men may bee, whether in the East, or in the West, or in the North, or in the South parts, yet doe they all behold it, of one selfe same greatnesse. And therefore doth the prophet say [They which dwell in the vttermoſt parts of the earth, are afraid of thy signes, and thou makeſt them ioyfull with the going forth of the euening, and morning:] that is, with the rising and setting of the sunne, and other planets and ſtars. Wherein we must note, that though we commonly say of the sunne, that hee riseth and setteth, as if wee spake of a man, that went to take his rest in the night, after that hee trauailed all day: yet in truth hee neither riseth nor setteth, for that he is continually busie; bringing day to some, when others haue night. But men say commonly so, because that in regard of vs, hee seemeth, when hee retireth, as if hee went to rest at euen tide: and that he riseth in the morning, when he returneth vnto vs. Wherefore we say, that he is hidden and downe, when we see him not: and that hee is risen, when he appeareth at point of day. And so do the rude people and children, which dwell neere the mountaines, accustomably say, that hee is gone to hide himselfe behind them. And they which are neere the sea suppose, that hee goeth to plunge and wash himselfe therein as the Poets also say, accommodating their stile to the vulgar. And yet all may beholde that he riseth not on the same side where he setteth, but on the other quite opposite. Whereby is easie to be iudged, that hee hath not reposed all the while that men slept, but hath passed much way. And that he still carieth his light with him, for it is a most certaine thing that hee hath not deliuered night and darknes to those people and nations, by which he passed; but light, and day. But if there bee few amongst the rude and ignorant, which meditate these things so farre; there bee fewer, which consider of the prouidence of God, that manifesteth it selfe in this perpetuall changing of day into night, and of night into day. For there is nothing more contrary then light and darknes, and consequently then night and day? And yet hath God so well disposed, compacted, and reconciled these contrarieties together, that if things were otherwise ordained, there were neither man nor beast that could long liue vpon the face of the earth. And therefore Ecclesiasticus saith, [Oh how delectable are al his works, & to be considered euen to the very sparks of fire: they liue all, and endure for ever; and whensoever need is, they are all obedient. They are all double, one contrary to another: he hath made nothing that hath any fault. The one commendeth the goodnesse of the other, and who can bee satisfied with beholding Gods glory?] And indeed if the day should last perpetually, & equally alike in al parts of the world the heat of the sun would so scorch euery thing that it would drie vp and consume not only men and beasts, but euen all moisture and humiditie which is in the earth. Wherby all living creatures should faile, for they could not liue for two causes. First because that life doth principally lie in heate and moisture, and is conserued by them, according to the order that God hath set in nature, to guard and maintaine it. Wherefore as men and beasts loose their life, if their naturall heat bee altogether extinguished: so doth it likewise befall them, when their moisture is entirely consumed. For there must bee a very equall proportion in all those qualities, which are in the bodies of liuing creatures, to wit, in heate and coldnesse, in driness and moisture, according to the nature of the fower elements whereof they are composed; for the excesse of the one doth confound the other. For which cause God hath so disposed the course of the Sunne, that hee distributeth his heate in so good and iust measure, that he hindreth the too much coldnesse and moisture, which might quench the naturall heate: and yet doth not so consume them by the heat and driness which he causeth, but that there alwaies remaineth so much as is needfull for the life of all creatures. And for the other reason that they would faile, it is that neither man, nor any other Animal can liue without nourishment, to repaire in them that, which the naturall heat, like a fire incessantly flaming, hath consumed of radical humour in their bodies: and yet this heate must be likewise maintained that it be not extinguished, as wee haue amply discoursed concerning these things in the second part of our Academy. For this cause then God hath ordeined eating and drinking for the nouriture of all liuing creatures, and hath appointed to the earth, as to the mother of all, the charge and office to produce fruits, and other nourishments needfull for them. Which she cannot doe being by nature cold and drie, if as shee is warmed by the heat of the sunne, she be not also moistened by the waters both of heaven and earth. And therefore when that the sunne hath heated and dried vp all day long, the night (which is the shadow of the earth) doth afterwards ensue, and taking from vs the sight of the sunne and his light, doth by this meanes bring vnto vs darknesse, which causeth night, wherein the Moone who is colde and moist, hath her rule, as the sunne, who is hot and drie, hath his rule in the day time. And so wee must consider these two celestiaall bodies very neerely, according to their proper effects, which we perceiue and experiment heere on earth below, as also Moses testifieth vnto vs, saying, that God created two great lights amongst others, to bee as regents and rulers, the one of day, and the other of night. So then as the earth, and all that it beareth, together with all animals or living creatures that it nourisheth, are heated and dried vp in the day time by the sunne: euen so are they moistned and refreshed in the night time by the withdrawing thereof, and by the humiditie and coldnesse of the Moone. Wherein there especially hapneth a mutuall accord betweene heaven and earth, vnder which we comprise the aire, waters, and all creatures therein contained, with their natures and qualities. Moreover in this maruell, wee are to consider, that as men and animals cannot suruiue without nourishment, which God hath provided by the meanes aforesaid: so likewise could they not liue without taking some rest. For they are not of nature like the heavens, and planets which haue continuall motions, and yet weare not away. And therefore as God hath appointed the day for his creatures to travellin, so hath hee ordained the night for them to rest in. And as waking is proper to travell, so is sleeping peculiar to rest. In which, sleepe being requisite, and sleepe requiring humiditie and freshnesse, the better to dispose and induceliving creatures to sleepe, the night is much fitter therefore, and for rest because of the moist and colde nature thereof, then is the day, which participateth most with heate and drines. And because all repose is in the night, it is also more quiet then the day: neither is there so much noise, which may hinder sleepe and rest. Wherein wee haue yet another commoditie of the distinction and exchange of daies and nights, whereto we may likewise adde that which David declareth when he saith, [Hee appointed the moone to distinguish the seasons, the sunne knoweth his going downe. Thou makest, and it is night, wherein all the beastes of the Forrest creepe forth. The lions roare after their praie, and seeke their meate at God. When the sunne riseth, they retire and couch in their dens. Then goeth man forth to his worke, and to his labour vntill euening.] Behold heere goodly considerations; how God hath provided for the preservation of the life of his creatures, by meanes of day and night. For because that the wilde beastes, which liue by pray are dangerous and cruell, hee so guideth and governeth them by his providence, that hee keepeth them quiet, and shut vp all day in their caues and dens; in such sort, that they seldome come forth but in the night, to seeke their praie, euen then when men & domestical beastes retire themselves, and rest out of their dangers. Thus haue wee very many comodities by the day and the night: And more should be found out by a carefull search. For al that which we haue hitherto declared, is so euident before the eyes of euery one, that the most rude & simple amongst men must needes consider and vnderstand it. But I thinke it most conuenient that continuing the principall subiect of our discourses, wee should speake of the excellent instructions, which doe likewise present themselves in the consideration of the second course and motion of the Sunne and Moone, for the distinction of yeares, moneths and seasons, whereof wee haue heretofore made mention. Then to you (A M A N A) I commit this discourse.

Of the second course and motion of the Sunne and Moone, for the distinction of yeares, moneths and seasons: and of the providence of God in these things. Chap. 34.

A M A N A. THe Sunne as we haue heretofore heard, hath two sundrie courses: the one by which he bringeth vnto vs night and day; and the other by which hee distinguisheth vnto yeares and seasons. Now euery one seeth that the Sunne passeth and runneth runneth through the heavens: and it seemeth to many that the heaven stirreth not, though in truth it be otherwise. For it is the heaven which turneth, and taketh, and carrieth away the sunne with it, so causing him to performe his course. So likewise every one knoweth that the daies, nights, yeeres, and times are divided and measured by the course of the Sun, but the ignorant and common people vnderstand not how this cometh to passe, neither doe they consider of it. For these causes then, there bee many, who cannot so well acknowledge the excellencie, magnificence and diuine glorie, which shineth in the heavens, as they doe who haue bene conuersant in the studie of Astronomie and Astrologie, considering that the celestially light continually lightneth their vnderstanding. And without this guide all science little auaileth for the true knowledge of God. It is then from Astronomers that wee learne, how that besides the course which the sunne and moone do ordinarily make, within the space of fower and twenty howers, which is commonly called a naturall day, as likewise all the other planets and starres make their course by violence of the course of the highest heaven, who comprising all the spheres within the concavities thereof, carrieth them away with him, and causeth to performe the same course which hee pursueth; like to a great wheele that should draw about other lesser ones that were conioyned with it: Besides (I say) this common course of all the heavenly bodies, the sunne, the moone, and the other planets, haue another course proper and peculiar to euery of their spheres, which God hath assigned them: according to which, the sunne performeth his in 365. daies, and sixe howres, and certaine minutes; as long obseruation and daily experience hath taught those, who haue diligently applied themselves to the contemplation of the heavens: who likewise haue knowledge of the proper course of the moone, and euery one of the starres; as hath bene already related in our precedent speeches.

Now as by the first course and motion of the sunne, wee haue a distinction of the daies and nights: so likewise by the second course thereof, is giuen vnto vs the difference of their length and shortnes, and the distinction of the yeeres and diuers seasons. For wee take the succession of the yeeres from this second course of the sunne, as from the moone we haue the distinction of the moneths, according to which shee encreaseth and decreaseth, as we ordinarily behold, by reason of the diuers opposition of the sun, from whom she receiveth her light in such quantity, as is sufficient for her to shine vpon the earth. So Ecclesiasticus saith, That the Lord hath made the moone to appeare according to her seasons, which should be a declaration of the time, and for a perpetuall signe: that the feastes are appointed according to her, her light diminishing to the last end; and the moneths take their name of her, and that shee groweth wonderously in her chaunging. Likewise each one knoweth that the moone declareth the times fit to sowe, plant, and loppe in, and to do other such like busineses, whereof one must iudge according to the state and disposition of her. So then these two great lights, the Sunne and Moone are most notable before all the world, for so much as euery one may see with his eyes (if hee bee not altogether deprived of vnderstanding) the excellent works which God performeth in them, and by them. And therefore also the holy Scripture doth propose them vnto vs more often, and more especially, to induce vs to consider of the maiestie of God in his workes, then any other of the celestiall bodies, which are infinite in number. VVhich, for this cause, none can knowe particularly, nor yet number them, nor name them, saue God alone, as his word teacheth vs by his prophet saying, [He counteth the number of the starres, and calleth them all by their names.] Whereupon we may affirme, that all that we shall heere discourse vpon and that the most subtile amongst men can describe, is a very small thing, in respect of the greatness & excellencie, which their creator hath engraue in them. But yet by this which is proposed vnto vs, we may easily consider, into what an admiration men should be rauished, if it might be permitted them to behold, view and contemplate fully, and in perfection all the stately worke of the heavens, and of all the lights in them contained, and to vnderstand their natures, effects and properties, and all the beauty and goodly order, which therein is, and the great vtility which thereby redoundeth to men and to all creatures. For all therein is disposed by an excellent order, like an host and army, whereof God is the leader and gouernour. And therefore this whole ornament of the heaven and of these faire lights is called in the Scripture the Host, Army, and Souldiers of heaven: and God, who is the Lord and Prince, and the great and soueraigne captaine, is likewise named the Lord of hosts.

of God doth publiſhly declare it ſelfe: ſo haue we excellent teſtimonies in the diuerſitie of the monethes, and of the ſeaſons, which are throughout the yeere. For ſome are cold, others exceſſiue hot, ſome drie, and ſome wet, ſome temperate, and other ſome vntemperate. For according as the ſunne doth approach neere, or recule from vs, or as it is higher or lower, according as our ſight conſidereth it, and the ſituation of the places & countries, which we inhabite, doth preſent it vnto vs; and that his heate remaineth more or leſſe vpon the earth, by meanes of his proper and particular courſe: ſo haue we the daies longer or ſhorter, and the nights likewiſe, [and more or leſſe hot, cold, drie, and wet weather, and more temperatenes and vntemperatenes: So that it may ſeeme that the yeere is diſtinguiſhed by diuerſages, like to the life of man. And therefore many ſay that the ſpringtime is as the infancy and childhood of the yeere: the ſommer like the youth & virility thereof: autumn like the ripe age inclining to oldnes: and winter like the decrepite and laſt age, wherein it ſeemeth that all is mortified, and become dead: then we behold the ſpringtime againe returne like a new creation and reparation of the world, and conſequently all the reſt of the ſeaſons, not failing of the time ordained to them. For as the ſunne neuer faileth to bring the day in due time: ſo likewiſe doth it not faile to diſtinguiſh alwaies vnto vs the diuers ſeaſons in every yeere, in ſuch ſort as it hath done from the beginning. The moone alſo hath her proper effects in all theſe things, and is very powerfull as well among liuing creatures, as among the fruits of the earth, through the changes, which are in her. For it is ſeene by experience, that according as ſhe encreaſeth or decreaſeth, ſo do the humours in all creatures augment and diminifh, and are tender or firme, and change diuerſly. Moreouer, as this planet altereth his courſe, ſo doth the weather change in diſpoſition, turning ſometimes into raine, ſometimes being faire, and ſometimes tempeſtuous. But aboue all, the power which God hath placed in him, manifeſteth it ſelfe moſt euidently in the waters of the ſea, eſpecially in the flowings and ebbings thereof. And although that amongſt ſo many effects produced by theſe two goodly lights, there are great contrarieties and marvellous differences: yet God by his providence can reduce them to ſingular agreement, and make them all returne to one bound and point. For the exceſſe of the one is the temperature of the other. For as one ſeaſon is apt to ſowe and plant in, ſo is another fit to make the fruites grow, and ripen in: and another is proper to gather them in, and prepare them to ſerue our vſes. And as the cold and drought doe much hinder corruptions and infections, which might ariſe through exceſſiue heate and wetnes: ſo doth heate and moiſture temperate the great cold and drieſſe, and conſerue and repaire that which they would deſtroy: ſo that by the one of theſe qualities the defect of the other is ſupplied, & the exceſſe of the one is the tēperature of the other: as wee haue heard that there cometh to paſſe, by the ſucceſſion of day & night which cauſeth that many commodities doe flow to men and animals. By how much the more we coſider of theſe things, by ſo much the more ſhal we find occaſion to wonder at the works and providence of God. For whereas the propertie of one contrarie is to deſtroy another: hee hath ſo well tempered and reconciled them, that he cauſeth the one to be preferred by the other: yea that the one cannot ſubſiſt without the aide of his companion. Which taketh place not onely in theſe things, which wee haue already mentioned, but likewiſe in all creatures, which are in the vniuerſall world. For it is all compoſed of contrarietates. And yet God their Father maketh them to fit ſo well together, that he reduceth all diſcord into concord, and all enimity into amitie: as the example is notable in mans bodie being compounded of elements and qualities cleane contrarie one to another, and yet conioined by ſuch a vnity, that the compoſition and preſeruatiō is moſt firme and aſſured, ſo long time as it pleaſeth God to maintaine his worke. But this matter will be more clearly expounded, when wee ſhall diſcourſe of the elementary world. Yet before wee leave the worthy ſubiect, which hath bene given vs to diſcouſe vpon the celeftiall fires, it will not be a little fruitfull, if wee conſider of the image of God, and his eternall lights, which is propoſed to vs in the Sunne: and the felicity of mans life is represented by changing of the light into darkeneſſe. Which (A R A M) I deſire that we may heare of you.

A R A M. THose matters which hitherto haue beene by vs deliuered concerning the celestiall bodies, although they bee very briefly touched of vs, yet may they serue for a very good foundation, to giue vs some entrance into a more loftie and more excellent Astrologie, wherein wee haue the word of God for our guide. For it is easie for vs alreadie to vnderstand, if wee bee well instructed concerning the vnitie of God in trinitie of persons, and if wee haue in memorie the discourse which we haue helde concerning the creation of heauen and of the celestiall bodies; what goodly images of this diuine essence wee haue pourtraied in them, and principally in the sunne, who alone is in the world sufficient for the totall vniuers: euen as there is but one God, who is the sufficiencie of all creatures. Moreover as this visible sunne is a fountaine of light, which is neuer exhausted nor yet diminisheth in communicating himselfe with all creatures, but is perpetuall; so is it of God, concerning whom it is written, that hee hath garnished the excellent workes of his wisdom, being from euermore, and to euermore for euer; and that vnto him nothing can be added, neither can he be diminished. Moreouer, when it is said of God, that he dwelleth in vnaccessible light, by reason that it is incomprehensible to all creatures: and when hee is called the father of light, and his sonne Iesus Christ the sonne of Iustice, and the light of the world and his word, and likewise they who heare it, and who receiue it are called lights, candles, lampes, and burning torches: we must by so many testimonies, propound vnto vs in our vnderstanding another inuisible and spirituall world, of which this same visible and corporall one is nothing but a verie rude pourtraiture, and an image much differing from that which it representeth: and so conclude, that if this image and picture, and that which yet we behold not, but as in a dim glasse, bee a thing so goodly and so excellent, that indeede it may be couered with the vaile of this All, which we so much admire. For wee may say with Ecclesiasticus: That there are hid yet many greater things then these be, and we haue seene but few of his workes. For (as he addeth) who hath seene him that he may tell vs? And who can magnifie him as hee is? Consequently let vs set before our eyes all this inuisible and spirituall world, replenished with the soules and spirits as we behold this visible world replinshed with bodies: and let vs contemplate twice as many spirituall eies in this intelligible sphere as there bee corporall in all men, and in other living creatures: and then let vs mount vp to God, and to Iesus Christ our Lord, which is the Sunne that illuminateth and lightneth all: and so let vs consider how bright this sun must bee, and what is the light and splendor of him, considering that he is the great Sonne, eternall, infinite, and incomprehensible, who hath created that Sunne which we behold, the light whereof is not so much in proportion comparable with the least beame of the diuine light, as is the brightnes of the least star, yea of a candle compared with al this visible sonne or as one drop of water balanced with the huge sea.

Now let vs consider, that if the sight of this heauenly planet be pleasant to vs, and bring vnto vs ioy and comfort through his light and heat, being cause of so many profits & benefits to all creatures: how much more should the contemplation of the great euermore Son be delightful vnto vs? And what inexplicable benefits doth it bring to men, namely to their soules and spirits? For this is the true Sunne of iustice, which according to the prophet, Mal. 4. hath health in his wings, that is, in his beames, by which he maketh men enioy life eternall. And therefore verie fitly doth the Scripture compare, not onely the knowledge of God but also his fauour and grace, and the times of prosperitie, and of his aide and succour, to the light: as also it compareth mens ignorance of God, and the times of aduersitie, and of his furie and vengeance, to the night and to darkenesse. For this cause I say willing to declare a great grace of God to the people of Israel, saith amongst other things. [Thou shalt haue no more sunne to shine by day, neither shall the brightnesse of the Moone shine vnto thee: for the Lord shall be thine euermore light, and thy God, thy glory, thy sunne shall neuer goe downe, neither shall thy Moone be hid: for the Lord shall bee thine euermore light, and the daies of thy sorrow shall bee ended.] And when the prophets denounce vnto men any great and horrible and fearefull iudgement of God, they commonly say: that the sunne, the moone, and the starres shall loose their brightnes: that the sunne shall waxe darke, and the moone shall be turned into blood, and the stars shall fall from heaven; and the heaven it selfe shall rowle like a scrowle: so that the whole face of the world shall bee chaunged, as if it should bee turned vpside downe, and perish cleane. And though these things come not to passe iust so in respect of the creatures, yet doe the prophets by such manner of speech signifie the greatnesse of the iudgements of God, and of his wrath, when hee punisheth man. For though the nature which hee hath created, doth still remaine in one state, yet it happeneth commonly to men, according to the feeling which they haue of the wrath of God (except they be altogether obdurate against his iudgements) as if the whole frame of the world were onerturned, and as if all creatures should set themselves against them to warre vpon them and confound them, by rushing on them, and running at them. On the other side Isay declaring the grace which God would shew to his people, speaketh thus: [The people that walked in darkenesse haue seene light; they that dwelled in the land of the shadow of death, vpon them hath the light shined.] Againe, in another place: [Arise oh Ierusalem, bee bright, for thy light is come, and the glorie of the Lord is risen vpon thee. For beholde, darkenesse shall cover the earth, and grosse darkenesse the people: but the Lord shall arise vpon thee, and his glorie shall bee seene vpon thee. And the Gentiles shall walke in thy light, and kings at the brightnesse of thy rising vp.] But the prophet speaketh in another kinde of language to the people, when hee talketh to the wicked; and telleth them amongst other thinges: [Therefore is iudgement farre from vs, and iustice doth not come neere vs: Wee waite for light, but loe, it is darkenesse: for brightnesse, but wee walke in darkenesse. Wee grope for the wall like the blinde, and we feele with our hands, as one that were without eyes. Wee stumble at noone daies, as in darkenesse: wee are in solitarie places as dead men.] And therefore also the kingdome of the diuell is called in holy writ, the kingdome of darkenesse, and hee which is the king is named the Prince of darkenesse. But the people of God requesting that the knowledge of him might bee spread abroad throughout the whole earth, withall prosperitie and blessednesse saith in the Psalmes. [God be mercifull vnto vs, and blesse vs, and cause his face to shine amongst vs.] So likewise the author of these diuine Canticles chaunteth to the same purpose. [Lord lift vp the light of thy countenance vpon vs:] that is to say, thy fauour and benignitie, as afterwards he declareth.

Pursuing then this doctrine of the holy Scriptures, wee must learne by that which hath bene propounded vnto vs, concerning the image of God in the sun, & by the discourse of his light, and of the darkenes contrarie thereto, how the soueraigne and great eternall Sun hideth his face from vs, and how hee sheweth it vnto vs, and what good, and what euill doth thereby redound vnto vs, according as his word teacheth vs in the fore alledged testimonies. For as wee haue in the course of nature, one while day, and another while night; and those sometimes long, sometimes short; and as many of one as of another; in one season summer, in another winter; now hot, anon colde; then drie, and afterward wet; so at this time tempest, presently calme weather: even so runnes all the course of mans life. For wee haue therein the time of ignorance and aduersitie, of chastisements, punishments, & vengeance of God, which are the night and time of darkenes to men, & their winter and tempestuous seasons. And so haue we the time of knowledge & vnderstanding of God, and of prosperitie, of grace, of ioie, of felicitie, and of consolation, which are to men like the day and the light, and as the spring time and sommer. And as the daies & nights are some longer, and some shorter: so the Lord prolongeth or abridgeth the times of grace and of rigour; of his fauour and of his wrath, as he pleaseth, and in such measure as he knoweth to be expedient, as well for his owne glorie, as for the the good of his elect. Wherefore as we expect day after the night; the Spring-time and Summer after Autumne and winter: so in time of aduersitie we must attend in good confidence the time of prosperity, as wee are assured to haue light after darkenesse. Likewise as in the day time wee looke for the night; and for Autumne and Winter after the Spring time and Summer: so in time of prosperitie, we must prepare for aduersitie. For as it is written. [To all things there is an appointed time,] and therefore there is a time of ioy, and a time of sorrow, a time to laugh, and a time to weepe. Now if we could consider these things by the course of the Sunne, and by the change and succession of the daies and nights, of the light and darkenesse nes, and of the diuers seasons, which succeed in each yeere: we should learne in this schoole, most profitable and laudable Astronomie, (which is not found in the books of Ptoleme, nor of all the Astrologers, how skilfull soeuer they were, which haue written concerning the knowledge of the stars. For when we should be in prosperity, we would take heed not to abuse our selues, to misgouerne our selues, and become too insolent, as it ordinarily commeth to passe, when we are too much at our ease, and thinke it will bee alwaies so with vs. And hereupon ensueth, that so soone as we are deceiued of our perswasion, we become desperate because that we find our selues in the danger and snares of mischance before wee thinke of it. But when wee shall consider the reuolutions and changes which haue been accustomed to come to the world, we shall foresee like good Astrologers and prognosticators, the tempest comming a far off, and the eclipses of the sunne and of the moone, and while it is day, we shall prepare for the night: and in sommer time for the winter, like good housekeepers. So likewise being in aduersity, we shall not loose courage nor despaire: but we shall comfort our selues in the hope of Gods helpe, and will patiently endure the bad season, vntill such time as he hath by the light of his fauor and grace chased away the darkenes of the scourges of his wrath and vengeance. Thus concluding the subiect of our speech, let vs in-treate especially of the eclipses of the sunne and moone, and of their nature and effects. For we may thereby againe receiue excellent instructions for this life: as (ACHITOB) you can declare vnto vs.

Of the eclipses of the sunne and moone: and of the image which we haue therein: of the constancie which is in God, and of the inconstancie of men, and of humane things. Chap. 37.

ACHITOB. The consideration of the eclipses of the sunne and moone hath opened to men the knowledge of many excellent secrets in nature, as the writings of the learned make motion. Now they concur all in this point, that the eclipse of the sun Cause of eclipses. happeneth through the diametral interposition of the moone betwene it and the earth, and that the shadow of the earth reaching out betwixt sunne and moone, causeth her also to be darkened and eclipsed. So that as the moone depriueth the earth of the brightnesse of the sunne beames; so likewise doth the shadow of the earth hinder the moone of the solary illumination. But the eclipses of these two planets doe differ greatly: for that the sunne Difference of eclipses. happeneth not through default of light in the body thereof; as it doth in the eclipse of the moone. For the sunne is neuer without light, inasmuch as it is the proper substance thereof. But when the earth is directly betwene these two planets, then doth the moone become thorough darke, because wee retaineth no light, at least that may appeare to vs, but onely so much as shee receiueth from the sunne. Therefore according as her discourse is direct, or opposite in respect of that of the sunne, shee doth augment or decrease in light, continually changing her estate in apparance, and according as wee behold her, though in that effect, and according to the verity of her essence, shee hath alwaies one halfe lightened by the sunne. For we must vnderstand, that the moone is round like a bowle, and that alwaies, except when she is eclipsed, she receiueth light from the sun into one halfe of her globe, the other halfe remaining without brightnesse. But inasmuch How the moiety of the moone is euer light. as shee mooueth continually, therefore according as shee retireth from, or approacheth to the sunne; so doth shee appeare diuers in her light, which notwithstanding doth illuminate at all times one moitie of her circularly, from one part to another, that is, from her superiour part to her inferiour part, or from her inferiour to her superior part. Now her inferior or lower part is that which looketh towards the earth, all of which, or any part thereof we behold then when it is lightned: & her superior or vpper part is that which is towards the sphere of the sun; which we cannot behold although it be illuminated by him. Now once a moneth all her inferior moitie receiueth the brightnes of the sun, & tho' doth she appeare vnto vs full of light; which comes to passe on the 15. day of the moones age, because that the

shee doth oppositely confront the sunne. Another time the superiour moitie is fully illuminated, to witte, when shee is conioyned with the sunne, which is ouer her; and then is her lower part darkened, not appeering to vs for two daies: which commeth to passe at the end of the moone: and all the rest of the moneth she hath diuers illuminations. For from her coniuunction with the sunne, the light in the vpper part beginneth to faile, and by little and little to come to the lower part towards vs, according as shee mooueth, reculing from the sunne: and so doth till the fifteenth day, wherein all the inferiour part towards the earth is shining, and the superiour part is cleane without light. After which time the light beginneth to conuey it selfe to the vpper moitie, decreasing by little and little towards vs in the lower moitie, which at last is left cleane without brightnesse, and the other which wee see not becommeth all shining. And it is to be noted, that the hornes of the Moone which her diuers aspect sheweth vs, turne their back parts towards the sunne: and if shee increaseth, they are turned towards the sunne rising if shee bee in the waine, they turne to the sunne setting. Shee shineth moreover, adding to each day three quarters and the fower and twentieth part of an hower, beginning from the second day, till the time she make full moone; and from that time forwards, vntill the like subtraction every day, till the time that she appeareth no more at all. And when she is within fouerteenth degrees of the sunne, she is seene no more. Whereby it appeareth, that all the rest of the planets are greater then the moone: for none of them is hidde or obscured by the beames of the sunne, except it be within seuen degrees thereof. But in that they are all of them higher then the moone is, they seeme to be lesse: so in the same consideration it commeth to passe, that the brightnes of the sun hindreth vs of the sight of the fixed stars in the day time, which neuertheles shine as well in the day as in the night time, as may be perceived at the eclipses of the sun, as likewise in a very deep pit, if one should descend therunto in the day time. Moreover all these stars are neuer eclipsed: For the shadow of the earth, which causeth the moone to loose her light, reacheth not beyond her beaue. And the night also, is no other thing but the shadow of the earth, which shadow is in forme like a Pyramis, growing still lesse & lesse taperwise towards a point, till at last it fadeth. For all shadowes waxe lesse & lesse till they be clean diminished by distance, as may evidently be seen by shadowes of birds, which fly in the aire. Now the shadow of the earth finisheth in the aire at the beginning of the region of fire, and aboue the moone all things are pure, wherefore it is not possible that the terrestiall shadow can hinder the brightnes of the stars, which are aboue the moone. And therefore likewise we behold them in the night time like a candle in a darke place. But the shadow of the earth is the very cause that the Moone is eclipsed alwaies by night. And it is to be noted, in that, that the eclipses both of the Sunne and moone happen not euerie moneth, that it is by reason of the oblineesse of the zodiace, and of the variable motions of the Moone, which being sometimes North and sometimes South (as wee haue heertofore declared) meeteth not alwaies in coniuunction, or in opposition every moneth, that it is by reason of the obliquenesse of the Zodiacke, and of the variable motions of the Moone, which being somtimes North and sometimes South (as wee haue heertofore declared) meeteth not alwaies in coniuunction, or in opposition in the knots of the Elipticke circle, which are in the head, or in the taile of the Dragon. We may note also, that the consideration of the shadowes and eclipses aforesaid, hath taught men to iudge of the greatnesse of the Sunne, of the Moone, and of the earth. For first it should be impossible that their had beene any vniuersal Eclipse of the Sunne, by the diametrall interposition of the Moone, if the earth were greater then the Moone. Again, this planet, and the shadow of the earth deliuereth vnto vs greater certaintie that the vnmeasurable magnitude of the Sunne is much more then their owne: in such sort that (as Pliny saith) there neede nothing more to be required to iudge of the immentitie of the Sunne by the eie, or by coniectures, sith that the trees planted by the way side haue all of them their shadowes proportionably equall, though there bee much distance of ground betwixt them: as if the Sunne were in the midst of them, and did give light to all alike. And during the time that the Sunne is in the Equinoctiall point, ouer the Southerne climates and regions, hee casteth his light downe right, without making any shadow: and yet on the North regions on this side the Solstice circle, the shadowes fall on the North side at noone, and toward the West at Sunne rising, which could not happen if the Sunne were not very much greater then the earth. But leauing this discourse wee must out of our spech learne some point of Christian Astrologie. Now

wee haue heard, that the moone hath no light of her selfe (at least that can appeare vnto vs) but so much as shee receiueth from the sunne, according to the disposition or opposition of their diuers courses: in such sort, that the Moone neuer persisteth in one estate, but changeth incessantly. But it is not so with the sunne, for hee hath alwayes as much light, at one time as at another, and is not subiect to any change. I say then that in him wee haue a goodly image of the constant and immutable God, who is alwaies one, and euer without any variation, and who, firme in his counsell, hath ordained concerning all things for euer, according to his endlesse light, and iust will. So contrariwise wee haue represented to vs in the moone a perfect figure of the creatures, by which is demonstrated vnto vs, that all things vnder heaven are mutable and subiect to continuall change: and also that according as wee receiue our saluation in Christ through faith, and as wee increase therein; in such degree are wee made partakers of his diuine light and of all his graces and blessings, euen as the moone participateth of the brightness of the sunne. Moreover wee shall haue learned a worthy point of Christian Astrology, when wee shall consider that these two celestiall planets haue perpetuall alliance and communication together: euen so the coniunction which is betwixt Iesus Christ and his Church is eternall. And therefore according as it is saide in the common prouerbe, (God keepeth the moone from wolues) the faithfull may very aptly speake this of themselves concerning their enemies, because they are much surer in the alliance of the Almighty, and vnder his protection. For as the Sunne shall neuer bee without the Moone, nor the Moone without the Sunne: so the eternall Sonne of God shall neuer bee without his Church, nor his Church without him, although wee see it sometimes increase, and sometimes decrease, and sometimes as if it cleane failed, and were vanished, like the eclipsed Moone. But as the Moone doth not faile by any eclipse that can happen, but that it persisteth to remaine a Moone still, though shee bee not seene of men: so the Church can neuer cleane faile, nor be so consumed; but that it shall euer be a Church, notwithstanding that it may well seeme to humane sight and exterior appearance to bee nothing at all, and without any vigour. For it is founded vpon the firme rocke which is Iesus Christ, and therefore all the power of hell cannot preuaile against it nor waste it. And the Lord can alwaies tell who bee his, though men knowe it not. Next wee must learne, that as the moone is eclipsed; when shee is so opposed to the sunne, that the shadowe of the earth, spreade out betweene them both, hindereth her to receiue that light from him, which shee is accustomed to attract: so cometh it to men in the Church when their sinnes are like an obscure cloude, and an obstacle, which hindereth the fauour and grace of God, that it cannot attaine to them; and when there bee mistes and darkenesses of ignorance, which doe detaine them from beholding of Iesus Christ the true sonne of their soules and to committe themselves to bee guided by the light of his word. But as the sunne faileth not though he bee eclipsed in regarde of vs, so the soueraigne head of the elect doth neuer faile to his Church; though he may seeme sometimes to be absent, & quite withdrawne, for he alwaies supporteth it by his power. And therefore also it is written that the woman (by whom the Church is signified) hath the Moone vnder her feete: which is as much to say, as that the conuersation of the children of God, which are members of the Church, is not in earth, but in heaven (as Saint Paul testifieth) and that they haue already put vnder their feete all worldly things, which are mutable and inconstant: inso much as they liue not after the spirit, and not after the flesh, and are illuminated by Iesus Christ, who is the true Sonne of Iustice, that by the brightness of his word and of his coming discouereth all things. It is most certaine, that the number of these is very small in respect of those worldly men, who following the nature of elementarie and corporall things, are subiect to greater changes then the Moone her selfe: which being lower then all the other stars and planets, and by so much neerer to the earth, receiueth likewise some mutation of the stars: as if God would represent vnto vs in her, the changings, whereto the elements and all creatures composed of them, which are vnder the celestiall spheres, are ordinarily subiect. And yet doth not the Moone change from her proper nature, which was ordeined by the Creatour from the beginning, as wee haue already declared: yea though that in regard of vs, and of our sight, shee haue the foresaid mutations; yet doth shee neuer faile, but doth euermore repaire himselfe, and presently renue: so that wee see her not weare away in such manner, but that shee persisteth without ceasing in her proper and naturall course. But it is not so with men, who change not onely from day to day, but also from man subiect to greater changes then the moone.

hower to hower, from instant to instant, from age to age. For as they daily proceed in growth of body and of strength, from the hower of their conception & birth from time to time, vntill they be arriued to their full vigour like the full moone: so after they are ascended to this degree, they alwaies abate and decline, till their extreamest age, and to death, wherein they vtterly faile in respect of this life, as if they had neuer beene. For they cannot doe like the moone, who after her defect doth continually repaire and restore herselfe, till such time as she shew herselfe full and entire. But they are constrained to attend for that last day, which is called by Saint Peter the day of the restitution and restauration of all things foretolde by the prophets. So then in that day shall we be renewed in a permanent estate for euer. Behold then what (me seemeth) we must consider like christians vpon our discourses of the sun and of the moone. And hauing hitherto entreated of the heavenly world, and of the spheres sufficiently to content a Christian astronomer: we will now proceed to describe the elementary world: whereof (A S E R) you shall begin to speake, instructing vs in the principles of naturall and corruptible things.

Of the beginning of naturall and corruptible things. Chap. 37

Of the first matter of all things,

Nothing can
cleane perishe.

A S E R ALL Philosophers with one consent doe teach, that there haue beene at first (or at leastwise one must vnderstand so) some subiect without forme, capable of all formes, which they called (matter) or (Hyle) that is to say, the substance or stufte, which some also haue named (Chaos) and which is properly described by Moses in these Hebrew words (Tohu and Bohu) which is as much as to say, as I wot not what thing without forme, containing by possibility all that which could be formed. Plato in his Timæo calleth it a bosome without forme, a power which is mother of the world, a nurse, a subiect, and a receptacle of formes; and saith that it was not distinguished by any quantity, nor by any degree. And because that out of this first subiect innumerable thioges were to bee produced, Anaxagoras disputeth how that in the same were contained infinite formes and numbers not limited, which the onely vnderstanding and thought Creatour of all things had drawne out in effect. And this Aristotle attributeth to nature, though sometimes he seemeth to distinguish this nature from God, and maketh them companions, oftentimes repeating these words [God, & Nature made] or [made nothing without cause]. Now for vs we know, that that nature which the Philosophers called disposing and distinguishing, can be nothing else but God onely, as appeareth by sundry reasons which wee haue heretofore deduced. Wherefore holding this to be confessed, we must be sure, that the perpetuall generation of things, declareth that it is a matter which hath at first been made by some other meanes. For come commeth of the earth, and of humor, animals of seede, and of bloud or egges: athes are made by wood, and there is nothing so little but it is made of some subiect. But in all these generations, it is necessary that something remaine, from which they are drawne in their first originall. When then any creature is engendred by another, if the forme perish, and any thing doe remaine, it must (of necessity) be the matter: which the corruption it selfe doth manifest, because that nothing can wholly perish so long as it is corrupted. For the apple perisheth, and is conuerted into wormes, so is the wood into cinders when it is burned: so water changeth it selfe into vapors and smoake by the heate of the fire, or of the Sunne. Now all vapour and smoke is something, for it can stifle a man, and if it be receiued and gathered into a vessell, it turneth to drops of water. Behold then how manifest it is, that in all this Vniuers there is a certaine thing hidden vnder euery forme, which is not made by common generation, nor yet doth perish by corruption: and which like some prime subiect, being diuided vnder many and sundry formes, wee call, as wee haue already said, the first matter not engendred, permanent, because it perisheth not, but remaineth and consisteth according to the effect thereof. And when we compare it to the formes, we say that it is by power the same which they are, because that it can receiue all formes: so that the matter of a childe being formed, is said to bee a childe by power; and by effect it is the subiect, whereof the childe may consist: for it is a mixture so fashioned, and such as one may see it. But when it is compared to the forme of the childe, it is simply called a matter by power: for if it were such by effect, then were it a childe of it selfe, and not a subiect of him. So then by the consent of all Philosophers Philosophers, there is a certaine grosse matter dis furnished of formes, but capable of all, though by nature it be deprived of all. For which cause also they establish with this matter, priuation, for a beginning of naturall things. And mounting higher, they consider of a changing or working cause, by force whereof, the matter being wrought and mollified, which is onely in power, is at length actually performed: even as waxe being plied and softned by handling and working in the hand is fashioned into diuers formes, according to the will of him that doth it. And because that nature doth nothing at aduenture, but all for some good purpose: thence it is that the finall cause is by them considered as a principle. And likewise because that the neereft end of the working cause is the forme, which it taketh out of the bosome of the matter, and that for this intent it worketh and mouldeth it, to the end to reduce it to a perfect estate to receive a forme: for these causes Aristotle constituteth the forme for the third principle. The which cannot be drawne out of the wombe of the matter, except it be first disposed, and prepared by convenient qualities, and therefore the Philosophers say, that about them the maker bestoweth and emploiet all his labour, and all the time of the action, to the end that the species may presently appeare in a point and moment vnseparable, as it were for the wages of his pains. But the Peripateticks call the worker the cause, rather than a principle. And the followers of Plato, being more cleere sighted in sacred mysteries, doe teach, that although the naturall causes do appeare to vs of themselves, forming, fashioning and moulding euery body; yet neuerthelesse are they not the prime and first causes of euery thing that is made, but rather instruments of the diuine art to whom they serue and obey: even as the hands of a cunning workeman, though they compose, place and change the whole matter of an house, as wood, stone, and morter and that nothing besides them may bee scene, whereto the fashion of the edifice might be attributed: yet are they knowne of vs to be an instrument obeying and seruiceable to the Idea which being seated in the minde of the Architect, hee performeth and acteth with his hands in sensible matter, the worke which hee hath conceived. And for this occasion the Academicks speake of these two causes (the instrumentall and the exemplarie cause) when they intreate of the framing of all things. Which mee thinketh is often confirmed by the Peripateticks, when this axiome is read in their writings. [Euery worke of nature is the worke of Intelligence.] And both the one and the other doe confesse, that God hath drawne all things out of the matter. But because that for to drawe them out, the matter must necessarily be presupposed, and the forme which thereof is fashioned must be conceived as also the power or application and disposition of the said matter: Thereupon are sprung the three principals of naturall things which Aristotle ordeineth; to wit matter, forme and priuation. Which opinion Pythagoras seemed to leane vnto; teaching that in the first production of things, there were present the Euen and the Odde: for the Euen (according to the doctrine of those which doe Philosophically discourse by numbers) and principally the binarie (or number of two) signifieth the matter, and the vneuen or odde betokeneth the forme. Moreover the degrees of formes and things composed, are excellently and harmoniously distributed by the Euen and Odden numbers, as by their writings we may easily learne. But let vs note, that that which the Pythagorians signifie by numbers, Plato doth abundantly describe by greatnesse and smalnesse, because all that which is, doth retaine a greater or lesse degree of essence and perfection, which neuertheles is distinguished by euen and odde numbers. And if one speake of bodies, euery one of them hath a great, little, or meane quantity: which likewise is by the same numbers limited and distinguished.

But to leaue the curious disputation concerning these things to the Philosophers, and so to grow to the conclusion of our speech concerning the principles of naturall and corruptible things, we must call that into our memory, which we haue already declared, how that the matter stood in need of a worker and ordayer. Now this same is none other, but the alone and onely principle of principles, and the cause of causes, God omnipotent, author of the Vniuers: who being a soueraigne worker, hath produced out of the subiect by him created all compound bodies. From whom likewise it is necessarie, that all formes doe flowe, whether they bee drawne out of the bosome of the matter (as some Philosophers affirme) or proceed without any means of the form-giuer, as many learned dispute, for he must alwaies be said to be engendring and producing, which draweth the matter into an effect by any manner whatsoever. Moreover, some subtile spirits do account among the principles of naturall things Motion & Place. For they say that the principle

Of priuation of the changing cause.

Of the finall cause, Of the forme

That naturall causes account principles.

Three principles according to Aristotle.

Of one alone and onely principle.

Motion, and place set by some for principles.

Motion seemeth to be naturally in all bodies; of which some, as light, are caried aloft; others, as heauy, descend downe: and yet are they not forcibly driuen; for then violently they would returue to their proper place. Neither are they drawen: for the place is an accident and draweth no Element at all. Then forso much as all motion is made in place, it seemeth very well that it must be for one of the principles of all things. Now place is the supreme superficies of every body, environing the same round about: which superficies remaineth, the bodie being separated. And every place is equal to the body therein contained. Every body likewise is in a place, and in every place is a body. For every body hath his extreme superficies, and the place cannot be without a body, considering that every place is the highest superficies containing a body. And when the place is taken in regard of the roundnesse of the heavens, it is immutable, inso much as it containeth the entire body of the Vniuers. But being considered as the superficies of any particular body, it is changed by the diuers disposition and alteration of the creatures, and remaineth not alwaies the same. Behold then that which I haue thought worthy to be noted in regard of the principles whereof the Philosophers dispute, and of which and by which, namely, of the forme and first matter, the sensible elements of all corruptible things doe consist and are composed. Whereof we are according to the course of our talke to enforme our selues as (A M A N A) you shall presently doe.

Of the Elements, and of the things to be considered in them, in that they are distinguished by the number of foure. Chap. 38.
